(d) Make available to the Union, on its request, the information it sought on 20 February 1985, as delimited in this decision.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay and other sums due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its plant in Cairo, Illinois, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[20] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 14, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that all other allegations of the complaint as to which no violations have been found are dismissed.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with District 111, Lodge 1076, International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, AFL–CIO (the Union) as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit described below, by refusing to execute in writing and to honor the bargaining agreement consumated on 20 February 1985:

> All production and maintenance and inspection employees employed at Respondent's Cairo, Illinios plant, excluding office employees, professional employees, laboratory technicians, salaried chemists, superintendents, plant protection employees, executives, department foremen, and other supervisors with authority to hire, promote, discipline or otherwise effect changes in the status of employees or effectively recommend such action.

WE WILL NOT refuse to furnish to the Union information to which it is entitled by law.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on the request of the Union, execute in writing and give retroactive effect to the 20 February 1985 bargaining agreement.

WE WILL offer, on application, to all our employees engaged in an unfair labor practice strike, who were not permanently replaced while economic strikers, reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, discharging if necessary any replacement hired on or after 25 February 1985, when the economic strike was converted into an unfair labor practice strike.

WE WILL make each of the employees whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered by reason of the failure of the Company to sign and give effect to the 20 February 1985 bargaining agreement, and its failure, if any, to reinstate them, on application, plus interest.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 20 May 1986 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief in reply to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

The judge found, and we agree, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging employee Downey.

The facts are not in dispute. Downey had been an active supporter of labor organizations at the Respondent's Port Carbon, Pennsylvania facility since 1979 when he was the steward for the independent union that then represented the Respondent's production and maintenance employees. He was an observer in a Board-conducted election in 1980 when the Textile Workers attempted to organize those employees. He solicited authorization cards and distributed pamphlets for the Teamsters and was an observer at elections held in March and December 1982. He handed out cards and pamphlets and talked with fellow employees in the Teamsters campaign in 1984 and served as an alternate observer in an election that year. He was again active in enlisting support for the Teamsters in late 1984 and early 1985. Downey also was a witness in two prior unfair labor practice proceedings involving the Respondent.[3]

Downey was on disability leave when a Teamsters election was held in March 1985, but voted in the election. As Downey stopped on his way out of the plant to talk to another employee, Plant Manager Horton told Downey to "get the hell out of the plant," but permitted another employee on disability leave to speak to other employees. At an employee meeting held in October 1984 Horton stated he could not afford any union problems, threatened to lock the Respondent's doors, and turned to Downey, saying: "Do you understand that, Ron?" Furthermore, Downey himself acknowleged that he was during this time the "leading union activist" at the facility. Thus, the judge found sufficient evidence to impute to the Respondent knowledge of Downey's union support for at least 5 years.

During the week ending 8 January 1985 Downey produced "40% bad work" on his dye machines, accounting for five out of nine lots that had to be reworked. On 14 January 1985 Horton issued Downey a "final warning," placing him on a 1-year probation and providing, in relevant part:

> Should any action on your part during this period of probation cause the issuance of a written warning for any reason, you shall be terminated from Pottsville Bleach and Dye immediately and irrevocably. Or, if, during the term of your probation and as a result of Company analysis, your job performance should produce an excess of seven percent (7%) rework in any one (1) week period, you shall be terminated immediately and irrevocably.

Prior to that time, Downey had received only one warning, acknowledged by the Respondent to be ambiguously worded. It was issued on 19 June 1984 for excessive absenteeism.

An unfair labor practice charge regarding the 14 January warning was filed by the Teamsters on Downey's behalf, but was dismissed by the Acting Regional Director on 29 March 1985. Testimony regarding the warning was, however, adduced at the hearing in the instant case. For instance, employee Frederick Powers credibly testified that during the winter of 1985 he discovered a black, looseleaf notebook bearing on its cover the name "Richard Flagg," who was then the Port Carbon facility superintendent. The notebook contained the following:

> Q. Could it have been caused by bad water?

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The General Counsel excepts to the judge's failure to include a visitatorial clause in the recommended Order. A visitatorial clause authorizes the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Board's Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

A. Yes.

Q. Can we prove that the bad coppering was Downey's fault?

A. Depending on the investigator's knowledge.

Q. Can I fake my way through this?

A. Yes.

Because the General Counsel was not contesting the legitimacy of the dismissal of the earlier charge, the judge stated that he was bound to find that the warnings would have been issued in any event. He found, however, that this newly discovered evidence suggested that the Respondent not only purposefully attempted to blame Downey for the bad dye lots, but also schemed to prove that the bad dye lots resulted from Downey's error rather than from "bad water." Our dissenting colleague conveniently ignores this highly probative evidence regarding the Respondent's motive in placing Downey on probation.

On 2 October 1985 Downey was discharged assertedly for an error he made on 26 September 1985 when he opened a roll of cloth on a rack with 26 other rolls and ordered all 27 to be dyed the same color (blue). Unknown to Downey, the other 26 rolls were to have been dyed a different color (red). As the dissent points out, and the judge admitted, Downey's error resulted from his failure to follow work instructions. What the dissent does not point out, however, is that the work instructions that required Downey to check each and every roll of cloth were given to him only a week before this incident. As found by the judge, Downey's legitimate understanding of opening procedure, based on training and past practice, was that he was responsible for matching only one roll with an order.

Our dissenting colleague fails to mention other relevant facts. Although the Respondent may have discharged Downey "according to the terms of his probation," Downey's discharge was not consistent with the Respondent's usual disciplinary system. As found by the judge, the Respondent's official practice was to issue an oral warning (written and placed in the employee's file), then a written warning, then a final warning, followed by discharge for any further violation. The judge noted that the system was not strictly followed: one employee received six notations for bad work, followed by five warnings, all but one of which were for bad work, before he was discharged. Prior to Downey's discharge, however, Downey had received only a warning for excessive absenteeism and a warning for his alleged dyeing mistakes in January 1985. Thus, the judge found, and we agree, that there is evidence of disparate treatment in the leniency accorded to other employees, as compared to the harshness of the discipline meted out to Downey.

There is further evidence of disparate treatment. The dissent fails to acknowledge that Downey's error, characterized by the dissent as "major," proved to be correctable with no economic loss to the Respondent, unlike other employee errors made around the same time. Downey's mistake was caught in time for the Respondent to switch the order numbers, use the lot mistakenly dyed blue, and have another lot dyed red for the same customer. Thus, no rework of Downey's job was required, and the error did not cost the Respondent any money. In this respect, Downey's error contrasted with the two other incidents of employee mistakes made in dyeing and finishing fabric in the summer of 1985 mentioned in the dissent, which not only necessitated reworking at the Respondent's expense but involved seven and eight times as much material as Downey was accused of incorrectly designating. In both instances employees were "counselled" (with no writing memorializing an oral warning) rather than disciplined. Regarding the more serious incident of the two, the judge found further evidence of disparate treatment in the fact that employees as culpable as Downey were identified but not disciplined. The dissent's reliance on the fact that those employees were not on probation, like Downey, is inaccurate and misleading inasmuch as it fails to confront the fundamental issue in disparate treatment cases such as this: why employees responsible for a mistake far more significant than the one Downey made were not disciplined at all by the Respondent.

In finding evidence of the Respondent's pretextual firing of Downey, the judge also noted statements made by Horton at the time of Downey's discharge: that Downey was a good worker and that it was a shame he had to be terminated, that Horton would give Downey a good reference, and that "it was just too bad that [Downey] didn't obey the philosophies and policies of the company." The judge found that Horton's praise of Downey as a good worker and promise to give him a good reference was inconsistent with the Respondent's defense that Downey was fired as a result of bad work. We agree with the judge's finding that Horton's praise of Downey's work is inconsistent with the Respondent's defense based on Downey's work performance. In so doing, however, we find it unnecessary to rely on Horton's reference to company "philosophies and policies," a phrase that we find in this context to be ambiguous at best.

We note, finally, that the General Counsel did not rely solely on prior cases involving this Respondent in adducing evidence of antiunion animus.

As found by the judge, there is evidence of antiunion animus in Horton's singling out Downey as part of his extemporaneous statements in opposition to unionization; the newly discovered evidence indicating that the Respondent improperly "framed" Downey for poor dyeing that was not his fault; and the punishment meted out to Downey, admittedly administered in accordance with the terms of his probation, but indicative of disparate treatment when employees involved in a more serious error received no punishment at all. The clear preponderance of the evidence in this case establishes that the Respondent was looking to seize on an opportunity it had not had before to discharge Downey because he was a union partisan.

We find, therefore, that the General Counsel has met the burden under Wright Line[4] of showing that a motivating factor for the Respondent's discharge of Downey was Downey's union activity. Further, the Respondent has not shown that it would have discharged Downey even in the absence of his union activity. Thus, we adopt the judge's finding that Downey's error was utilized by the Respondent as a pretext for his discharge; that Downey would have been treated similarly to the other employees responsible for processing mistakes if he had not been an active Teamsters supporter; and that the real reason behind his discharge was his union activity.

Accordingly, on the basis of all the foregoing, we adopt the judge's finding that the Respondent discharged Downey in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Pottsville Bleaching and Dyeing Company, Port Carbon, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

Contrary to my colleagues I would reverse the judge's finding that the Respondent's discharge of Ronald Downey violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) and would dismiss the complaint.

The Respondent is engaged in the bleaching and dyeing of tubular fabrics and has been the object of several union organizing drives over the years. Since at least 1979 the Respondent has been aware that Ronald Downey was an active union supporter.

On 14 January 1985 Respondent put Downey on 1-year probation for producing "40% bad work" on his dye machines from 2–8 January 1985. The conditions of the probation, as stated in Downey's warning letter, were as follows:

> Should any action on your part during this period of probation cause the issuance of a written warning for any reason, you shall be terminated from Pottsville Bleach and Dye immediately and irrevocably. Or, if, during the term of your probation and as a result of Company analysis, your job performance should produce an excess of seven percent (7%) rework in any one (1) week period, you shall be terminated immediately and irrevocably. Since you admitted during the January 11 meeting that you totally understand circumstances surrounding conditions of employment for an employee on a Final Warning and probationary period, you shall be held accountable during this entire period.

Downey's probation was the subject of an unfair labor practice charge filed by the Union but dismissed by the Acting Regional Director 29 March 1985 and is not contested by the General Counsel here.

On 26 September 1985 Downey made an error that resulted in 26 rolls of cloth being dyed the wrong color and, according to the terms of his probation, was discharged. The judge found the error was caused by Downey's admitted failure to follow work instructions, and "without more, there appears to be cause for Respondent's discharge of him, notwithstanding his union activities." The judge went on to find, however, that at the time of the discharge Plant Manager Horton praised Downey as a good worker, said it was a shame he had to be terminated, that he would get a good reference, and that "it was just too bad that [Downey] didn't obey the philosophies and policies of the company."

The judge found this praise indicated that Downey's error "may have been a mere pretext for his discharge" (emphasis added), and noted that the Respondent's treatment of Downey was much harsher than that of other employees involved in errors requiring the reworking of significant orders. Although the judge mentioned the fact that Downey, unlike the other employees, was on probation with notice that any further problem would subject him to discharge, he nevertheless concluded that the Respondent would not have disciplined him in the absence of his union activities, citing Horton's statement to Downey regarding his failure to follow the Respondent's "philosophies and policies."

It is axiomatic that an employer's discharge of an employee violates Section 8(a)(3) and (1) only when the discharge is motivated by the employee's protected union activities.[1] Pursuant to Section 10(c) of the Act, the General Counsel has the burden of proving that the discharge was unlawfully motivated. Under the procedural framework set forth by the Board in Wright Line,[2] the General Counsel must first establish that an employee's protected activity was a motivating factor in the employer's decision to discharge him.

In my view, the General Counsel has failed to meet that burden. Thus, the only evidence of union animus set forth by the General Counsel arose out of prior cases involving this employer, and an unfair labor practice charge that was dismissed once by the Region and again on appeal to the office of the General Counsel. The General Counsel attempted to introduce "newly discovered" evidence as background material relating to the charge but concedes that the lawfulness of the probation is not at issue.[3]

It is undisputed that the Respondent was aware of Downey's union activities for at least 6 years prior to his discharge. Thus, Downey was an open and active union supporter who served as steward in 1979–1980, observed in Board-conducted elections in 1980 and 1982, solicited authorization cards in 1982, and was active in Teamsters campaigns in 1984 and 1985. During this period of time, when Downey was, by his own admission, the "leading union activist" at the facility, the Respondent had ample opportunity to discharge him. In June 1984 he was put on probation for excessive absenteeism, a warning that was never alleged to be pretextual. While on probation he committed an error necessitating the rework of nine lots but, rather than discharging him, the Respondent issued him a new final warning. This was the probation that became the subject of the aforesaid unfair labor practice charge. The Respondent testified without contradiction that in January 1985 Downey had the worst redye record of any employee in the memory of the plant management. Clearly, if the Respondent's desired end was to rid itself of Downey it could easily have done so at that time.

Yet the majority gives little weight to Downey's failure to follow work rules despite the fact that the January 1985 probation was found lawful. In denying the appeal of the charge's dismissal the General Counsel relied on the fact that "the Employer traced back its production process in order to determine which employee had administered the various chemicals which had resulted in the bad dye lots." The General Counsel found no evidence of disparate treatment towards Downey in the issuance of the final warning.

The crucial, uncontroverted fact in this case is that during the period of this second probation Downey again made a major error, resulting in 26 rolls of cloth being dyed the wrong color. My colleagues find disparate treatment in the Respondent's discharging Downey pursuant to the terms of his probation while failing to discipline other employees who were not on such probation when they committed errors. The two situtations are not comparable.

Finally, the judge relied chiefly on Plant Manager Horton's statement to Downey at the time of his discharge that Downey had not followed "the philosophies and policies" of the Company to support a finding that Downey's discharge was a pretext for the Respondent's true motive of ridding itself of a union supporting troublemaker. The record does not support his conclusion. In July and August 1985 the Respondent embarked on a campaign to resolve employee production problems and enhance company productivity. To that end, in September 1985 the Respondent distributed written procedures to avoid errors. The rules called for employees to check each price number of each roll of material against each piece listed on an order sheet. Although Downey admitted receiving the instructions document, he chose to ignore it and, in the incident that led to his discharge, checked only 1 roll out of 27 against the customer order sheet. As a result, the remaining 26 rolls were dyed the wrong color. Clearly, Downey, who was on probation for careless work, was not an employee who simply "made a mistake," but one who continually disregarded the Company's urgent efforts to improve production. By failing to follow procedures specifically designed to eliminate rework, Downey demonstrated that he had no interest in the Company's concern over wasted worktime and production.

It follows logically that Horton's statement that Downey was not following the Company's philosophies and policies" referred precisely to that: the Respondent's repeated efforts to get Downey to [3] Although I do not agree that union animus was a factor in the Respondent's decision to discharge Downey, it is well established that absent a showing of unlawful motivation, the General Counsel's burden will not be met solely by proof of union animus. Thus, an employer is not barred from disciplining a prounion employee for just cause simply because the employer has exhibited some union animus. See *NLRB v. A & T Mfg. follow instructions and avoid costly errors were being frustrated. Downey's admitted negligence ran counter to the Respondent's goals and resulted in his discharge. In my view, the record taken as a whole provides no basis for the majority's finding an unlawful motive for the discharge over the lawful one set forth by the Respondent.[4] As noted above, in establishing an 8(a)(3) violation, the General Counsel must show the protected conduct was a motivating factor in the Respondent's decision to take adverse action. More than "suspicion"[5] is needed. The General Counsel's case falls far short of this requirement. I therefore dissent.

DECISION

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. On 2 October 1985, employee Ronald Downey was terminated by Respondent Pottsville Bleaching and Dyeing Company. The complaint alleges that his termination violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.[1] Respondent denies that it was, contending that Downey was subject to a final warning letter, dated 14 January 1985, which placed Downey on probation for 1 year and stated: "Should any action on your part during this period of probation cause the issuance of a written warning for any reason, you shall be terminated from [Respondent] immediately and irrevocably."

I find, as Respondent admits, that Respondent is a Pennsylvania corporation engaged in the bleaching and dyeing of tubular fabrics at its Port Carbon, Pennsylvania facility.[2] During the year preceding the issuance of the complaint, Respondent received more than $50,000 for services performed on the goods of customers located directly outside Pennsylvania, which goods are shipped from and returned to the customers. I conclude that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.[3] I also conclude, as Respondent admits, that the Teamsters is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

Downey was an active supporter of labor organization in Respondent's Port Carbon facility. In 1979–1980, he was the steward for the independent union which represented the production and maintenance employees. When the Textile Workers Union attempted to organize those employees in 1980, he was an observer in the Board-conducted election. When the Teamsters tried to organize in 1982, Downey solicited union authorization cards, distributed pamphlets, and was an observer at elections held in March and December 1982. He participated in another Teamsters campaign in 1984 by handing out cards and pamphlets and talking with employees, and he was an alternate observer in another election that year. Again, in late 1984 and early 1985, he was active in enlisting support for the Teamsters, although he was disabled with a broken ankle when the election was held in March 1985.[4] After he voted in that election, Downey stopped on his way out to talk to another employee. Richard Horton, Respondent's plant manager of its Port Carbon facility, told Downey to "get the hell out of the plant," but Horton permitted another employee, also on disability leave, to speak to other employees. Furthermore, Downey was a witness in both prior unfair labor practice proceedings.

Thus, there is sufficient evidence to impute to Respondent knowledge of Downey's union support for at least 5 years, but there is even more here. At an employee meeting held in October 1984, Horton stated that he could not afford to have any union problems whatsoever and turned to Downey, saying: "Do you understand that, Ron?"[5] On 14 January 1985, Horton issued a warning letter to Downey that read, in part, as follows:

> It was pointed out and by your own admission, you produced 40-percent bad work on your dye machines during the period from January 2, 1985 through January 8, 1985. The performance is unlike any that can be recalled at Pottsville Bleach and Dye. Others running similar machines producing similar work, or on the same machine, but another shift, did not produce, in the least, the amount of rework you were responsible for during the period in question, or at any time outside of said period. Since you offered no mitigating reasons for your poor performance, the Company had no alternative but to initiate the following conditions for your continued employment:
> You are being issued a Final Warning for these incidents of poor quality performance, which immediately places you on a one (1) year probationary period. Your probationary period commences Friday, January 11, 1985 and concludes on Friday, January 10, 1986. It is extremely important, and please be advised that during this probationary

Or, if, during the term of your probation and as a result of Company analysis, your job performance should produce an excess of seven percent (7%) rework in any one (1) week period, you shall be terminated immediately and irrevocably. Since you admitted during the January 11 meeting that you totally understand circumstances surrounding conditions of employment for an employee on a Final Warning and probationary period, you shall be held accountable during this entire period.
> This decision was based on a series of self-initiating events of poor quality performance on your part. Termination was not initiated for these incidents because of the ambiguity of the conditions of your current probationary period. Consequently, this decision shall not set precedent, nor shall it prejudice future cases of similar nature.[6]

The Teamsters filed an unfair labor practice charge (Case 4–CA–14808–3) to protest this warning. It was dismissed on 29 March 1985 by the Acting Regional Director, who wrote:

> The investigation disclosed that the Employer issued a written warning to Ronald Downey and extended his probationary status for one year after he produced five bad dye lots in a period of five days. It was noted that Downey was not discharged, and the evidence established that other employees have been disciplined for similar offenses. Under such circumstances, the Board has held that an employee may be lawfully disciplined, even if the employee has also engaged in union activities or testified in a Board proceeding. See P.G. Beland Paint City, Inc., 199 NLRB 927; Wright Line, A Division of Wright Line, Inc., 251 NLRB 1083. Accordingly, I am refusing to issue complaint as to the Section 8(a)(3) and (4) portions of the charge.

The Office of Appeals affirmed this dismissal on 29 April 1985, finding that Respondent "had traced back its production process in order to determine which employee had administrated the various chemicals which had resulted in the bad lots" and that "the evidence failed to establish that [Respondent] engaged in disparate treatment."

The General Counsel does not contest the legitimacy of this dismissal, relying as it does on Wright Line,[7] which permits Respondent, despite a showing that its discipline was illegally motivated, to prove that it would have taken the same action against Downey based on lawful considerations. But the General Counsel also introduced evidence, as background for Respondent's motivation in the proceeding, to prove that there was more to the discipline of Downey than was considered by the Region and the Office of Appeals. Employee Frederick Powers testified that in late winter, in January, February, or March 1985, he happened on a black looseleaf folder, bearing the name on the cover "Richard Flagg," the then Port Carbon plant superintendent, in which the following appeared:

> Q. Could it have been caused by bad water?
> A. Yes.
> Q. Can we prove that the bad coppering was Downey's fault?
> A. Depending on the investigator's knowledge.
> Q. Can I fake my way through this?
> A. Yes.

This newly discovered evidence, of course, implies that Respondent not only purposefully attempted to blame Downey for the bad dye lots but also schemed to prove that the bad dye lots resulted from his error, rather than their being caused by "bad water." Thus, both the reason for the production error and the perpetrator of the error were concocted, demonstrating that Respondent was prepared to use anything at its disposal to rid itself of Downey; and I am asked to extend this to a finding that the reason that Respondent desired to discipline Downey in October 1985 was his union activities.

On the other hand, the General Counsel on numerous occasions during the hearing repeated his position that he was bound by the findings of the Regional Office and was not arguing that the 14 January 1985 probation was tainted. Indeed, I find sufficient support in the record that Downey's work in the week commencing 2 January 1985 was as bad as Respondent claimed, that there were five bad lots constituting 40 percent of the bad lots produced in that period, and that others who prepared other bad lots were given oral warnings.[8] Furthermore, Respondent called Richard Flagg as a witness, and Flagg testified that he maintained no such looseleaf folder and that he never wrote what was imputed to him.

I do not credit his testimony. In weighing the testimony, I find that Flagg had much to gain in supporting his denials and that he was in early 1985 conducting a study of work that was improperly performed in the facility.

[6] On 19 June 1984, Respondent issued the following letter to Downey:

> The Company Work Rules state that a Final Warning places an employee immediately on twelve months' probation. It also states that any further violations during the twelve month period of probation will result in immediate discharge. Please keep this warning uppermost in your mind.

There was enclosed a copy of Downey's absenteeism record. Horton testified that he did not discharge Downey for the January 1985 incidents because his counsel advised that the June warning was ambiguous in its reference to Downey's record of absenteeism.

[8] Under Respondent's disciplinary system, the first warning is an oral warning, which is, notwithstanding its description, written and placed in the employee's file. The second warning is written. The next warning is a final warning, following which is a discharge for any further violation. This system is not strictly followed. Employee Norman Umphrey received five warnings before he was discharged. All but one were for bad work. In addition, his personnel file contains six notations for bad work for which he was not given written warnings.

Thus, it was not improbable that Flagg would have written what Powers stated. I further find that Powers, supported in part by employee George Chiccini, had little to gain from his testimony. It is true that Powers supported the Teamsters, which might give his testimony less weight; but he was also not friendly with Downey, with whom he had differences of opinion, on one occasion knocking a soda out of Downey's hand. Chiccini, who recalled that there were questions and answers but was unable to recall specifically what, testified he "glanced" over, was positive that he saw the book with Flagg's name on it, and remembered that it mentioned that Downey's "redyes" or "reruns" may have been caused by corroded water lines coming into the plant. Chiccini was not a Teamsters supporter, and both he and Powers believed that they could be in trouble because they looked at the book. With that fear, they, as current employees, would have no reason to fabricate their testimony about the existence of Flagg's book, which might get them in further trouble. The book was not produced, although subpoenaed by the General Counsel. The only explanation for its nonproduction was that it never existed. I credit the employees' testimony that it did exist, find that there was no credible reason that it was not produced pursuant to the subpoena, and credit the testimony of the two employees. Bannon Mills, 146 NLRB 611 (1964); Auto Workers v. NLRB, 459 F.2d 1329, 1338–1339 (D.C. Cir. 1972).

Notwithstanding the imputation of an illegal motive in the issuance of the 14 January 1985 warning, I am still bound to find that the warning would have been issued in any event. I turn then to the incident for which Downey was discharged. When Downey had recovered from his broken ankle, he was assigned as a dye opener. His duties included obtaining the raw material that was to be dyed. Each order was kept on a separate rack, which contained up to 35 rolls of cloth. The parties were at odds about what Downey was required to do once he received an order, which set forth the numbers of each roll required to fill the order. Inasmuch as the truckers at the Independence facility had separated each order and put the rolls for that order on a separate rack, each roll being marked on the outside with a roll number, Downey testified that his sole responsibilities were to check the rack number, to check one roll on the rack against the order sheet, and then to count the number of the rolls to ensure that the number on the order sheet matched. If that roll was on the sheet, the rest of the order should be on the rack. This testimony was corroborated by employee Daniel Daubert, who worked for 3 weeks as a dye opener in 1978 or 1980. To the contrary, Respondent's witnesses uniformly testified that Downey was to check each roll on the rack and check it off against each roll number on the order to ensure that no rolls were missing and that all rolls of cloth that were to be dyed were included in the order. Obviously, if an incorrect roll were dyed a different color, that roll would have to be redyed, an unnecessary expense for Respondent.

What happened on 26 September 1985 was that Downey checked only one roll on the rack and ascertained that the roll numbered 261770, which he opened, was part of the order number that was to be dyed navy blue. Downey's luck was bad. Out of 27 rolls on the rack, only the roll numbered 261770 was properly on the rack; the other 26 were part of another of the same customer's goods, which were to be dyed red. So, all the rolls were dyed navy blue.

I credit Downey, insofar as I find that he understood that it was his responsibility to match only one roll on the rack with the order. I discredit all testimony to the contrary,[9] noting that Respondent could have called a current employee to testify to the practice but did not do so. Nor did it call Downey's supervisor who, Downey testified, gave him that instruction. However, Downey admitted that, only a week before the incident, he was given instructions that required him to match all the 27 rolls and not select only one. His explanation that he did not realize that the opening procedure had been changed is no excuse; he admittedly did not follow the instructions and, without more, there appears to be cause for Respondent's discharge of him, notwithstanding his union activities. But, when he was discharged, Horton praised him as a good worker and said it was a shame that he had to be terminated, that Horton would give Downey a good reference, and that "it was just too bad that [Downey] didn't obey the philosophies and the policies of the company."

Not only does this praise, which was not denied by Horton, indicate that Downey's error may have been a mere pretext for his discharge, but also the General Counsel argues that Respondent's treatment of Downey was much harsher from the way it treated its other employees who, in the summer of 1985, were involved in two errors that involved the reworking of significant orders. One involved a bleaching, processing, dyeing, and finishing job for Argo of about one to three tractor-trailer loads of cloth, all of which was returned for being dirty and greasy. Employee Nelson Sims said that Horton met with all the finishing department employees on his shift, whom he told that Argo was not pleased and he was not pleased and that the stains should have been found out about before the goods left Respondent's facility. He complained particularly to the rollers and roller helpers; but, despite the fact that the employees got their "butts chewed out," Horton took no disciplinary action.

The second involved a job of dyeing, processing, fleecing, and cutting to order of sweatsuit material for Continental, who returned the goods because of pressure marks put on by the rollers. Sims and two others were summoned to Horton's office, where he told them that he was not happy and "all our jobs" (which, to Sims, meant him and his partner Underwood) were "on the line" for this mistake; but again no discipline was given.

The Continental job involved 8000–10,000 pounds of material; the Argo job, about 7000–8000 pounds. Although Horton testified that only 10 percent of the Argo job had to be reprocessed—and Horton testified that it was "very rare" to have a mistake of that magnitude—

[9] I was particularly unimpressed with Horton's demeanor, finding him at times unresponsive and his testimony inconsistent.

Daubert said that 240–300 rolls of fabric, about three-quarters of the order, had to be processed to remove the stains. Daubert knew firsthand what was actually done, and I credit him. Compared to those jobs was the one Downey erred on, which was less than 1000 pounds. In addition, Downey's job did not involve any rework. Horton consulted with his customer, who permitted Respondent to dye its other lot red, although it was originally intended to be navy blue. Thus, the General Counsel contends that Downey should not have been disciplined at all.

Horton agreed that he did not discipline any of the finishers; but he explained that the stains on the Argo job could not be detected while the fabric was being run through the machines, which run at 60 yards per minute, with steam coming out of the fabric. However, he admitted that there were stains or dirt on the outside of the rolls, that somebody should have noticed them, and that the finishing supervisors and operators were responsible. Yet, he testified that because he could not pinpoint who was to blame, he imposed no discipline, despite the fact he lectured the three shifts of the entire department and "raised the roof" about the quality of the job. He also stated that all the employees were "verbally warned," but he later amended that to "counseled"; and no formal writings memorializing oral warnings were put in any employee's file.

Horton also testified that the Continental job was the fault of no one. The customer had asked to inspect the work at Respondent's Independence facility. There, under brighter lights than at the Port Carbon facility, the customer turned the fabric over and discovered a slight impression on the back. Respondent agreed to refleece the fabric, and Horton explained that the employees would not have been able to see the impression because it was on the back of the fabric, they had not been told to turn the fabric over, and it would not have been seen in the more dimly lit room at Port Carbon. Horton testified that he talked with the employees to make them aware of how the problem arose and to look for the problem, but he did not consider the incident one that should have led to discipline.

That Horton summoned Sims and two other employees to his office, a fact not denied (but not remembered) by Horton, might have seemed threatening to Sims. And it may well be that Horton said something about "all our jobs being on the line," but it appears that Horton in his own way was simply calling to the employees' attention the fact that Respondent relied on good work to continue business with its customers and that they should be aware and look for this particular problem with the rollers. Indeed, Sims testified that he did not consider what Horton said as a warning or a threat that he might be fired. I do not find that the Continental errors, if errors of the employees they be, rather than errors caused by Respondent's machines, represented the type of incident from which disparity may be claimed. Rather, Horton found that the solution for the type of fabric being rolled was to use a different machine, which had rollers that did not make the larger impression that Continental had complained about. Thus, counseling, rather than discipline, was called for and was given.

The errors committed on the Argo job present a more serious claim. Those who shipped the fabric with dirt and grease stains on the outside of the rolls were as culpable as Downey. There were employees who could have been identified and were identified and should have been disciplined. Horton admitted that the fault lay with the finishing supervisors and finishing operators, yet they were not disciplined.

It is true that Downey was on notice that he was subject to a year's probation and that any further problem would subject him to discharge. Nonetheless, Downey did not match up all the rolls of fabric with the order. His failure to perform cannot be excused solely because he was also a union activist. But I am not persuaded that Respondent would have disciplined him in the absence of his union activities.[10] I cannot dismiss lightly Horton's final statements to him that it was because he did not obey Respondent's "philosophies and policies" that he was discharged. Those "philosophies and policies," I find, were different from the "written rules" and "instructions" that Downey was accused of violating. None of the rollers or finishers on the Argo job was accused of violating Respondent's "philosophies and policies," which equate with Respondent's anti-Teamsters attitude and Downey's pro-Teamsters sentiments. Furthermore, Horton's praise of Downey as a good worker is inconsistent with the defense that Downey was fired as a result of his bad work.[11] I find disparity here and find that Downey's error, which subsequently proved to be innocuous and harmless, was utilized as a pretext for his discharge. If Downey had not been an active Teamsters supporter, he would have been treated as lightly as were the employees who worked on the Argo fabric and caused Respondent to reprocess that job.[12] I can find no reason for his discharge other than his union activity. I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

The unfair labor practice found above, occurring in connection with Respondent's business, has a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tends to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and [10] The General Counsel also contends that the trucker or warehouseman who placed the rolls of fabric on the rack should have been disciplined but Horton conceded that he was not. On the one hand, Downey was the one to check that the trucker or warehouseman did not make a mistake and he did not do what he was paid to do. On the other hand, the trucker or warehouseman made a mistake, and Horton did not investigate that mistake and obviously made no recommendation of disciplinary action.

[12] Respondent contends that it evidenced no union animus because in the past it promoted certain employees who were known Teamsters adherents. Respondent conveniently forgets that the Board has recently twice found Respondent in violation of the Act in 275 NLRB 1236 and 277 NLRB 988. See also Jacobo Marti & Sons, Inc., 264 NLRB 30 fn. 1 (1982), which relies on earlier findings to demonstrate union animus.

Respondent also contends that, if its reason for taking action against Downey was based on his union activities, it could have terminated him earlier. I find that merely because it waited does not negate its animus. Indeed, Horton thought of dismissing Downey earlier, but found that he could not utilize the first final warning for absenteeism because Respondent's attorney advised that that warning was limited to absenteeism and was thus "ambiguous."

the free flow thereof within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having concluded that Respondent unlawfully engaged in an unfair labor practice, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action. Specifically, I shall order Respondent to offer Ronald Downey full and immediate reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for or any loss of wages or other rights and benefits he may have suffered as the result of the discriminaton against him in accordance with the formula prescribed in F. W. Foolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as provided for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[13] I shall also order Respondent to remove from its records any reference to Downey's unlawful discharge and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of his unlawful discharge will not be used against him in any way. The General Counsel has requested that my recommended Order include a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board to engage in discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure so that it will be able to monitor compliance with the Board's order, if enforced by a court of appeals. I am unpersuaded that existing procedures are inadequate to ensure compliance, especially where the order provides only for the reinstatement and payment of backpay for one employee.

On the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law and the entire record in this proceeding,[14] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified, and my consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, and pursuant to the provisions of Section 10(c) of the Act, I hereby issue the following recommended[15]

ORDER

The Respondent, Pottsville Bleaching and Dyeing Company, Port Carbon, Pennsylvania, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against its employees because they engaged in activities on behalf of Teamsters Union Local No. 115, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America or any other labor organization.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate reinstatement to Ronald Downey to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of pay or any other benefits he may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in accordance with the provisions set forth above in the remedy section.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Ronald Downey and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of his unlawful discharge will not be used against him in any way.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other documents necessary to analyze and compute the amounts due hereunder.

(d) Post at its Port Carbon, Pennsylvania facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[16] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 4, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately on receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps have been taken to comply.

[14] Respondent moved to amend the official transcript in certain respects. There being no opposition, the motion is granted and the transcript is amended accordingly.

[15] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[16] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

30 March 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 13 January 1983 Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order, as modified.

1. The amended complaint alleges, inter alia, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by issuing employee Betty Gonzalez a written warning on 8 October 1980 because of her union activities. The judge found that the Respondent issued Gonzalez this warning because she had attended a meeting held on 7 October 1980 at the National Health Service Corps at which the Federal employees assigned to the Respondent were reminded that they were not entitled to engage in strike activity. The judge also found that Gonzalez obtained permission from the Respondent's medical director to go to the meeting and that she had attended in her capacity as a member of the employees' Staff Association in order to counsel or assist the Federal employees. The judge, however, concluded that these Federal employees were not employees within the meaning of the Act and therefore that Gonzalez' activity was not protected concerted activity as she was not acting in concert with individuals defined as "employees" within the meaning of the Act. Accordingly, he dismissed this portion of the amended complaint.

We agree with the judge's dismissal of this complaint allegation. In doing so, however, we rely on the following. The record shows that Gonzalez sought permission to attend the meeting from the Respondent's medical director, Dr. Salomon,[3] who supervised Gonzalez with respect to her medical duties, rather than from Margaret Joyiens, the Respondent's executive secretary, who supervised her regarding administrative and personnel matters. Further, the record shows that Dr. Salomon also told Gonzalez to speak to Joyiens regarding her request to attend the meeting, which Gonzalez did not do. The Respondent issued Gonzalez a written disciplinary warning because, as stated in the warning, she failed to follow procedures for requesting leave. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent did not violate the Act when it issued Gonzalez the warning. We find no evidence that Gonzalez' warning was related to her union activities. Accordingly, we shall dismiss this allegation of the complaint.

2. The amended complaint also alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act when it discharged, and thereafter refused to reinstate, employee Burns. The record shows that Burns was discharged following the Respondent's decision to close the Health Connection (a clinic affiliated with the Respondent and at which Burns was employed) due to a lack of funding. Noting that the Health Connection had been closed due to legitimate, economic considerations, the judge found that Burn's discharge did not violate the Act. The judge also rejected the General Counsel's contention that the Respondent further violated the Act when it failed and refused to reinstate Burns. In support of this contention, the General Counsel presented testimony from Burns regarding remarks made to her by the Respondent's project director, Ramos. According to Burns on 30 September 1980, she received a letter informing her that the Health Connection program had been suspended due to lack of funding, that her position there had been retrenched, and that she was terminated, effective 2 October 1980. At the time she received the letter, Ramos told her that he felt "betrayed" by the employees' walkout[4] and that if she "didn't participate

[1] The General Counsel and the Respondent have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings, except as discussed herein.

[2] Our decisions in Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), and Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986), clarified the principles under which the Board may, in exercising its discretion, decline to assert jurisdiction over an employer because of its relationship to an entity exempt from our jurisdiction. Here, however, there were no exceptions to the judge's finding that the Board should assert jurisdiction over the Respondent. Thus we need not pass on the discretionary jurisdictional issue in this case. See, e.g., Gateway Motor Lodge, 222 NLRB 851 (1976).

Member Stephens finds, on the present record, that statutory jurisdiction exists, and in view of the Respondent's failure to raise any issue of discretionary jurisdiction, he finds it unnecessary to review this case. See his opinion, concurring and dissenting, in Res-Care, Inc., supra.

[3] The name of the Respondent's medical director appears as Dr. "Solomon" in the judge's decision. The correct spelling as based on the record, including her signature, appears to be "Salomon."

[4] The record shows that on 27 August 1980 the Respondent's employees held a meeting to discuss their concerns over working conditions and that Burns, then on sick leave, attended the meeting over Ramos' strenuous objections. The employees thereafter formed the Staff Association and presented their demands regarding working conditions to the Re-with the other workers in . . . what was going on that when they reopened the Health Connection that [she] could come back." The judge found that although Ramos did not specifically deny making this statement, Burns' testimony was "too highly improbable" to be credited in light of evidence that the decision to close the Health Connection was of a permanent nature. Thus, he found no violation.

As demonstrated above, the judge did not base his findings on his observations of the witnesses' demeanor or conduct at the hearing. Rather, he based his findings on his assessment of the inherent improbability that the statement Burns attributed to Ramos was made. The Board has held that, in contrast to evaluating demeanor or the conduct of a witness, the judge is in no better position than the Board to assess inherent probabilities of testimony, and that the Board is not bound by credibility determinations based on such assessments.[5] Here, we find that the fact the Respondent knew the decision to close the Health Connection was permanent does not preclude a finding that Ramos told Burns that if she did not participate in employee union activity, she could be rehired when the Health Connection reopened. We note that Burns' testimony stands uncontradicted in the record and further that Ramos was involved in both employee Zayerz' unlawful discharge, which occurred prior to this incident involving Burns, and in employee Garcia's unlawful discharge, which occurred approximately 8 days after Ramos' comment to Burns. In light of the above, and contrary to the judge, we credit Burns' testimony on this point and further find that the statement violated Section 8(a)(1).[6] As there is no evidence, however, that the Health Connection ever reopened, there can be no unlawful refusal to reinstate Burns to that facility, or to offer her reinstatement there as alleged in the complaint and, accordingly, we dismiss this complaint allegation regarding Burns.

3. Finally, the amended complaint alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) when it discharged employee Pacheco for engaging in a strike on 27 October 1980. The judge, however, found that the strike on 27 October was unprotected because the employee Staff Association, which the judge had found to be a labor organization, had failed to give the Respondent 10 days' notice of its intent to strike as required by Section 8(g) of the Act. He further found that the proximate cause of the strike, i.e., the transfer of the Federal employees, was not an unfair labor practice; that the earlier discharge of employees Gonzalez, Feliciano, and Morales was also not an unfair labor practice; and that the unfair labor practice which he had found here and which occurred prior to the strike, i.e., the discharge of employee Garcia, did not constitute such a "serious or flagrant" unfair labor practice to excuse the Staff Association's failure to tender the requisite notice.

We agree that Pacheco's discharge was lawful but do so for the following reason. We find that the strike was not an unfair labor practice strike and we agree with the judge that the failure to give the 8(g) notice made it an unprotected strike. With regard to the nature of the strike, as the judge noted, the evidence shows that the decision to strike on 27 October was initially prompted by the transfer of Federal employees on 24 October and was possibly reinforced by the discharges of employees Gonzalez, Feliciano, and Morales on the same date. In agreement with the judge, however, we have not found these transfers or discharges to be unlawful. Further, there is no evidence to establish a causal relationship between the unfair labor practices that we have found (i.e., the discharges of Garcia and Zayerz,[7] and the 8(a)(1) statements to Burns) and the employees' decision to go on strike on 27 October. On this basis, we find that the strike was an economic strike for which the employee Staff Association failed to give the proper 8(g) notice and thus the Respondent did not violate the Act when it discharged Pacheco for engaging in the strike.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Insert the following as Conclusion of Law 5 and renumber the remaining conclusions of law accordingly.

"5. The statement to Burns that if she did not participate in the Staff Association's activities, she could be rehired when the Health Connection reopened constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law spondent on 3 September. On 9 September employee Zayerz was formally notified that he was being terminated. The employees' walkout, in protest of his discharge, took place on 10 September.

[6] Although this statement was not alleged as an independent 8(a)(1) allegation, we find it properly before us as it is sufficiently related to the complaint allegation regarding the Respondent's discharge and failure to reinstate or to offer to reinstate Burns. We also find that this matter was fully and fairly litigated at the hearing, particularly where the record shows that the statement was made coincident with Burns' discharge. Photo-Sonics, Inc., 254 NLRB 567 fn. 2 (1981).

[7] The judge inadvertently erred in stating that he had found that only one unfair labor practice (i.e., the discharge of employee Garcia) had occurred before the 27 October strike. The judge had also found the discharge of Zayerz in September to be unlawful.

judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Betances Health Unit, Inc., New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Insert the following as paragraph 1(b) and reletter the remaining pargraph.

"(b) Telling employees that if they did not participate in Staff Association activities, they could be rehired when the facility at which they had been previously employed reopened."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(c).

"(c) Remove from its files any reference to the discharges of William Zayerz on 9 September 1980 and of Martin Garcia on 9 October 1980, and notify them in writing that this has been done, and that evidence thereof shall not be used as a basis for personnel actions against them."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, dissenting.

I would remand this proceeding for further consideration of whether the Board has jurisdiction over the Respondent. See Res-Care, Inc., 280 NLRB 670 (1986), and Long Stretch Youth Home, 280 NLRB 678 (1986).

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge employees because of their membership or activities on behalf of Betances Health Unit Staff Association or any other labor organization.

WE WILL NOT tell employees that if they do not participate in Staff Association activities they could be rehired when the facility, at which they were previously employed reopened.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Martin Garcia full and immediate reinstatement to his former position of employment or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make him and William Zayerz whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, with interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any references to the discharges of William Zayerz on 9 September 1980 and Martin Garcia on 9 October 1980, and notify them, in writing, that this has been done and that evidence thereof shall not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

BETANCES HEALTH UNIT, INC.

David E. Leach III, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Martin Schaum, Esq., of Mineola, New York, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me on 9 days during April and May 1982. The charge in this proceeding was filed on October 31, 1980, and a complaint thereon was issued by the Regional Director for Region 2 on April 30, 1981. Thereafter, an amended complaint was issued on May 20, 1981, and a further amendment was made during the hearing. The issues are:

1. Whether the Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, or whether jurisdiction should not be asserted because of its relationship with the Federal Government under the U.S. Public Health Service and the National Health Service Corps. Both of the named institutions are divisions of the United States Department of Health and Human Services, formerly part of the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

2. Whether the Betances Health Unit Staff Association, which was formed on August 27, 1980, is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Whether pursuant to a type of "poll" taken at a meeting on September 3, 1980, the Respondent became aware of the Staff Associations' majority status so as to require it to recognize and bargain with the Association as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of certain of its employees in separate units of professional and nonprofessional employees.

4. Whether, on September 3, 1980, at the aforesaid meeting, the Respondent gave the impression that the union and protected concerted activities of its employees were being kept under surveillance.

5. Whether, at the aforesaid meeting of September 3, 1980, the Respondent unlawfully notified its employee William Zayerz that his employment was being terminated because of his activities on behalf of the Staff Association. Also at issue is whether Zayerz was an employee of Respondent or an independent contractor, and whether his subsequent discharge on September 9, 1980, violated Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.

6. Whether about October 1, 1980, the Respondent unlawfully laid off Jini Tannenhouse, Anna Burns, and Dr. Alan Berkman because of their union and protected concerted activities. The General Counsel alternatively alleges that these layoffs were unlawful because they were made without prior notice to and bargaining with the Staff Association. Additionally, there is an issue about whether Dr. Berkman was an employee or an independent contractor.

7. Whether on October 8 and 9, 1980, the Respondent issued a disciplinary warning to Betty Gonzalez and discharged Martin Garcia because of their union and protected concerted activities.

8. Whether about October 22, 1980, the Respondent unlawfully caused the Federal Government to transfer certain Federal employees from the facility of Betances because of their union and protected concerted activities. The employees in question are Dr,. Patricia Solomon, Patricia Gleaton, and Ana Paez. Concerning this allegation, it is noted that the three individuals involved were Federal Government employees who were assigned to work at the Respondent. It also is noted that there is no doubt that regarding Patricia Gleaton and Ana Paez the Respondent sought their transfers because they participated in strikes and walkouts on September 10 and October 1, 1980. With respect to Dr. Solomon, the evidence indicates that the Respondent sought her transfer because it believed that she supported the strike of October 1, 1980. Dr. Solomon, during that period of time, was part of the management of Betances.

9. Whether the discharges of Betty Gonzalez, Nancy Feliciano, and Elva Morales, about October 24 and 25, 1980, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

10. Whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act when it discharged Deborah Pacheco about November 1, 1980. In this respect, it is not disputed that Pacheco was discharged, at least in part, because she participated in a strike that commenced on October 27, 1980. However, as it is conceded that no 8(g) notices were given, there is an issue about whether her discharge was therefore privileged.

11. Whether the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act when it temporarily closed its facility from mid-November 1980 to January 26, 1981, without first having given notice to and affording the Staff Association an opportunity to bargain about that decision.

Based on the entire record in this proceeding, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after considering the briefs filed by counsel, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Betances Health Unit, Inc. is a not-for-profit New York corporation which operates a health clinic on Manhattan's lower east side. The services involved include diagnosis, consultation, and the prescriptions of treatment including medication. Care is administered by various types of health care professionals including physicians, physician's assistants, and nurse practitioners. Basically, the facility is a subsidized group medical office and would qualify as a health-related facility within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

Annually, the Respondent derives gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and purchases goods and materials valued in excess of $5000 directly from points located ouside the State of New York.

The Respondent's operations originated in 1968 as a health project sponsored by the Judson Memorial Church to handle the health problems of a transient youth population located in Greenwich Village. At that time, the project was completely funded by private grants. By 1970, however, the project's administrators took it over from the church and established a health screening facility. (E.g., it offered tests for the detection of tuberculosis and other diseases). By 1973, a corporation was formed and, thereafter, the Employer changed from a screening facility to a primary care provider that could perform medical treatment as well as diagnosis. In late 1977, Betances applied for a Federal grant under Section 330 of the Public Service Health Act and such a grant was given in 1978. From that point on, about 60 percent of the money revenues received by Betances have come from the Federal Government. The remaining money came either from private grants, direct patient payment, medicare and medicaid reimbursements, or from insurance held by its patients. Additionally, a substantial portion of Betances' medical staff have been employees of the Federal Government who have been assigned, cost free, to Betances. In 1980 the value of such services was in excess of $100,000.[1]

As a recipient of Federal money, a variety of conditions and controls were placed on Betances by the Public Health Service. First, the project director of Betances (in this case Paul Ramos), must be approved by the Government. Second, pursuant to statute, the board of directors must be composed of persons who are representative of the community served. Third, the entire budget for Betances is subject to approval by the Government, which can and has set conditions on the amount of staff to be hired and the types of people to be employed.[2] Regard-

[1] Under the relevant statute, the National Health Service Corps., which employs these individuals, is supposed to be reimbursed for its services. However, it is possible for a facility like Betances to receive a waiver of such payments. In short, Betances has been alloted three to four health care professionals and has not had to pay for their services.

[2] For example, in the grant for the period from July 1, 1981, to May 31, 1982, the following conditions were placed on Betances:

(1) The two outreach workers shall be deleted from the budget.

(2) All vacant positions including the internist position may not be filled without prior Regional office approval.

ing the budget, Passer, the director of the division of health services delivery (a part of the U.S. Public Health Services), testified that the Government "looks very critically at staff levels when we review an application. If, for example, we see too many people in one category, or if salaries are too high, or [they] left out an important discipline which we feel is necessary, we discuss with [the] project. We ask for explanations as to why they need for example, four medical assistants, and why they need four doctors if productivity is at such a level." He also testified that "if we grant money . . . our job is to moniter through [a] project officer, to see that they are carrying out the program . . . . They provide us with semi-annual reports as to whether they are productive, cost effective . . . we have the right, if we suspect problems, or on request of the granter, to go in and monitor the project on site and try to correct a situation."

In addition to the above, the Federal Government requires, as a condition of a grant, that health projects, after 2 or 3 years of operation, meet certain Federally mandated productivity levels. Basically these are that the facility's physicians are required to average 4200 medical encounters per year and that nonphysician providers (i.e., physician assistants and nurse practitioners), are to average 2100 medical encounters per year. As will be shown below, if the grantee does not come up to these minimum productivity levels, the Government will first reduce the amount of the next year's grant request and may thereafter refuse to grant any money at all. Obviously, in the case of a health unit that is dependent on Federal money for most of its income, the failure to receive a yearly grant would almost certainly be fatal to its existence.

Further, as a result of the somewhat unique situation at Betances, its medical director, Dr. Patricia Solomon, happened to be an employee of the National Health Service Corps. That is, although she had been employed directly by Betances prior to 1978, when Betances became eligible for assignees from that agency, Dr. Solomon became an employee of the National Health Service Corps. As medical director, Dr. Solomon was responsible for all of the medical services provided and supervised the staff that provided such services, whether they were employees of Betances or employees of the Federal Government. Also as medical director, Dr. Solomon was part of Betances' management team that consisted of herself, Paul Ramos, and Wanda Evans. As part of the management group, she assisted in the formulation of the budget, was involved in policy making, and attended regular meetings of management.

Although it appears that it is not usual for a medical director at these types of facilities to be a Government employee, this was the case at Betances. Accordingly, Dr. Solomon, as medical director, was responsible not only to Betances but was also responsible to her superiors in the Federal Government.

(3) No personnel identified in this budget may be used to provide services in any satellite or mobile facility . . . .

(4) The progress of the project will be evaluated for continuation purposes on January 1, 1982 and June 30, 1981. If Betances fails to be in full compliance by December 21, 1981 the project will not be continued.

Notwithstanding the above, there are facts that would mitigate against a conclusion that Betances was totally under the control of the Federal Government. Although the Government reviewed Betances' proposed budgets, it did not as a practical matter tell Betances what salaries or fringe benefits it should pay to its employees, provided that such salaries and benefits fell within broadly acceptable parameters. Second, although the Government appointed a project officer to monitor Betances' activities, the day-to-day operations were left to Respondent's own management. Third, although the Federal Government was vitally concerned with Betances' productivity levels, it nevertheless did not require Betances to take any specific action to deal with this problem and left its solution to Betances' management. (Unfortunately, Betances never did solve the problem and ultimately lost the Federal grants.) Fourth, although Betances' medical director, Dr. Solomon, was also a Federal employee, the evidence indicates that this was a matter of happenstance, and that insofar as she functioned as part of management, that role was, in reality, neither monitored nor supervised by her superiors in the Federal Government. Thus, as a person having two hats, it nevertheless seems that Dr. Solomon did not play her management role while wearing her Federal Government hat. Fifth, although the board of directors were required to be representative of the community, there is no evidence that they acted under the control or influence of the Federal Government. Finally, apart from those employees who were employed by the Federal Government (the NHSC assignees), there is no evidence to suggest that the Federal Government was involved in Betances' labor or personnel relations vis-a-vis its own staff.[3]

Section 2(2) of the Act exempts from Board jurisdiction "the United States or any wholly owned Government corporation, or any Federal Reserve Bank, or any State or political subdivision thereof." As a private corporation, the Board would normally assert jurisdiction over a health facility such as Betances assuming that it met the appropriate monetary standards established by the Board. The problem here, however, is whether jurisdiction should be precluded because of Betances' connection with the Federal Government, which by any definition cannot be described as insignificant.[4]

In National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979), a Board majority spelled out its test for determining whether jurisdiction should be asserted or denied in cases when the entity in question has ties to an institution that would be exempt under Section 2(2) of the Act. The Board stated:

> We see no need to examine the relationship between an employer and an exempt entity for which it performs services for some abstract "intimate connec> tion" which has no bearing on the employer's ability to bargain effectively with a labor organization as representative of its employees and which requires a meticulous and, in our view, superfluous analysis of the facts in order to ascertain whether in the Board's opinion the employer's service are essential to the purposes of the exempt entity, universally recognized as a government function, statutorily mandated or non-commercial in nature.

[3] Although not dispositive, the evidence shows that a number of other health facilities that are Sec. 330 grantees maintain collective-bargaining relationships with labor organizations that represent certain of their employees.

[4] As Betances' connection is with the Federal Government rather than a state government, it cannot be argued that Betances should be considered as a State political subdivision. Radio Free Europe, 262 NLRB 549 (1982).

> Accordingly, we conclude that the "right of control" test provides a more objective, precise, and definitive standard for determining discretionary jurisdictional issues than the "intimate connection" test.

As to the application of the "right of control" test, the Board made it plain that what it was concerned with was "whether the nonexempt employer retains sufficient control over its employees' terms and conditions of employment so as to be capable of effective bargaining with the employees' representative."

A recent case, Youth Guidance Center, 263 NLRB 549 (1982), will serve to illustrate the application of the Board's right-of-control test in circumstances very similar to those in the present case. In Youth Guidance Center, the employer was a private nonprofit corporation that operated a center that provided outpatient mental health services, including diagnosis, treatment, consultation, and educational services. Among the persons who provided these services were psychologists, psychiatrists, social workers, nurses, and teachers. Approximately one-third of its budget came from the Department of Mental Health of Massachusetts, the remainder coming from patient payments, third-party insurance, medicaid, and small private donations. In operating the clinic the center employed its own employees, but additionally the Commonwealth of Massachusetts assigned various state employees to work at the Center, including certain supervisory and managerial personnel. As the Board concluded that the employer nevertheless "controlled" the labor relations vis-a-vis its own employees, it held that the presence of state employees at the Center in supervisory and managerial roles, was not sufficient to warrant withholding jurisdiction. In this regard the Board stated, inter alia:

> In these circumstances, we conclude that the Association has not ceded control of its employees merely because some supervisors are employees of the Commonwealth inasmuch as these supervisors apply only Association-determined policy to Association employees, and thus are acting in this regard as Supervisors for the Association. Nor is the Association's control of its employees lessened because DMH [Department of Mental Health] makes site visits to the Center, and the Association files periodic reports or quality assurance evaluations to which DMH is entitled as a contracting agency. Consequently, such contracts do not constitute effective participation or day-to-day supervision of the Association's employees.

In view of National Transportation Service, supra, and Youth Guidance Center, supra, it is my opinion that Betances would meet the Board's right-of-control test for asserting jurisdiction. As there is no dispute about the fact that Betances meets the monetary standards for asserting jurisdiction over similar entities,[5] it therefore is concluded that Betances is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. It also is concluded that Betances is a health-related facility within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.[6]

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The second issue presented is whether the Betances Health Unit Staff Association (Staff Association) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. This question is of course a foundation issue regarding the 8(a)(5) allegation. It also is relevant to the issue of the discharge of Deborah Pacheco who was discharged about October 27, 1981, because of her participation in a strike that concededly was not preceded by the notices required by labor organizations pursuant to Section 8(g) of the Act.[7]

To the extent that it may be said that an organization came into existence, this occurred on August 27, 1980. As noted below, on this date certain employees of Betances met at the home of employee William Zayerz. At this meeting, there were nine employees in attendance, plus Federal employees Ana Paez and Patricia Gleaton and former employee Milagros Sanchez. It was established that the employees present decided to call themselves, collectively, the Staff Association and that they elected a grievance committee. Also, a set of demands were discussed for presentation to Betances on September 3.

The evidence shows that the Staff Association presented initial demands to management on September 3 and [6] Subsequent to the close of the hearing, I was advised by the General Counsel that on July 7, 1982, Betances was notified by the Public Health Service that no further grants would be made or given after October 31, 1982. I do not know what has since transpired.

[7] If the Staff Association is not a labor organization, it would be a simple matter to conclude that the discharge of Pacheco was violative of Sec. 8(a)(1) of the Act.

However, Sec. 8(g) provides that

> A labor organization before engaging in any strike, picketing, or other concerted refusal to work at any health care institution shall, not less than ten days prior to such action, notify the institution in writing and the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of that intention, except in the case of bargaining for an initial agreement following certification or recognition the notice required by this subsection shall not be given until the expiration of the period specified in clause (B) of the last sentence of Section 8(d) of this Act. The notice shall state the date and time that such action will commence. The notice, once given, may be extended by the written agreement of both parties.

Sec. 8(d) of the Act provides in pertinent part:

> Any employee who engages in a strike within any notice period specified in this subsection, or who engages in any strike within the appropriate period specified in subsection (g) of this section, shall lose his status as an employee of the employer engaged in the particular labor dispute, for the purposes of sections 8, 9, and 10 of the Act [Sections 158,159, and 160 of this title], but such loss of status for such employee shall terminate if and when he is reemployed by such employer.

presented revised demands on September 11. Among the demands was one calling for recognition of the grievance committee described above.

Subsequent to September 3, the group held a further election to replace certain people who originally were elected to the grievance committee. Also the grievance committee met with the Respondent on September 10 regarding the discharge of William Zayerz. It also engaged in strikes in furtherance of various of its demands.

Apart from the above, the evidence establishes that the Staff Association never had a constitution or bylaws, never kept minutes of its meetings, and never filed any reports with either the Federal or State Departments of Labor. It had no formal membership as such, as no person ever executed any type of document evincing their membership in the organization or their desire to have it represent them for collective-bargaining purposes. Also no dues or initiation fees were paid by any individual, and apart from those people who were elected to the grievance committee, no persons were elected to or occupied any officer positions in the organization. Indeed, no formal structure of any type existed.

Section 2(5) of the Act defines a "labor organization" as follows:

> The term "labor organization" means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.

Although not having any formal structure, it seems to me that the Staff Association was nevertheless an organization of a kind. In this regard, the Board has held that "formal structure or organization is not an essential requisite for finding a labor organization." Columbia Transit Corp., 237 NLRB 1196 (1978); Butler Mfg Co., 167 NLRB 308 (1967). It also is evident that employees have participated in this organization. Regarding its purpose, it is clear from the two sets of demands issued to the Employer and its actions since August 27, that the Staff Association has existed for a purpose of representing employees concerning grievances, labor disputes, or conditions of work. That such purposes have not come to fruition would not bar a conclusion that it was a labor organization. Litton Business Systems, 199 NLRB 354 (1972). Nor barring such a conclusion is the fact that it never filed documents with the Department of Labor, such filings being relevant only when and if the Staff Association becomes the collective-bargaining representative of Respondent's employees. Comet Rice Mills, 195 NLRB 671, 674 (1972).

In view of the above, it is concluded that the Staff Association was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE OPERATIVE FACTS

A. Background

As noted above, a majority of the Employer's income is derived from the Federal Government. In the spring of 1980, Betances was notified by the Public Health Service that the full amount of its grant application would not be given. The amount granted was $325,000 as compared to $318,500 granted the previous year. However, the amount requested for the period from June 1, 1980, to May 31, 1981, was in excess of $450,000 and it appears that the principal reason for not granting the full amount requested was that the Public Health Service was not satisfied with the productivity of Betances. As noted above, Betances, pursuant to the Federal guidelines, was required to have a minimum of 4200 medical encounters per year per physician and 2100 medical encounters per year per midlevel practitioner. According to Benard Passer, it was his opinion that Betances had serious problems relating to productivity and cost per patient encounter. He testified that the physicians at Betances were less than minimally productive and that to solve the problem, Betances either had to reduce the number of physicians or to increase the number of patients coming to the Center. Arthur Fernandez, the Federal Government's project officer for Betances, testified that during the summer of 1980 there was serious consideration by his superiors for terminating all future grants to Betances because of the productivity situation.

As a result of the bad news, Paul Ramos held a meeting with the staff in May 1980 to discuss the budget situation and the productivity problems. At this meeting the employees were notified of the budget and productivity situation, but were told that it was not anticipated that anyone would be laid off. Also, the employees were urged to canvass the community to get community lobbying for additional money from the Government. In a memorandum to employees dated May 27, 1980, Ramos stated, inter alia:

> Most of you are also aware that Betances submitted an application for funding of our third year program on March 1, 1980. We requested $452,000 from the UHI for the FMP and $251,000 for the medical component. The total operating budget is $703,000. The remainder of the funds are generated by earned income (patient fees, Medicare and Medicaid, etc.) and private grants. I am happy to report that both applications have been approved and funded. The NHSC will continue funding of our four practitioners at the level requested by Betances. What I am not happy to report is that while the UHI application was approved (and recommended by an HEW Objective Review Committee for funding at the level requested) the final grant award will be $325,000 which is $127,000 less than what we need to operate Betances. In fact, the funds cannot even pay for the current staffing pattern and other costs such as rent, supplies, equipment, telephone, etc.

This memorandum is not intended to alarm anyone, staff or patients. It is the conviction of us all to fulfill our committment to serve the people with the best medical/social care we can. I am told that the actual level of funding is determined by several considerations including the amount of monies available and the number of programs requested. One other consideration is the productivity of the Unit (number of patients we serve) and its accurate reporting.

The funding problem, though presently serious, is not one that we cannot overcome. However, if a major reorganization of those problem areas does not correct the deficiency, the results are potentially devastating to staff and patients alike. Betances, unlike most other health programs, does not have a deficit (and never has in its 10 year history), has never had a payless pay day and has never laid off staff because of lack of funds. I'm determined not to let this happen now either. I'm sure you share this determination and the notion that tolerance, cooperation and the participation of us all is essential.

It is possible that midway through the program year we can receive a supplemental grant which can relieve the pressure but this is determined by several factors. They include an increase in patient volume, patient fee and Medicaid/Medicare collections, as well as an efficient management information system and its accurate reporting. This is the area that is the most deficient, thus the first order of business is to deal with this problem.

The entire program and its procedures, including medical, clerical and administrative functions must be closely re-examined. This process will take place in several phases and will begin immediately. This will be explained and discussed in detail in a subsequent memo. As far as funding from the private sector is concerned, there is additional good news. Since September, 1979, four private foundations (the Public Welfare Foundation, Booth Ferris Foundation, PBP Foundation and Surdua Foundation) have awarded grants to Betances as the result of proposals submitted to them. Betances has received a total of $63,500 to date. The money will be used toward administrative costs, patient care and especially for the Health Connection, which has historically suffered greater funding hardships than the Practice.

If it's any consolation to us all, it will be interesting to note that our funding problem is minor compared to that of most health programs, like community health centers and other UHI's that are also funded by the Feds. One center in the Bronx had to lay off over 30 staff workers because of declining patient enrollment and management problems. Still others have such huge deficits that they have had to default on their debts in order to maintain operations, thus losing their credibility in the purchasing community (which is always disastrous to the solvency of an agency). Betances, however, does not have to worry about a present deficit and it enjoys AAA credit rating in the financial community.

It therefore is apparent that notwithstanding Ramo's expression of guarded optimism to his employees in May 1980, it was increasingly evident, in light of Arthur Fernandez' testimony, that Betances stood at the brink of extinction.

In the early part of the summer of 1980, an employee named Milagros Sanchez was discharged at a separate facility of the Employer called the Health Connection.[8] Although the reason for her discharge is not relevant to this case, it does appear to have generated a degree of unease among some of the employees. Also, her discharge resulted in a series of anonymous letters, which, among other things, accused the administration of nepotism and "corrupt" practices. These letters also complained about "arbitrary firings" and the lack of a grievance committee or procedure at Betances. One of the letters was particularly accusatory of Roni Ramos, the wife of Paul Ramos, who worked at the Health Connection as a registered nurse. Ramos chose not to reply to these letters that were issued by "Les Comitte To End Worker Abuse."

Also during the summer of 1980, the management committee consisting of Paul Ramos, Wanda Evans, and Dr. Solomon, held a number of meetings to deal with the budget and productivity problems. According to Wanda Evans, it was the opinion of management, at that time, that the current staffing level could be maintained under the existing grant[9] if no salary increases were given and assuming that other sources of money (i.e., medicare, medicaid, third-party payments, and direct patient payments), met the projected levels set forth in the proposed budget. Thus, according to Evans, it was the consensus to defer making any hard decisions and to hope that Betances' request for a supplemental grant of $127,000 would be approved. According to Dr. Solomon (one of the General Counsel's principal witnesses), there also was discussion during the summer among the management group to the effect that if push came to shove, the Health Connection should be closed, that Zayerz' job was expendable,[10] and that of any practitioners had to be let go, then the ones selected for layoff would be those not paid by the Federal Government (i.e., Dr. Berkman and Jini Tanneshouse). Notwithstanding the fact that major decisions were deferred, the evidence does show that certain procedures were tightened up during the summer, especially in an attempt to control excessive absenteeism and tardiness.

[8] The Health Connection was a satellite facility located in a settlement house and was set up to provide certain health and welfare education services for adolescents.

[9] Evans testified that the request for $450,000 was in part to hire additional staff and purchase new equipment.

[10] Zayerz concedes that during the summer of 1980, Ramos suggested that as Zayerz had obtained a Masters of Social Work, he should apply to the National Health Service Corps so that he could be paid by the Government rather than by Betances. Zayerz also conceded that in August 1980, Ramos told him that there soon might not be funds available for his position.

B. Formation of the Staff Association and its Demands

On August 27, 1980, the staff decided to hold a meeting to discuss the situation at the Health Connection including the discharge of Milagros Sanchez. It appears that this meeting was also called, in part, to discuss some of the allegations contained in the anonymous letters. Anna Burns was invited to attend because she was employed at the location. (Burns was, however, absent for much of July and August because, as she put it, she had broken a finger on her left hand and she suffered pain after it had been set.) When Burns came to the meeting, Paul Ramos came into the room and strenuously objected to her presence. When the meeting broke up soon thereafter, a number of the employees went to Zayerz' home, where they decided to form a Staff Association and a grievance committee. According to Betty Gonzalez, the individuals who participated in this second meeting were herself, William Zayerz, Nancy Feliciano, Anna Burns, Lisa Garcia, Ann Rosado, Elba Gonzalez, Dr. Alan Berkman, Jini Tannenhouse, and former employee Milagros Sanchez. Ms. Gonzalez testified that in addition to forming the Staff Association, a grievance committee was elected and a set of demands were drafted for presentation to Betances on September 3, 1980.

In connection with the above, it is noted that no employees signed any kind of document evincing their membership in the Staff Association or evincing their intent to have the Staff Association represent them for collective-bargaining purposes.

C. The Meeting of September 3, 1980

Normally, general meetings are held in the first week of every month. Except for a few people who were absent on this day (Martin Garcia, Dr. Berkman, and Anna Burns), the entire staff and administration of Betances was present. Also present were Board Members Daniel Gonzalez and Bertrum Beck. During the meeting, either or both Beck or Ramos said that they heard that a set of demands was going to be presented. At this point, Deborah Pacheco read the demands that were as follows:

> We the staff demand that Paul Ramos and all other administrators at Betances begin to treat each and everyone of us with respect, dignity and consideration. The outrageous manner in which Paul Ramos acted towards our co-worker Ann Burns on the afternoon of August 27 was not an isolated incident. On numerous occasions Paul Ramos and/or other administrators have subjected staff to similar verbal abuse and/or intimidation. This and other forms of harrassment must cease now.
> We the staff demand that our co-workers: Ann Burns, Milagros Sanchez and Andres Rosado[11] be immediately reinstated, and a public apology be made to each individual and Milagros Sanchez receive back pay retroactive to the day of her unjust firing. We the staff believe that these firings were unjust and without recourse, and were motivated in an effort by Paul Ramos to protect Roni Sherman Ramos, the catalyst which led to this chain of events. We further believe that Roni Sherman Ramos' presence at Betances is a conflict of interest.
> We the staff demand that Roni Sherman Ramos no longer be employed at Betances. We the staff believe that Roni Sherman Ramos has been responsible for much of the turmoil and injustice at Betances and that these injustices are a direct result of her presence at Betances.
> We the staff demand the recognition of our Grievance Committee. The unjust firings and negative situations that have been created and allowed to flourish by the administration necessitated the staff to act in its own behalf. As such we have elected a committee composed of workers who will act in our behalf as liaison between administration and staff. Betances is a federally funded program and as such all funding information is a matter of public record, yet staff workers never know what the real situation is with the budget. The inconsistencies of the administration regarding hiring practices, raises, starting salaries, evaluations, payroll, personnel and other policies which have caused workers concern must be investigated by the Grievance Committee with the power to rectify all discrepancies.

After the demands were read by Pacheco, Bertrum Beck asked if the staff supported the demands. One of the employees, Grace Butler, said that she did not support them, whereupon Beck said that everyone who supported the demands should stand up. At this point William Zayerz objected and asked if immunity would be granted to those employees who supported the demands. Beck said yes. Zayerz then suggested that instead of indicating support for the demands by standing, those persons who opposed the demands should stand. Beck agreed and the "vote" was taken, in which those employees who were not in favor of the groups of demands stood up. According to Betty Gonzalez, of the people present, 13 stood up and 8 remained seated.[12] No tally was made and the vote was not broken down so as to separate which of the demands the people supported and which they did not. Also, the entire group, as a group, was asked to indicate their support or opposition to the demands and no distinctions were made between professional and nonprofessional employees or between supervisors and employees. Additionally, the Federal Government employees participated in the "vote."

[11] It appears that Anna Burns, as of September 3, 1980, was on suspension. It also appears that Andres Rosado had resigned in August.

[12] According to Gonzalez, the standees were Paul Ramos, Roni Ramos, Wanda Evans, Norita Zayas, Dr. Solomon, Paul Rivers, Margaret Joyiens, Carmen Altus, Grace Butler, Judy Statler, Lisa Garcia, Alloto Reyes, and Dr. Peter Alpert. She testified that those who remained seated were herself, Nancy Feliciano, Ana Paez (a Federal employee), Jini Tannenhouse, Patricia Gleaton (a Federal employee), Andrea Rosado, William Zayerz, Deborah Pacheco, and Elba Morales. As noted above, it appears that Dr. Berkman, Anna Burns, and Martin Garcia were not present.

Also at the meeting on September 3, 1980, Ramos, at some point after Zayerz spoke, told Zayerz that there was no more money for his position and that he therefore would no longer be employed.

D. Events Between September 4 and 11: the Discharge of William Zaryerz, the Strike of September 10, and the Staff Association's Revised Demands

Employee Martin Garcia testified that on September 4, Paul Ramos visited his home. He states that Ramos told him that he should watch his step, that Ramos had helped him in the past, and that Garcia should not go against him. Garcia states that he told Ramos that although he liked Ramos, he also liked the employees, and could not see Ramos doing bad things because that would not be right. According to Garcia, Ramos responded by saying, "If that's what you want." (Ramos did not controvert Garcia's testimony.)

On September 5 a group of the employees again met in the building where Zayerz lived and discussed their next step. At this meeting, Garcia was elected to be on the grievance committee. It was also decided that a strike would take place unless Zayerz' termination was retracted.

On September 9 Zayerz was formally notified that he was being let go. According to Zayerz, Ramos told him that there were no funds for his position and that he could not have Zayerz working because he was not loyal to Ramos. Zayerz states that Ramos told him that if Betances received more funds, he was not going to give them to someone who was disloyal. (It is possible, however, that Ramos' statement of disloyalty centered on the demand that Ramos' wife be terminated.) This conversation was not denied by Ramos. At this point, Zayerz was handed a letter by Ramos that read:

> This is to inform you that, effective Wednesday, September 10, 1980, your employment at Betances is terminated. The reason for this unfortunate decision is simply that Betances is no longer in a position to meet your fee as consultant.
> This past June we discussed the fact that your field placement from the School of Social Work at Stonybrook was over in May. I then informed you that Betances had been underfunded by the Federal government and, therefore, would not be able to employ you full time. Thus, your tenure could not be guaranteed beyond September 1, 1980. We verbally agreed that you would remain at Betances as a consultant in community relations until the beginning of September. In the interim, you would be completing application to the National Health Service Corps for an assignment here. Had you been accepted into the Corps and placed at Betances, they would have picked up the costs of your full time pay, as in the case of our practitioners. While we had hoped this would happen, unfortunately things did not work out.
> I have been in contract with the NHSC and they informed me that they do not have your application on file. Since you stated you in fact have submitted an application, I strongly suggest you follow up on this.
> The fact remains, however, that Betances is unable to continue the present arrangement for the reasons given herein.
> While your status here has been that of consultant, as such you are not entitled to separation pay. However, in recognition of your past service and committment to the organization, Betances will pay you through September 18, 1980.
> While I cannot make any specific committment at this time, if you look into the National Health Service Corps situation, we will give it every consideration when the time comes.

With respect to the contents of the above letter, I have indicated above at footnote 10, that Zayerz has conceded that during the summer, Ramos had told him that there might not be enough money for his position and that Ramos suggested that Zayerz make an application for employment with the National Health Services Corps. He denies, however, that he had been specifically told by Ramos that his employment would end in September.

On the morning of September 10, a group of employees met with Paul Ramos. The employees involved were Dr. Berkman, Ana Paez, Betty Gonzalez, Martin Garcia, and Nancy Feliciano. Dr. Berkman acted as their spokesman. According to Dr. Berkman, when the group asked for the reinstatement of Zayerz, Ramos said that he had been "retrenched" for economic reasons, and that this had been pending for some time. Dr. Berkman states that he reminded Ramos of the latter's assurances in May to the effect that there were not going to be any cutbacks despite the funding level. According to Dr. Berkman, the discussion became heated, whereupon Ramos said that Zayerz had betrayed him, that Ramos had taken Zayerz in when Zayerz needed a job, that Zayerz has been to his home, and that Zayerz was stabbing him in the back. When asked if Zayerz could at least be reinstated until the board of directors met, Ramos said no. At this point, according to Dr. Berkman, he told Ramos that the employees were going to strike and Ramos said that they could not do that. At the conclusion of the meeting, some of the employees went on strike. Included in the strikers were Federal employees Ana Paez and Patricia Gleaton.[13]

During the September 10 walkout, Danny Gonzalez, a member of the board, met with the strikers in an attempt to mediate the problem and get the people back to work. As a result of these meetings, it was agreed that Zayerz would be reinstated pending a meeting of the board of directors to be held on September 15. In consideration thereof, the strikers agreed to return to work. On September 11 all the strikers returned to work, including Zayerz. However, on September 10, Betances had contacted the National Health Services Corps to register a complaint about the participation in the strike by Federal employees Paez and Gleaton.

[13] The other persons who participated in the September 10 walkout were Betty Gonzalez, Nancy Feliciano, Elba Morales, Elba Gonzalez, Deborah Pacheco, Jini Tannenhouse, Jose Luces, and Dr. Berkman. Needless to say, employees of the Federal Government are prohibited from engaging in strikes. Postal Workers v. Postal Service, 110 LRRM 2704 (9th Cir. 1982). 5 U.S.C. § 7311.

According to Zayerz, when he returned to work on September 11, he had another conversation with Ramos. He testified that Ramos said, "You can't do this to me and get away with it." Zayerz also states that during this conversation Ramos accused him of being responsible for the anonymous letters previously described. Zayerz denied that this was so.

On September 11 the Staff Association revised its demands preparatory to the board of director's meeting to be held on September 15. The revised demands read as follows:

> We are taking worker-community control and demand the following:
> 1. Recognition of our Grievance Committee
> 2. The immediate termination of Roni Ramos from Betances and the Health Connection.
> 3. The reinstatement of the workers Milagros Sanchez and Andres Rosado.[14]
> 4. The immediate removal of Paul Rivers and that job be opened up and posted in the community.
> 5. The breaking up of the Administrative family click.
> 6. Opening up the Board to truly reflect our Community.
> Grievance Committee Members:
> Martin Garcia
> Alan Berkman
> Betty Gonzalez
> Ana Paez
> Nancy Feliciano
> Alternates:
> Billy Zayerz
> Debbie Pacheco

E. Events on September 15: Meeting Between Board of Directors and Employee Group; Letter Denying Request for a Supplemental Grant

On September 15 the board of directors of Betances, along with Paul Ramos, met with a committee of employees, whose spokesman was Dr. Berkman. At this meeting, Dr. Berkman asked for the reinstatement of Milagros Sanchez and William Zayerz. He also set forth the position of the Staff Association that Roni Ramos should be fired because of her alleged "destructive and divisive" role at the center.[15] At one point during the meeting, Ramos became angry and called Dr. Berkman an obscene name. Ramos was calmed down by Beck. In response to the Staff Association's demands set forth above, Board Member Gonzalez read a written document that stated, inter alia:

> The Board is, of course, cognizant of the recent difficulties at Betances and wants to do everything in its power to resolve those problems which gave rise to the current situation. Failing to radically improve the situation immediately may well result in the loss of Betances to the community. The Board knows it does not have to remind the staff how fragile a structure is one that depends in these times entirely on federal funds with an occasional grant from a foundation. . . .
> In respect to your demand that the grievance committee be recognized, we are basically sympathetic and will recognize a grievance committee. In order to move in this direction, we, of course, need to know, how the grievance committee is to be selected and whom it represents. We're sure you can appreciate the difference between the function of a grievance committee that might be representative of a portion of the staff and the function of a committee which represents the whole staff. We know you can appreciate the difference between a grievance committee that may be composed of persons who select themselves and a grievance committee selected by the entire staff. In summary, we will recognize a grievance committee that represents all staff excluding Executive Director, Medical Director and Fiscal Officer. The rights and responsibilities of such a committee can only be determined after there is greater clarity concerning the mode of election or selection and discussions between the Committee and the Board.
> In respect to the staff demand that the Board be truly reflective of the community, we are also responsive. An examination of the roster of the current Board will demonstrate that practically all of the members are representative of the community. There are only three persons who do not fall within that category and they are all former residents of the community. Our major source of funds sets up specific requirements concerning the composition of the Board and we are in full compliance with those requirements. At the proper time our Nominating Committee will be glad to entertain any suggestions of individuals who might be interested in serving on the Board.
> The Board regrets that the staff demands single out Ms. Roni S. Ramos as a particular target. The Board is deeply appreciative of the enormous contribution which Ms. Ramos has made to the evolution of Betances through the years, long before it was even possible to employ many of the people who are now working at Betances. The Board would view the loss to Betances of Ms. Ramos' services as a major loss. Therefore, the Board will not accede to the staff's demand that Ms. Ramos be terminated as an employee at Betances.

[14] As noted above, Milagros Sanchez had been discharged early in the summer of 1980. Andres Rosado, who worked at the Health Connection hall, resigned before the Staff Association was formed.

It is of some interest, although perhaps not relevant, that the revised demands track the demands made in the anonymous letters distributed in July and August 1980.

[15] It is not clear from this record whether Roni Ramos was a supervisor as defined in Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

In respect to Mr. Paul Rivers, the Board is unwilling to accede to the staff demand. Mr. Rivers is employed as a consultant in order that he may use his special skills and talents in the interest of Betances . . . . Management is held responsible not only by the Board but by the sources of funds for a certain level of performance. This accountability must be accompanied by certain prerogatives. Amongst these prerogatives is the right to hire for positions without tenure and for limited periods of time individuals who will work as consultants. Any permanent position will be posted for staff and community to apply.

In regard to Milagros Sanchez, the Board understands that management terminated Ms. Sanchez's employment because of questions of work performance. The staff believes that Ms. Sanchez was arbitrarily and unfairly dismissed . . . . Since one of the major tasks required of Ms. Sanchez was clerical skills as defined by the program needs, the Board proposes that if Sanchez wishes there be an objective evaluation of Ms. Sanchez's clerical skills. There are clerical tests readily available and clerical skills can be objectively measured. If Ms. Sanchez's skills are at a level appropriate for the position she held, then the Board would propose a settlement which would be based on the premises that there is not sufficient evidence to support management's contention. If, on the other hand, Ms. Sanchez's skills are found to be below the level required, it would be necessary to conclude that Ms. Sanchez is not able to perform within the job requirements. . . .

With respect to Mr. William Zayerz and the clinical staff walkout of September 10, 1980 the Board recognizes that the job action was a direct result of Mr. Zayerz's termination at Betances as a field placement. We have reviewed managements rationale (as stated in the letter of termination) for such termination as well as the operating budget for the current fiscal year. The Board agrees with management that there are insufficient funds to maintain Mr. Zayerz on the payroll beyond September 18, 1980. Thus, Mr. Zayerz's notice of termination still stands.

Staff is expected to be at their jobs on time performing their assigned duties. Any action on the part of any staff which stops or hinders the safe functioning of Betances will be considered by the Board of Directors and management as an automatic resignation on the part of that staff person. Furthermore, it should be understood that any National Health Service Corps designee who participates in any action that stops, prevents or hinders the safe operation of Betances will be immediately reported to the Regional Office for disciplinary action.

Also, on September 15, the Federal Government officially denied Betances' requests for supplemental funds. In a letter to Betances, Arthur Fernandez wrote:

I wish to express my thanks to you and your staff for your kind attention during my visit to Betances, September 4th.

I thought it would be appropriate for me to outline my concerns related to your project so that you may use them as a guide for the next Budget Period.

As you know, your total budget request was for $452,206 and you were awarded only $325,000. As we discussed at Kerhonkson, we had hoped to restore the additional funds, but quite frankly we have trouble justifying additional funds. Consequently, we don't believe that we will be able to restore very much of the $127,000 difference.

Betances' Application, was reviewed by regional office staff and was found to be heavy on personnel. The BCRR for the last reporting period revealed that your productivity was actually low. Physician encounters, for example, were annualized to 2213 and the minimum normal rate is 4200.

This resulted in a high cost per encounter of $44.21. [T]he maximum norm for that is $24.00.

In addition, your administrative cost are running 21% while the norm is 16%.

As you know, these program indicators are the basis for our central office to allocate funds to the regions. The region has established policy to monitor these closely in order to save as much of our funding levels as we can.[16]

F. The Termination of Dr. Berkman, Anna Burns, and Jini Tannenhouse

According to Wanda Evans, the September 15 letter from Fernandez promoted a series of managerial meetings to deal with the funding and productivity problems. She credibly testified that in light of the Government's rejection of the supplemental grant, decisions no longer could be deferred. According to Evans, although it had been hoped, during the spring and summer of 1980, that no cutbacks in personnel would be needed, it now became evident that the projected income from medicare, third-party payment, and other sources was not meeting expectations.[17] Evans testified that in view of the above, several decisions were made in mid-September as follows: (1) To close the Health Connection, where Anna Burns worked; (2) to terminate Judy Statler;[18] (3) to not renew a consulting contract with Paul Rivers;[19] and (4) to terminate the services of Dr. Berk-

[16] As noted above, Fernandez testified that during the summer of 1980, there was talk within his agency to cut off all funds to Betances. He testified that he personally opposed such a drastic action. Accordingly, the letter to Betances of September 15 was, in reality, a sort of victory on his behalf to keep Betances funded. Unfortunately, as it turned out, his victory was shortlived.

[17] Evans' testimony regarding the income received by Betances during this period of time was based on records that were present in the hearing room and that were available to the General Counsel.

[18] Judy Statler had been retained to work on private grants. It was hoped that she would generate revenues in excess of her earnings.

[19] Paul Rivers had been retained during the summer of 1980 on a consulting line to do some work in relation to the Health Connection.

man and Jini Tannenhouse. Regarding the decision to terminate Dr. Berkman and Tannenhouse, Evans testified that this was intended to resolve two problems at the same time. First, to save money and, second, to increase productivity. As testified to by Passer, the Federal Government was very concerned by the failure of Betances to meet the Government's minimal productivity requirements. To resolve that problem, Passer stated that it could be accomplished in two ways: one by increasing the number of patients seen by the existing patient providers or, alternatively, by reducing the number of such providers and spreading the existing patient load among the remainder. Concerning the choice of Dr. Berkman and Tannenhouse, the record shows that at this time there were six patient providers, four of whom were employed by the Federal Government and therefore were cost free as far as Betances was concerned. Inasmuch as Betances paid Dr. Berkman and Tannenhouse from its own funds, their selection for termination is hardly surprising. Indeed any other choice would have been incomprehensible. Regarding Anna Burns, the General Counsel seemingly conceded that her layoff was due to economic factors because she worked at the Health Connection where operations were terminated. He, however, claims a violation in that Ramos allegedly conditioned her reemployment on her abandonment of union activities. In this connection, Burns testified that on October 1, Ramos told her that he felt betrayed by the walkout and that if she had not participated in the walkout, she would come back to work when the Health Connection reopened. The Health Connection, however, was never reopened.

On September 26 Judy Statler's services were terminated.[20] Also, by letters dated September 30, Dr. Berkman, Jini Tannenhouse, and Anna Burns were terminated.[21] At the same time, the Health Connection was closed,[22] and Roni Ramos ceased working for the Respondent. In mid-October, River's contract expired and it was not renewed.

G. The "Sickout" of October 2, Discharge of Martin Garcia, Warning to Betty Gonzalez, and Transfer of Federal Employees

In face of the layoffs of Dr. Berkman, Jini Tannenhouse, and Anna Burns, members of the Staff Association decided to have a "sickout" on October 2. This sickout, which lasted 1 day, was participated in by Patricia Gleaton and Ana Paez. Dr. Solomon did not appear at work on that date, although it appears that the main reason was because she did not feel well. (She was pregnant at the time.) As in the prior walkout, the Staff Association did not give Respondent any advance notice.

As a result of the sickout and the participation in it by National Health Service Corps assignees, Betances notified the Government of the event and a meeting was arranged on October 7 at 26 Federal Plaza. Betty Gonzalez appeared at the meeting and her presence was objected to by Paul Ramos. She was, however, allowed to remain. (Gonzalez had received permission to take time off to go to this meeting from Dr. Solomon.) The principal purpose of the meeting was to remind the Federal employees that it was against the law for them to engage in strikes or work stoppages. On the following day, Gonzalez was given a warning because of her absence from work on October 7.

On October 9 Martin Garcia was fired. The reason given to him was because of his latenesses and absences. There is, in fact, no doubt that by any normal standard, Garcia's absence and latenesses were excessive.[23] On the other hand, Evans conceded that excessive absences and latenesses were not uncommon at Betances and the record shows that other employees (such as Carmen Altus), had bad records and did not lose their jobs.

At some point in mid-October, Paul Ramos published a community bulletin so as to explain, from his point of view, the recent events at Betances. In part, this read as follows:

> Betances is now facing a very difficult time. There are people who are out to destroy Betances and all it stands for. Most of these people are not from this community. Most of them are in fact privileged individuals who can easily find high paying jobs anywhere they wish. These people say they do not want to hurt Betances. Do not believe them. They already closed down the clinic for one day and threatened to do worse.
> Betances is not the first place this has happened. It has happened in other poor communities where organizations like Betances were, or almost were, totally destroyed. The path of destruction is always the same. This is the way they do it. This is the way they are trying to do it at Betances.

[20] Judy Statler was not involved in any way with the other employees in terms of the Staff Association or its demands. The General Counsel does not allege that her termination was violative of the Act.

[21] Regarding Dr. Berkman, he agreed with Ramos that he would stay on for an additional 2 weeks to help Dr. Peter Albert take over his patients. Dr. Alpert, who was also a NHSC assignee, came to Betances during August. Later, Dr. Berkman terminated his arrangement because he objected to certain things said by Ramos in a community bulletin.

[22] The General Counsel does not allege that the decision to close the Health Connection was discriminatorily motivated. Therefore, I can only conclude that he concedes that its closing was caused by economic considerations.

[23] In a decision by an administrative law judge of the New York State Department of Labor, Martin Garcia's claim for unemployment benefits was denied. After an evidentiary hearing the judge stated:

> Claimant was less than an exemplary employee having been on probation two times in 1979 and received two unfavorable evaluations. By July 1980, claimant improved his performance and had recently received a favorable performance rating. Nonetheless, from July 1980, until his termination, claimants punctuality became intolerable. Although warned repeatedly, claimant was late in excess of 20 times during his last three months of employment, including the last two days prior to his termination.
> Claimant M. G. [Martin Garcia], had an abominable attendance record. He was warned on numerous occasions. During the last three months of his employment, he was late on more than 20 separate occasions. Claimant's contention that he was late because of a work related injury or other excuses, are not persuasive. An employee is expected to work the schedule of hours set by the employer and not set his own hours of work. The evidence is overwhelming that this claimant did not have compelling reasons for failure to comply with the employer's attendance rules. His termination therefore, resulted from misconduct for which unemployment insurance benefits may not be paid.

A few disgruntled staff members use the rest of the staff to create problems between the staff and the administration. They try to create an atmosphere that will lead to a takeover of the administration by the supporters of this very small clique of workers. Their ultimate goal is to get their hands on the money that the organization has, so they can use it for their own purposes.

Betances had been trying to deal with this problem for months. Betances is responsible to the federal government because that's where it gets the money to operate and Betances is accountable to YOU—the community because YOU are who we serve. Because of the problems these people have created, the federal government is not going to give Betances the money Betances needs.

Now Betances had to let some workers go because there isn't enough money to pay them and the adolescent program, the Health Connection, has been suspended idefinitely because of lack of funds.

On the Lower East Side we need more money and more services—not less. Betances has dutifully served this community and its people for over ten years. The destruction of our programs, all of our programs, can only happen if we let it.

Don't let this evil outside influence destroy what took a group of dedicated people ten years to build! Show your support—tell your friends!

H. The Discharges of Gonzalez, Morales, Feliciano, and Pacheco

According to Deborah Pacheco, about October 17 or 18, she had a conversation with Maintenance Supervisor Eladio Reyes, wherein she stated that she had heard that Betty Gonzalez was going to be fired, and asked if that was true. She testified that he said yes, and asked how she had found out. Reyes was not called as a witness by the Respondent, as it appears that he was not in the country at the time of the trial.

On October 23 another meeting was held at the offices of the National Health Service Corps. At this meeting, Dr. Patricia Solomon, Ana Paez, and Patricia Gleaton were told by the NHSC that they should accept transfers out of Betances or face formal charges against them for participating in the foregoing strikes. The three individuals accepted the ultimatum and thereupon ceased working at Betances.

Also on October 23 or 24, after becoming aware of the transfers, certain of the employees at Betances decided to call a strike on Monday, October 27. However, no 8(g) notices were given.

On October 24 a series of events occurred at the facility that led to the discharges of Betty Gonzalez, Elva Morales, and Nancy Feliciano. First of all, as Dr. Solomon had been transferred, Dr. Peter Alpert was designated as the medical director. Also, on October 24, he was the only practitioner at the facility who was treating patients, and was therefore faced with a large influx of patients who had appointments with the transferred practitioners.[24] In connection with the events of that day, Dr. Alpert testified that in early afternoon, he needed to reach Pacheco so that she could come to the laboratory to draw blood from a patient. He states that he asked the receptionist, Elva Morales, to page Pacheco, whereupon Morales said, "If you want her, get her yourself." Dr. Alpert states that he also asked the other receptionist, Nancy Feliciano, to page Pacheco, and that she too refused. Morales concedes that although it was part of her job to page people when necessary, she refused Dr. Alpert's request. Dr. Alpert wrote a memorandum to Paul Ramos that day regarding Morales. This was as follows:

> This morning I was looking for Debbie and couldn't find her. I asked Elva to please page Debbie and she refused. At first she just sat there, then she said "if you want her, page her yourself, it's not my job." I feel that this type of behavior warrants your attention.

Dr. Alpert testified that later in the afternoon, he asked Betty Gonzalez to prepare a patient he was about to examine and that she refused.[25] He states that she told him that he should prepare the patient himself. Gonzalez concedes that prepping patients was part of her job (in fact her principal function), and that she refused Dr. Alpert's order. Her excuse was that she was too busy at the time, deciding which patients should be seen and which should be sent home.

According to Dr. Alpert, later that afternoon, he heard Betty Gonzalez telling patients that he was responsible for the transfers of Gleaton, Paez, and Solomon and that Alpert was a lousy doctor. He states that when he went back to his office he found an unrolled condom on his desk and that when he showed this to Danny Gonzalez, the three employees, Gonzalez, Morales, and Feliciano, laughed at him. He also states that during that day, former employee Zayerz came into the center and announced that a car outside was on fire. Dr. Alpert states that he went outside to look at his car, saw nothing, and that when he returned, the employees again laughed at him. In this connection, Zayerz testified that this did not happen on October 24, but that a similar incident did occur in September.

Dr. Alpert testified that faced with the above incidents it became clear to him that the three employees were acting in concert to sabotage his authority. He thereupon wrote another memorandum to Paul Ramos and Wanda Evans, and orally advised them that either they be discharged, or that he would leave. The memorandum reads as follows:

> The current turmoil at Betances have made all of us quite anxious and tense. It has been difficult to examine patients properly or render proper care. This afternoon, Elva refused to page Debbie (as I have stated in a previous memo). Later in the day > while we were all discussing the current state of affairs at Betances, the argument became heated and Elva started calling me a "prick" and a "scum bag." Both Betty and Nancy supported Elva's actions. A few minutes later, I went back to my office and found an envelope on my desk with my name on it. Inside was an unrolled condom. I do not know for certain who put it there, but the handwriting appeared to be Elva's and when confronted with it they all laughed.

[25] Preparing a patient involves obtaining the patient's chart and taking his or her height, weight, blood pressure, etc.

> This type of behavior is childish and inexcusable. Appropriate disciplinary measure[s] must be taken immediately.

According to Wanda Evans, Dr. Alpert told her and Paul Ramos about the aforesaid incidents. She states that Dr. Alpert said that he was being harassed by Gonzalez, Feliciano, and Morales, that he was "fed up" and could not continue to work that way. She testified that as a consequence of Dr. Alpert's report, she attended a meeting with Paul Ramos and Danny Gonzalez where they discussed what to do about these employees. Evans states that although there was some concern about the repercussions among the remaining staff which might result from discharging the three employees, the unanimous opinion was that they should be fired. In this respect she testified:

> We made Peter Alpert the Medical Director and he needed our support . . . . We could not continue to let people not respect him and not listen to him because we'd have no practice, there is no point in having the clinic if we didn't have some order. He was there for that order and if the people who were under him weren't going to listen to him they had to be fired, there was nothing else to do, so we felt there was no other alternative.

By mailgram dated October 24, Gonzalez was notified of her discharge. The reasons given were (1) excessive absenteeism, (2) gross misconduct, and (3) insubordination. By letter dated October 24, Feliciano was told of her discharge. The reasons given were (1) excessive lateness and absenteeism and (2) gross misconduct. By telegram dated October 24, Morales was notified of her discharge. The reasons given were (1) gross misconduct and (2) insubordination.

As in the case of Martin Garcia, Betty Gonzalez, Nancy Feliciano, and Elva Morales filed unemployment claims and a hearing was held before an administrative law judge of the New York Department of Labor. In those cases, the judge, in denying their claims stated:

> Claimant, N.F. [Nancy Feliciano], worked as a telephone receptionist from September, 1979 through October 24, 1980, earning approximately $8,500 per annum. During the period from June 1980 until her termination on October 24, 1980, claimant had an abominable attendance record. She was absent on seven occasions, four of which were on Mondays or Fridays, and was late on 47 occasions. Although warned, claimant continued to report to work late, including the last two days of her employment. On her last day of employment, claimant sat with her co-employees, B.G. & E.M., and undermined the authority of the medical director by mocking at him and participating in various pranks against him with the aid of a former employee who was socializing with them on the premises without the employer's authorization.
> Claimant, B.G. [Betty Gonzalez], worked as a medical assistant from May, 1979 to October 24, 1980, earning approximately $200 per week. Claimant was notified of her termination because of poor attendance, acts of misconduct and insubordination. Claimant had a poor attendance record and had been warned, including having deductions made from her salary. Between August and October claimant remained away from work on seven separate occasions, five of which were before or after weekends. She was also late on five occasions during that period of time. Claimant was also involved in punching another person's timecard and having others punch her timecard when she was out. Claimant's job primarily required that she render medical assistance to the physicians. On the last day of her employment, there were only two physicians employed at the facility because of the reductions ordered by the Federal Government. One of those doctors, who was also the medical director at the time, requested the claimant assist him in "prepping patients." Claimant did not assist the physician in prepping patients on that day because she was disgusted with the facility's management and was upset with the reductions in staff.
> Claimant, E.M. [Elva Morales], was employed as a medical receptionist from January, 1978 through October 24, 1980, earning approximately $9,500 per annum. Claimant was terminated because of acts occurring on the final day of her employment. On that day the facility was crowded with patients because only two physicians were on duty. The medical director asked claimant to page the lab technician who was then needed by the doctor. Claimant, who was sitting at her desk, refused the doctor's request stating, "If you want her, do it yourself." Although claimant knew that the lab technician was indisposed in the bathroom at the time, she did not bother to so inform the doctor. Claimant also used various profanities at the doctor.
> Claimants, N.F., B.G., and E.M., were all terminated as a result of incidents occurring on their last day of employment, October 24, 1980. Whether or not such terminations arose as a result of misconduct in connection with their employment depends on the facts as to each individual. Claimant N.F., had an atrocious attendance record which could have warranted dismissal by the employer prior to this date. The fact that the employer did choose this date does not excuse her prior behavior or create a waiver on the part of the employer. Certainly 47 latenesses over a five-month period warrants action by the employer. Claimant, B.G.'s, employment also terminated under conditions which would constitute misconduct under the Unemployment Insurance Law. Her poor attendance, her misuse of timecard regulations and her insubordinate conduct in refusing to do her regular work for which she was being paid, justified the employer's action in terminating her services. Further, claimant, E.M.'s, conduct on that last day, also warranted her dismissal for insubordination to the physician medical director of the institution. Regardless of whether these claimants had any legitimate grievances for being distressed by the reduction in staff and budgetary curtailment by the Federal government, it certainly did not warrant such behavior on their final day of employment. By refusing to "prep patients," by refusing to page other medical personnel, by acting in concert with a former male employee, who was present in the facility without authorization and incited them to undermine the medical director's [authority] was certainly anathema with rendering patient care at a medical facility. I have considered claimants' contention that such activity should be protected because of the industrial controversy occurring at that time and that their termination was actually pretextual in order to subvert their union activity. I am not persuaded by such argument. The employer did not contrive claimants' poor attendance nor the events and behavior occurring on their last day of employment. Regardless of one's allegiance to a union, an employee who refuses to perform reasonable functions as directed by the employer, cannot hide behind the veil of union protection. To hold otherwise, would give more favorable protection because of union activity than to employees who did not engage in union activities.

On October 27, the Staff Association, without giving an 8(g) notice, commenced a strike against Betances. Deborah Pacheco participated in this strike and there is no dispute that she was discharged on October 27 because of her participation in the strike. Thus, by letter dated October 30, Pacheco was told:

> We are sorry to inform you that your position as a Laboratory Technician at Betances Health Unit has been terminated effective Monday, October 27, 1980.
> Please be advised that this action is due to your absence from work in order to participate in the illegal pickets currently demonstrating in front of the building. Your activities have deterred patients from entering the premises. As a result, the Board of Directors and management of Betances feel your actions constitute your immediate dismissal as an employee of Betances.
> As you know, on September 15, 1980, the Board of Directors of Betances responded to the demands of staff, the last paragraph of the response states the following:
> "Staff is expected to be at their jobs on time performing their assigned duties. Any action on the part of any staff which stops or hinders the safe functioning of Betances will be considered by the Board of Directors and management as an automatic resignation on the part of that staff person."
> Needless to mention we regret that you have taken this position with regards to the pickets but your actions leave us no alternative. We are truly sorry that your relationship with Betances had to end this way.

I. The Closing of Betances from November 17, 1980, until January 1981

The record in this case also reveals that the strike that ensued on October 27 was attended by various acts of vandalism. For example, certain patient records were found to be missing, the telephone lines were cut, and paint was put on the building. As a result of the turmoil at the Center, Dr. Alpert left Betances in November.[26] Also, Betances closed down on November 17, 1980, and did not reopen until sometime in January 1981.

In connection with the vandalism, it is noted that the Respondent did not adduce evidence regarding which employees, if any, were responsible.

IV. ANALYSIS

A. The 8(a)(5) Allegations

The General Counsel argues that there were at Betances two separate appropriate bargaining units, one consisting of physicians, physician assistants, nurse practitioners, and registered nurses[27] and the other consisting of all service and maintenance employees.[28]

With respect to the 8(a)(5) allegations, the General Counsel relies on the rationale of Sullivan Electric Co., 199 NLRB 809 (1972), and related cases.[29] In Sullivan Electric Co., a union made a demand for recognition in a single unit in which it had obtained executed cards designating the union as the bargaining agent from 13 of the unit's 16 employees. When the employer expressed doubts concerning the union's claimed majority status, [27] Consisting of Dr. Alan Berkman and Jini Tannenhouse. The General Counsel states that as Patricia Gleaton, Ana Paez, and Dr. Alpert are Federal Government employees, they would not be included in the unit. He also states that Dr. Solomon would not be included in such a unit because she was a supervisory employee who also was employed by the Federal Government. Concerning Roni Ramos, the General Counsel contends that as she is the wife of Paul Ramos, the administrator, she would not have a community of interest with the unit employees even though she was employed as a registered nurse.

[28] The General Counsel asserts that the nonprofessional unit would include all service and maintenance employees (Martin Garcia), medical assistants (Betty and Alba Gonzalez), medical receptionists (Elva Morales and Nancy Felciano), medical records clerks (Jose Luces), laboratory technicians (Deborah Pacheco), and community health workers (Lisa Garcia, William Zayerz, Andres Rosado, and Anna Burns). The General Counsel would exclude from the nonprofessional unit the bookkeeper (Grace Butler), an administrative assistant (Judy Statler), the upstairs receptionists (Nereida Zayas), and a researcher (Paul Rivers). Also, she takes the position that Margaret Joyiens, and Eladio Reyes were supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act.

the authorization cards were offered to the employer. Later, the employer, while distributing paychecks, asked the employees if they had signed union cards and a majority answered in the affirmative. The following day, 13 employees went on strike in support of the union's demand for recognition. In concluding that the employer was obligated to recognize and bargain with the union, the Board (with Member Kennedy dissenting) stated:

> Concededly an employer is not required by the Act to recognize and bargain with a Union wholly upon the strength of its assertion that it represents a majority of the employees involved, notwithstanding that the Union predicates its assertion upon an adequate showing of signed authorization cards. . . .
> However, where as in this case, the Respondent rejects the foregoing alternative and unilaterally undertakes to determine the Union's majority or minority status by means of a poll, under conditions of its own choosing, the Respondent cannot thereafter disclaim the results simply because it finds them distasteful.

In my opinion the facts of this case are distinguishable from those in Sullivan Electric Co. and the other cases cited by the General Counsel. First, unlike the cited cases, the evidence establishes that no employees ever executed any forms, cards, or other documents whereby they evinced their interests in becoming members of or being represented by the Staff Association. Second, despite the General Counsel's assertion that the Staff Association should be accorded bargaining rights in two separate bargaining units, the Staff Association never made such a demand, but rather sought recognition on behalf of virtually all persons working at Betances, in one group, including both professional and nonprofessional employees, plus Federal Government employees. Thus the bargaining units that the General Counsel now seeks to create, after the fact, were never sought by the Staff Association and are therefore substantially inconsistent with its demands.

Third, while the General Counsel asserts that a bargaining obligation should arise out of the poll taken on September 3, in response to the Staff Association's demands, the evidence shows that the Respondent asked the people present at the meeting to indicate their support or nonsupport for all of the demands and the poll was not limited to the recognitional demand. As the Staff Association at the same time was making demands that certain employees be reinstated and that others be fired, it is virtually impossible to ascertain whether those persons who indicated their support, by remaining seated, were supporting all the demands, or were supporting some but not all the demands.[30]

Fourth, the fact remains that when the people present at the meeting of September 3 were asked if they supported the demands, a majority of those present indicated their opposition by standing up. As the Staff Association did not indicate that it was seeking recognition in two separate bargaining units (or any particular unit for that matter), the Respondent was entitled to assume, based on the poll as taken, that a majority of the people did not support either the demand for recognition or the other demands. In this respect the "vote" was taken on the entirety of the demands, and no effort was made to segregate the voters by separating the professional from the nonprofessional employees, the regular employees from the Federal Government employees, or the supervisory and managerial employees from the rank-and-file employees. In fact, they all "voted" together and no tally was made.

In conclusion, it seems to me that the facts of this case are so removed from the facts of Sullivan Electric and related cases, so as to make the rationale of those cases entirely inapplicable. It therefore is found that the poll taken on September 3 did not impose any obligation on the Respondent to recognize and bargain with the Staff Association. As such I shall recommend the dismissal of all of the 8(a)(5) allegations of the complaint.[31] With respect to the same transaction, I shall also recommend dismissal insofar as the General Counsel's allegation that the Respondent gave the impression of surveillance when it stated at the September 3 meeting that it was aware that certain demands were going to be made. As it clearly was the intention of the Staff Association to make these demands at this very meeting, I cannot see how this single statement of anticipation would violate the Act.

B. The Discharge of William Zayerz

It initially is noted that I reject Respondent's contention that Zayerz was in September 1980 an independent contractor. In deciding whether an individual is an employee or an independent contractor, the Board uses a "right to control" test. See, e.g., NLRB v. United Insurance Co. 390 U.S. 254, 256 (1968). In Caribe Hilton Hotel v. NLRB, 690 F 2d 318, 320 (2d Cir. 1982), the court stated:

> Under the common law test an employer-employee relationship exists if the purported employer controls or has the right to control both the result to be accomplished and the "manner and means" by which the purported employee brings about the result. . . . Factors which may be considered in determining employee status include: whether the purported employee is engaged in a distinct occupation or business; whether the work involved is usually done under the employer's direction or by an unsupervised specialist; the skill involved; who supplies the instrumentalities and place of performance; the length of employment; the method of payment (by > the time or by the job); whether the work is part of the employer's regular business and/or necessary to it; and the intent of the parties creating the relationship. Restatement (Second) of Agency § 220(2). No single factor is determinative . . . .

[30] It is entirely possible, for example, that an employee remained seated because he or she supported the demand for reinstatement but not the demand for recognition.

[31] Included in the allegations dismissed are the contentions that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) by failing to bargain with the Staff Association before closing the Health Connection and laying off employees Dr. Berkman, Tannenhouse, and Anna Burns. Also dismissed is the allegation that the Respondent failed to bargain when it did not notify or give the Staff Association an opportunity to bargain before temporarily closing the facility in November 1980.

In the present case Zayerz originally began working at Betances as a student placement while going to college. In the spring of 1980 he obtained his Masters of Social Work and no longer was a student placement. Nevertheless, he continued to work at Betances doing certain projects under the direction and supervision of Paul Ramos. Although no withholdings for social security or income taxes were made from Zayerz' earnings, and he apparently was paid from a "consulting" line on the budget, this by itself does not establish that Zayerz was an independent contractor. As it is my conclusion, based on the record as a whole, that Betances through Paul Ramos, controlled the results to be accomplished and the manner and means by which Zayerz was to bring about those results, it is found that he was an employee.

As noted above, the Staff Association was created on August 27 at the home of Zayerz. Also, at the meeting on September 3, when Respondent asked those present if they supported the Staff Association's demands, Zayerz raised an objection and asked if immunity would be given to those who supported the demands. At some point after the demands were ready by Deborah Pacheco, Paul Ramos told Zayerz, in front of the assemblage, that funds for his position had just run out. Thus, it was in this context that Zayerz was told that he was being let go. Additionally, on September 9, when Zayerz spoke to Paul Ramos, the latter told him that there were no funds for his position and that he would not have Zayerz working because he was not loyal to Ramos. When members of the Staff Association met with Ramos on September 10 to ask for Zayerz' reinstatement, Ramos, while asserting that Zayerz had been "retrenched" for economic reasons, also said that Zayerz had betrayed him and was "stabbing him in the back."

In juxtaposition to the above, Zayerz conceded that in the summer of 1980, and therefore before the Staff Association was formed, he had been told by Ramos that money for his position might not be available and that Zayerz ought to consider applying for a position with the National Health Service Corps as that would eliminate Respondent's cost for his position. The evidence also establishes that when the Federal Government did not grant all the money requested by Betances, there was, in the summer of 1980, an incipient crisis as far as the Respondent was concerned. In this respect, Dr. Solomon conceded that at management meetings held during the summer, it was the consensus opinion that Zayerz' job was expendable in a fiscal crunch.[32]

Although Paul Ramos testified that the management group had made its decision in the summer to terminate Zayerz, the testimony of Wanda Evans indicates to the contrary. In this regard, Evans stated that when the Federal Government in May denied Betances full request for funds, it was the opinion of the management committee during the spring and summer that if projected revenues from other sources met projected levels, it was "hoped" that no cutbacks in personnel would have to be made. She testified, therefore, that decisions regarding personnel were deferred. Evans also testified that during this time it was "hoped" that Betances' request for a supplemental grant might be approved by the Federal Government. According to Evans, the "crunch" came on September 15 when Arthur Fernandez officially notified Betances that the supplemental grant request was not approved. It was at this point, according to Evans, that a hard decision had to be made because other revenues were not coming in as projected. Thus, according to Evans, the decisions to cut back on personnel came after September 15.

In light of the above, it is my opinion that the announcement of Zayerz' discharge on September 3 was not motivated by Respondent's financial situation, but rather was motivated because Ramos was angered at Zayerz' participation in and support of the Staff Association and its demands. As Zayerz' activity in this respect is construed as protected concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, it is my belief that his discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. However, it also is clear to me that Zayerz would nevertheless have been let go for economic reasons either at the same time as Judy Statler, on September 26, 1980, or at the latest, on September 30, when Dr. Berkman, Jini Tannenhouse, and Anna Burns were let go for economic reasons. As the record indicated that Zayerz was paid through September 18, the Company's backpay liability should be, at most, for 12 days. Also, as I conclude that the facts show that Zayerz would have been let go within a short time for legitimate economic reasons, I shall recommend that Respondent not be required to offer him reinstatement.

C. The Layoffs of Tannenhouse, Dr. Berkman, and Burns

The record in this case indicates that when the Federal Government, in the spring of 1980, did not grant the entire amount requested by Betances, it was the hope of Betances' management that its operations could continue at current staffing levels without the additional money. Nevertheless, the record also indicates that this was, indeed, only a "hope," based on the expectation that increases in salaries and fringe benefits would be deferred and that projected revenues from sources such as medicare, medicaid, patient, and third-party payment would meet certain expectations.

It also was established that during the spring and summer of 1980 the Federal Government was seriously considering cutting off all future grants to Betances because medical productivity was not meeting the minimum level required as a condition of the grants. This was made clear by the testimony of Arthur Fernandez who stated that he had to convince his superiors to continue the grants. Also, in this respect, Passer testified that the productivity problem was the great concern to the Federal Government and that there were essentially two ways that Betances could solve this problem: (1) by reducing the number of physicians, or (2) by increasing the patient load per physician.

[32] In Dr. Solomon's report to the National Health Service Corps, she also stated that Zayerz had "long been out of favor with the project director," and that this dated back a year or so in connection with Zayerz' complaint that Roni Ramos was undermining his efforts at the Health Connection.

In addition, the evidence establishes that during the same period of time, Betances applied for a supplemental grant and urged the community to lobby the Federal Government for additional funds.

In the face of the above, the management committee of Betances (Paul Ramos, Wanda Evans, and Dr. Patricia Solomon) held a series of meetings during the summer of 1980. As testified to by Evans and Dr. Solomon, it was the consensus to defer any personnel decisions in the hope that additional money would be forthcoming from either the Federal Government or from other sources.[33] Dr. Solomon testified, however, that the management group did decide that if a financial crunch did develop, then the Health Connection should be closed (where Anna Burns and Roni Ramos worked), that Zayerz' job was expendable, and that the patient providers not being paid by the Federal Government (Dr. Berkman and Jini Tannenhouse) would be let go.

On September 15, 1980, Fernandez, on behalf of the Federal Government, notified Betances that its request for supplemental funds was being rejected because of the continued low level of productivity. It was at this point, according to the credible testimony of Evans, that hard decisions had to be made as expected revenues from other sources were not meeting projected levels. She testified that the decisions made at that time included: (1) terminating the Health Connection, (2) terminating the services of Judy Statler, (3) terminating the services of Paul Rivers, and (4) terminating the services of Dr. Berkman and Jini Tannenhouse. Regarding the closure of the Health Connection, which resulted in the terminations of Anna Burns and Roni Ramos, the General Counsel does not allege that this decision was motivated by discriminatory considerations. He therefore concedes that this decision was motivated by economic considerations. With respect to Dr. Berkman[34] and Jini Tannenhouse, Evans credibly testified that their selection for layoff was motivated by two factors. First, she testified that the decision was made so as to save money. Second, she testified that in view of the productivity problem, it made sense to eliminate two of the patient providers and to relegate the existing patient load to the other providers, thereby increasing productivity. As all the other patient providers (Dr. Solomon, Dr. Alpert, and Ana Paez) were employees of the Federal Government, whose salaries were not being paid by Betances, the choice of Dr. Berkman and Jini Tannenhouse was therefore obvious, even though Dr. Berkman was, himself, very productive.

Although there is no question but that Dr. Berkman was at the forefront of the Staff Association and had engendered Paul Ramos' anger because of his activities in that regard, there is little doubt in my mind that the decision to terminate the employment of Dr. Berkman and Jini Tannenhouse was the result of the financial and productivity problems that necessitated this result. I therefore conclude that their terminations were not motivated because of their protected concerted activities or activities on behalf of the Staff Association. Accordingly it is concluded that their discharges were not violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Also, as I have already concluded that Betances was not under any obligation to recognize or bargain with the Staff Association, it is concluded that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(5) when it chose to close the Health Connection and terminate the employment of Dr. Berkman, Jini Tannenhouse, and Anna Burns, without first having given the Staff Association an opportunity to bargain about those decisions.

With respect to Anna Burns, there is no doubt that as she worked at the Health Connection, which was closed due to legitimate economic considerations, that her discharge cannot be violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The General Counsel postulates, however, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) when Paul Ramos told her that because of her involvement in the Staff Association's activities, he would not rehire her when the Health Connection reopened. Although this was not specifically denied by Ramos, the evidence indicates that the decision to close the Health Connection was of a permanent nature, and this alleged statement therefore seems too highly improbable to be credited. In fact, the Health Connection was never reopened.

D. Discharge of Garcia

As noted by the judge in his unemployment case, Garcia had a record of excessive absenteeism and lateness. Moreover, he had previously been placed on probation. There is, in fact, little dispute about that findings of fact, which is amply supported by this record.

There are, however, other facts that came to my attention which may not have been known to the judge or the State Department of Labor when he denied Garcia for unemployment insurance benefits.[35]

Notwithstanding Garcia's longstanding and chronic problem with absences and lateness, the evidence shows that Ramos overlooked this problem and placed a certain degree of trust in Garcia before September 3, 1980. Thus, Garcia was asked by Ramos, during the summer of 1980, to take care of his house while Ramos was on vacation. Also, Garcia was given the key to open Betances when he arrived in the morning.[36]

After the September 3 meeting in which the Staff Association made its demands, Ramos visited Garcia at his home and warned Garcia to "watch his step." In this regard, he told Garcia that he had helped Garcia in the past and that Garcia should not go against him. Garcia

[33] For example, Judy Statler's services were retained to write up grant proposals. She was retained on the condition that her pay would be exceeded by whatever grants she could generate.

[34] For the same reasons applicable to Zayerz, I find that Dr. Berkman was an employee of Betances, rather than an independent contractor.

[35] The Board has consistently held that decisions by judges in unemployment cases are admissable in unfair labor practices proceedings and are of some probative value. They are not, however, controlling as to their findings of fact or conclusions of law. Western Publishing Co., 263 NLRB 110 (1982).

[36] On September 11, 1980, the key was taken away from Garcia because he failed to arrive on time and other employees were locked out.

responded that, although he liked Ramos, he also liked the other employees. Ramos, in turn, told Garcia, "If that's what you want."

About September 5, Garcia was elected to be on the Staff Association's grievance committee and he was present when that committee met with Ramos on September 10 to ask for the reinstatement of Zayerz. At the conclusion of the meeting, when Ramos refused to change his mind about Zayerz, a 1-day strike commenced and there is little doubt about Ramos' adverse reaction to this and the other strikes that thereafter ensued. (See for example his comments in the community bulletin referred to above.)

Although the reasons given for Garcia's discharge would be plausible in most other circumstances, the evidence shows that lateness and absenteeism at Betances was common, indeed chronic, among Respondent's employees. It also was shown that this was generally dealt with by docking an individual's pay. There clearly were other employees who were often late or absent and Carmen Altus, who was absent and late a substantially similar number of times as Garcia, did not lose her job.

Accordingly, it is concluded that Garcia was not fired because of his admitted excessive absence and latenesses, but rather because of his association with the participation in the activities of the Staff Association. In this respect, I therefore find that his discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

E. Transfer of the Federal Employees, Dr. Solomon, Paez, and Gleaton, Warning to Gonzalez on October 8, 1980

The simple and conclusive answer to whether the Respondent violated the Act when it successfully requested the Federal Government (i.e., the National Health Service Corps) to transfer the Federal assignees out of Betances is that these persons were neither employees of Respondent nor employees within the meaning of the Act.

At the hearing, the General Counsel proposed the analogy that in certain circumstances the Board has held that the discharge of supervisors is violative of the Act, even though such supervisors are not employees as defined in the Act. After the hearing closed, the Board, in Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982), overruled the line of cases with which the General Counsel was seeking to make his analogy. Therefore, it is recommended that the complaint, insofar as it alleges the illegality of the transfers of Dr. Solomon, Gleaton, and Paez should be dismissed.

With respect to the warning issued to Betty Gonzalez on October 8, 1980, it is apparent that this warning was issued to her because she attended a meeting on October 7 at the National Health Service Corps in which the Federal assignees were reminded that they were not entitled to engage in strikes. It appears, therefore, that she attended this meeting (with the permission of Dr. Solomon) in her role as a member of the Staff Association in order to assist or counsel those persons. Nevertheless, as the Federal employees were not and cannot be construed as employees enjoying the protection of the National Labor Relations Act, Gonzalez' appearance at this meeting cannot be said to have constituted protected concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act. This is so because she was not acting in concert with "employees" as defined in the Act. As such, it is concluded that this allegation of the complaint should also be dismissed.

F. The Discharges of Gonzalez, Feliciano, and Morales

Although an employer may not discharge employees because of their union or protected concerted activities, the fact that employees engage in such actions does not give them an impregnable shield from otherwise justifiable discipline. Such, I think, is the case herein.

Although there may be some differences about detail, the principal events of October 24, 1980, are not in serious dispute. On that morning Dr. Alpert, who had just been designated as medical director, was the only medical practitioner at the center, and was attempting to cope with patients who were scheduled to see not only himself, but also Dr. Solomon, Patricia Gleaton, and Ana Paez. At some point, he needed to see Debrorah Pacheco, the laboratory technician, and asked the receptionist, Elva Morales, to page Pacheco. Instead of carrying out Dr. Alpert's order, Morales at first ignored him, and then told him to page Pacheco himself. As this was a part of Morales' job, Dr. Alpert was understandably annoyed and wrote a memorandum about this incident to Paul Ramos. Later in the day, Dr. Alpert asked Betty Gonzalez to prepare a patient (her normal job) and she told him to do it himself. Still later, Dr. Alpert found a condom on his desk and when he came out with it, the three employees, Nancy Feliciano, Betty Gonzalez, and Elva Morales, laughed at him. At still another point during the day, Dr. Alpert heard Ms. Gonzalez telling patients that he was a lousy physician who had caused the transfer of the others. In face of these events, Dr. Alpert wrote another memorandum to Paul Ramos and Wanda Evans complaining of the behavior of the three employees and demanding that disciplinary action be taken immediately. He also orally told management that either they should be fired or that he would leave.[37]

There is no question in my mind that the three employees, from Dr. Alpert's and from any objective point of view, were involved in a series of transactions designed to ridicule and undermine Dr. Alpert's authority as medical director. In short, their conduct on October 24 can only be described as highly insubordinate.

Although there is evidence in this record to the effect that the Respondent, before October 24, was thinking of firing Betty Gonzalez because of her role in the Staff Association,[38] the facts show that Gonzalez, by her conduct on October 24, gave the Respondent ample and good cause to discharge her. Indeed, the credible testimony of Wanda Evans was that to the extent that the employees' support for the Staff Association was discussed, it was mentioned not as a reason for discharge, but rather as a reason for not taking such action. Thus, according to Evans, management was concerned that if they did discharge the three employees, this might lead to an adverse reaction by the remaining staff and precipitate another strike. She testified that given the lack of respect shown to Dr. Alpert as medical director there was no alternative but to discharge the three employees. I agree, and shall recommend that these allegations of the complaint be dismissed.

[37] In this context, an alleged statement to Pacheco by Dr. Alpert, on October 24, that Betances was going to get rid of the troublemakers does not imply that the Company was motivated by the employees' union activities.

[38] See the testimony of Pacheco concerning her conversation with Supervisor Eladio Reyues wherein he allegedly told her, around October 18, that Betty Gonzalez was going to be fired.

G. Discharge of Deborah Pacheco

When the three National Health Service Corps assignees were transferred out of Betances, the employees comprising the Staff Association decided to commence a strike on Monday, October 27, 1980. Such a strike did ensue on that date and Deborah Pacheco participated in that strike. There is no dispute about the fact that she was discharged because of her participation in the strike. The Staff Association did not, however, give the written 10-day notices required by Section 8(g) of the Act. In support of his case, the General Counsel states:

> Although the undersigned strenuously agrees that the Association herein is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) it is far from a sophisticated labor organization and it possesses no affiliation with such a labor organization. It is a loosely organized band of employees which sought mutual aid and protection. Certainly it is not the type of entity envisioned by Section 8(g). Further, and perhaps more compelling, is the fact that on October 27, everyone in the Association, with the exception of Lisa Garcia, who abandoned her support for it, had been discharged. Pacheco was an employee working alone. Finally, there can be no question that the pervasive and insidious pattern of unfair labor practices committed by Respondent caused the walk out by Pacheco and therefore no notice was required.

I agree with the General Counsel to the extent that if there had never existed a Staff Association, the ensuing strike by the employees would not have required the 8(g) notices.[39] However, it seems to me that the General Counsel is, in effect, seeking to have his cake while eating it. On the one hand he asserts that the Staff Association is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, with which the Respondent has an obligation to bargain, while asserting, on the other hand, that it is not a labor organization within the meaning of Section 8(g) of the Act. I can see no statutory support for this proposition, and the case cited by the General Counsel is inapposite. In A & D Davenport, Inc., 256 NLRB 463 (1981), the Board held that 8(g) notices were not required from an employee group that was unaffiliated with any existing labor organization, was unstructured, and was only presenting grievances. However, the Board also concluded that the group in question was not a "statutorily defined labor organization."

Regarding the contention that the strike of October 27 was caused by the "pervasive and insidious pattern of unfair labor practices" the facts show that the proximate cause of the strike was the transfer of the Federal employees out of Betances that was not an unfair labor practice. Also, to the extent that the decision to strike may have been reinforced by the Company's decision to discharge Betty Gonzalez, Nancy Feliciano, and Elva Morales, I have previously concluded that such discharges were not violative of the Act. The only unlawful action by the Respondent proceeding this strike was the discharge of Martin Garcia on October 9. However, to the extent that the strike may have been called to include a protest over his discharge, this is not considered by me as such a "serious" or "flagrant" unfair labor practice so as to excuse the failure to tender the proper 8(g) notices.[40]

The General Counsel asserts that on October 27 everyone in the Association with the exception of Lisa Garcia had been discharged. I am not sure what is intended by this statement other than to reassert, as previously asserted, that the Employer's conduct was flagrant. Yet, I have concluded above that most of the discharges, with exception of William Zayerz on September 9 and Martin Garcia on October 9, were for good cause shown.

In view of my agreement with the General Counsel that the Staff Association was indeed a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act, I must also conclude that it was required to give the proper 8(g) notice prior to the strike of October 27. As it did not do so, and as I do not view the Employer's conduct as being of such a serious or flagrant nature so as to nullify the notice requirements, I conclude that the discharge of Pacheco was privileged under Section 8(d) of the Act.

H. Closing of Betances on November 17, 1980

It is the General Counsel's theory that the Employer violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act when it temporarily closed its facility from November 17, 1980, to mid-January 1981 without first having given notice to and offering to bargain about the decision with the Staff Association. As I have concluded above that the Staff Association was not entitled to bargaining rights, and was not therefore the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of Betances' employees, I shall recommend that this allegation be dismissed.

[39] In Walker Methodist Residence, 227 NLRB 1630 (1977), the Board held that Sec. 8(g) only applies to labor organizations and does not apply to work stoppages engaged in by unorganized employees.

[40] In Cedercrest, Inc., 246 NLRB 870, 876 (1978), the judge, in an opinion adopted by the Board, concluded that "serious" or "flagrant" unfair labor practices which provoke a strike, may abrogate the 8(g) notice requirements. See also Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Betances Health Unit, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and a health-related facility within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

2. The Betances Health Unit Staff Association is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. The discharge of William Zayerz constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. The discharge of Martin Garcia constituted a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affected commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Except to the extent herein found, the Respondent has not violated the Act in any other manner.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent had engaged in certain violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and that it take certain affirmative action to effectuate the policies of the Act.

With respect to Martin Garcia, I shall recommend that he be made whole and that the Employer offer him full and immediate reinstatement to his former position of employment or, if it no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position of employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges.

In the case of William Zayerz it is my conclusion that this case essentially involves one of an accelerated discharge. Thus, although I have concluded that his discharge on September 9 was motivated by discriminatory reasons, I have also concluded that because of the Company's financial situation after September 15, he would have been let go either on September 26 or no later than September 30. As Mr. Zayerz was paid through September 18, his loss would only be for 12 days at most. Also, because I have concluded that Zayerz would have lost his job no later than September 30 for legitimate reasons, I shall not order that the Company be required to offer him reinstatement.

In both cases of lost pay, the amounts of backpay shall be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See, generally, Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Additionally, it is recommended that the Respondent remove from its files any reference to the discharge of Martin Garcia and to notify him, in writing, that this had been done, and that evidence thereof shall not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[41]

ORDER

The Respondent, Betances Health Unit, Inc., New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging employees because of their membership in or participation in the activities of the Betances Health Unit Staff Association, or any other labor organization, or because of their protected concerted activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Martin Garcia immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the discharge of Martin Garcia on October 9, and notify him, in writing that this has been done, and that evidence thereof shall not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

(d) Post at its place of business copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[42] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violation not specifically found.

[41] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[42] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION, ORDER, AND CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 9 September 1986 Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief[1] in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Delta Gas, Inc., A Subsidiary of Louisiana Energy & Development Corporation, Homeplace, Louisiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

[1] In her brief the General Counsel requests that the Board modify the judge's recommended Order to include a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Order. We have concluded that under the circumstances of this case such a clause is not warranted.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The judge inadvertently failed to include in his notice a provision ordering the Respondent to remove from its files any reference to the unlawful denial of wage increases to August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley and to its discharge of Riley and to notify them that this has been done. We shall therefore issue a new notice to employees which includes this provision.

CERTIFICATION OF REPRESENTATIVE

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have been cast for Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union and its Local 4–447, and it is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All production and maintenance employees including meter readers/servicemen, measurement technicians, welders, construction and repair crewmen and warehouse employees employed by the Employer at its Homeplace and Jonesboro, Louisiana facilities; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize
To form, join, or assist any union
To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
To act together for other mutual aid or protection
To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten you that you have been denied a pay increase because of your union and protected activities.

WE WILL NOT tell you that you will not receive a wage increase because you and the Labor Board have sued the Company.

WE WILL NOT deny you pay increases because you engage in union activities, or give testimony, or engage in other concerted activities protected under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT discharge you because you engage in union activities, give testimony, or engage in other concerted activities protected under the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to Mervin Riley to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges.

WE WILL make August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley whole for any loss or earnings they may have suffered by reason of our discrimination against them with interest.

WE WILL notify August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley that we have removed from our files any references to their failure to receive wage increases and to Riley's discharge.

WE WILL notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of our unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against any of these employees.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in New Orleans, Louisiana, on 17 and 18 March and 9, 10, and 11 April 1986. The charge in Case 15–CA–9809 was filed by Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union and its Local 4–447 on 22 October 1985 and amended on 27 and 29 November 1985. In its answer and through stipulation at the hearing, Respondent admitted that at material times it has been an employer, incorporated in Louisiana, with a facility located at Homeplace, Louisiana, where it is engaged in the business of transporting and distributing natural gas; and, during a representative 12-month period, it derived gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and purchased natural gas through its interstate system, from outside the State of Louisiana, valued in excess of $50,000; and that it is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2), engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act). Respondent also admitted that the Charging Party (Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

In its answer Respondent alleged that it has been denied due process by the General Counsel serving Respondent with amended charges on and 3 days after the day Respondent received the complaint. No evidence was offered at the hearing to further support Respondent's allegation that it was denied due process. I find, on the basis of the information before me, that Respondent was not denied due process.

Respondent also admitted the complaint allegation that Ed Daigle, vice president of engineering and operations, and Lawrence Williams, distribution supervisor, are supervisors of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act. Respondent denied that Daigle and Williams are its agents. On the basis of the entire record and the provisions of Section 2(13) of the Act, I find that both Daigle and Williams were agents of Respondent at all material times. Daigle, who has his office in New Orleans, is one of Respondent's supervisors with overall authority over its Homeplace operations. Williams is the on-board supervisor at Homeplace with supervisory authority over a majority of the Homeplace work force. Both Daigle and Williams supervise other lower-level supervisors.

The complaint, as amended at the hearing, alleged and Respondent denied that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) by threatening employees that they had not received a wage increase because of their union and protected concerted activities; by threatening an employee that it had terminated another employee because of his union and/or protected concerted activities; and by telling its employees that they would not receive a wage increase because of the pending unfair labor practice charges in Case 15–CA–9809; and that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) by refusing to grant wage increases to employees August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley since 1 October 1985; and by discharging Mervin Riley on 17 October 1985 because of the employees' union activities and/or protected concerted activities and/or because of the employees' testimony in a prior unfair labor practice hearing.

Additionally in accord with proceedings in Case 15–RC–7190, at issue are six challenged ballots and matters regarding the Employer's (Respondent) objections to conduct affecting the results of an NLRB election conducted on 19 and 20 September 1985. The bargaining unit set forth in the Decision and Direction of Election is as follows:

> All production and maintenance employees including meter readers/servicemen, measurement technicians, welders, construction and repair crewmen and warehouse and employees employed by the Employer at its Homeplace and Jonesboro, Louisiana facilities; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The tally of ballots shows 13 votes were cast for the Union (Charging Party), 9 votes were cast against the Union, and there were 6 challenged ballots. The challenged ballots are sufficient in number to affect the result of the election. Those challenges were to the ballots of Gerald Ragas, August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, Timothy Williams, Sam Cooper, and Steve Lehew.

The objections to be considered herein relate to the Respondent's Objections 2, 4, and 5 "insofar as they relate to the facts and surrounding circumstances of the alleged threats directed against employee Douglas Dinet on or about 2 August 1985." (See G.C. Exhs. 1(X) and 1(Z)).[1]

Case 15–RC–7190

The Challenged Ballots

1. Respondent, the Employer, challenged the ballots of Gerald Ragas, August Mackey, and J. C. Ragas alleging that each of those three is a supervisor.

Gerald Ragas: Gerald Ragas testified that since March 1985 he has been over the construction crew which included employees Shaftner Williams, Douglas Dinet, Patrick Dinet, Errol Turner, Dwight Bartholomew, and Mervin Riley. When Ragas assumed his position over the construction crew he was told by Superintendent Lawrence Williams[2] that he had authority to "suspend employees." Ragas receives daily orders from Lawrence Williams and it is Ragas' responsibility to see that the construction crew satisfactorily performs Williams' orders. Ragas admitted that he once directed employee Patrick Williams to either do a specific job or "the next time go home." In an earlier unfair labor practice proceeding, Case 15–CA–9709, Gerald Ragas admitted that Lawrence Williams told him that he was promoted to supervisor (see G.C. Exh. 15).

The Union argues that Ragas never exercised his authority to suspend employees and that Respondent's position is not supported by documentation in its files. The Union also argued that neither Gerald Ragas nor the construction crew viewed Ragas as the boss. Concerning the Union's first point, while Ragas has never suspended anyone, he has threatened use of that authority as evidenced by his testimony regarding Patrick Willimas. Concerning documentation, although some employers maintain office files documenting all promotion, especially promotions to supervisory positions, the Act does not require such documentation. A person may be a supervisor even though there is no documentation supporting his promotion. Finally, concerning how the crew views Ragas, I note that one of General Counsel's witnesses, Dwight Bartholomew, a member of the construction crew, testified that both Lawrence Williams and Gerald Ragas supervise his crew. Even though Bartholomew's testimony was conclusionary, it does tend to undermine the Union's contention that the crew did not consider Ragas as their boss.

Lawrence Williams testified regarding Gerald Ragas' promotion:

> I told him I needed him, I want to give him a promotion to be supervisor over construction and maintenance, and what his duties was, you know, what his duty was as a supervisor. I would hand him—give him the work down, he pass it to the crew. He see that the crew do the work. If the crew didn't do the work, then he reported back to me. And I also give him the authority to get out there, if somebody won't do what he want them to do, bring them to me or either suspend them for X amount of days, as many days as he wanted to. I give him that authority. And he accepted that.

Finally, I note that all counsel stipulated that Gerald Ragas is a supervisor (see Tr. 323).

The evidence shows that Ragas directed work of the construction crew, possessed the authority to suspend employees, and threatened to suspend an employee. I find that he qualifies under the definition of supervisor stated in Section 2(11) of the Act. Big Rivers Electric Corp., 266 NLRB 380 (1983); Spring Valley Farms, 272 NLRB 1323 (1984).

Therefore, I recommend that the challenge to the ballot of Gerald Ragas be sustained.

August Mackey: August Mackey testified that he has worked for Respondent for about 18 years. Mackey's employee data sheet shows that he was hired on 4 December 1967 and that since 1 November 1980 Mackey has held the position of "chief service man & plant operator."

Mackey testified that he installs and disconnects gas meters, lights pilot lights, and "things like that." According to Mackey he and one other employee, serviceman helper Patrick Dinet, make up his crew. Mackey testified that when requested to help by another employee, including Claudia Phillips, Mackey would help that employee.

According to Mackey, on two occasions, once by Lawrence Williams and on another occasion by Ed Daigle and Lawrence Williams, he was told that "if somebody do something wrong I can give them a few days off, but I couldn't fire them." Mackey recalled that the first of those two occasions occurred after the representation hearing and prior to the election in Case 15–RC–7190. In a pretrial affidavit given the Regional Office, Mackey testified:

> Williams told me for the first time after the first NLRB hearing in this matter that I am a supervisor, and I can discipline employees, but I can't hire or fire. That was the first I had heard of any such authority. I did not agree with his statement. Since then my duties and responsibilities have not changed.

Mackey admitted that Vice President Ed Daigle told him:

[1] Over objection by the General Counsel, Respondent also introduced evidence which it alleged to be objectionable from employee Steve Lehew regarding alleged comments by employee Errol Turner at a "shrimp boil or barbecue" sometime in July 1985. I have reviewed the entire record and I find that Lehew's testimony in that regard is outside the scope of the Board's Order directing a hearing on Respondent's objections. The Board's Order specifically reversed the Regional Director's Supplemental Decision and Order regarding "Employer's Objections 2, 4, and 5 insofar as they relate to the facts and surrounding circumstances of the alleged threats directed against employee Douglas Dinet on or about 2 August 1985."

The testimony at issue clearly involves employees, a date, and a place other than those involved in the incident specified in the Board Order. Therefore I shall not consider that testimony in my determination regarding the objections.

[2] In the complaint as noted above Lawrence Williams is designated supervisor. However, at various places in the record and on occasion in this decision, Williams is referred to as the superintendent.

"We just want to advise you of your powers." So he said, "August, you have the power to discipline. You don't have the power to fire, you don't have the power to hire." And I said, "I didn't know nothing about these powers." He said, "You always did have." And that was that.

Mackey testified he has never actually disciplined an employee. According to Mackey he does not assign work to employees. Mackey said that he gets his assignments on a work order from the office each morning.

Claudia Phillips, a meter reader, testified that on occasion "when we finished reading meters" she performs other duties including helping August Mackey "do service work." When asked if she had a supervisor she reported to, Phillips answered "August."

Under cross-examination by Respondent's counsel, Claudia Phillips testified:

Q. Has [Lawrence Williams] ever told you that August does not have the authority to suspend you?

A. Yes.

Q. When did he tell you that?

A. A very long time ago. When—I can't exactly say. When I was first hired. But it was just—during around that time he did tell me that.

Q. This would be around the end of 1981?

A. Oh, no.

Q. Well, I thought that's when you were hired, is what I—

A. Yes, I was hired in '81, but it was—I was hired in November.

Q. 1981?

A. Yes, I guess it was 81, and maybe, say maybe '83, '84. August is, you know, he's horrible sometimes.

Q. And you were worried about what he could do to your job?

A. Well, he—they used to get a kick out of making me cry, and they just would tease me and stuff. I always used to go to Lawrence, but he told me don't ever worry about August because he can't fire me or give me no time off or nothing like that.

Lawrence Williams testified that August Mackey was already supervisor over service and meter reading, when Williams became superintendent about 5 years ago. Williams recalled explaining August Mackey's duties to Mackey about 3 years ago:

A. Well, like I say, I was—I was being—you know, I had been superintendent for about two years. Okay, I was learning a lot of things that I didn't know about, and I didn't have time—you know, because he was already supervisor. I didn't have a chance to talk to him because I was in a learning process. Okay, after I caught on to what I needed to know, then me and him sat down and talked about it, and I told him what I would like him as a supervisor, and what was his duties.

Q. And what did you tell him?

A. I told him he was in charge of the meter readers and the service work. The meters readers, if they did wrong he was supposed to check them out. If the meter readers do something that need to be talked about, he talked to me. If they do something that offended him, he had, you know, offended him concerning the job, he had a right to suspend them also.

Williams testified that he, along with Ed Daigle, met with Mackey during the representation proceeding because Mackey was "always telling [Williams] that he's not a supervisor."

Ed Daigle recalled from his records that he discussed Mackey's duties with Mackey on 24 October 1985. According to Daigle:

Q. And who attended this meeting?

A. It was Lawrence Williams, August Mackey and myself.

Q. And what was said at this meeting?

A. I started the meeting by explaining to August that Lawrence had asked me to come down, that there seemed to be some question about what his job title and responsibilities were. I explained to him at that time, "August, you are, as you always have been, you are the supervisor for customer service. Your responsibilities are to direct the work of the meter readers and the servicemen, that you have the right to discipline those people, if they should do anything that you feel like they ought to be sent home for, you have the authority to send them home right there on the spot." It was pretty short and sweet, and that was the gist of it.

Q. What did he say, if anything?

A. He responded to me with a big smile and said, "Okay, I just wanted to know how it was," and that was the entire subject of the meeting.

Q. Were these responsibilities you've just described, were these new responsibilities?

A. No, they were not.

Q. Were they the responsibilities that he had as far as you were concerned ever since you had been with Delta Gas?

A. Since—since he was promoted to his position and since before my time at Delta Gas.

Conclusions: The testimony of Phillips, Mackey, Lawrence Williams, and Daigle, all indicate that August Mackey has exercised authority over both the meter reading crew and the service crew for a number of years. I am convinced through examination of the entire record, that Mackey's duties have not changed since his last promotion on 1 November 1980. The record shows that he is responsible for the work of five employees including service employees and meter readers. Moreover, as admitted by Mackey, he has been instructed on two or more occasions that he has the authority to discipline employees including the authority to send an employee home. Additionally, Mackey testified in a pretrial affidavit that he was told by Lawrence Williams that he is a supervisor. As in the case of Gerald Ragas, the record shows that Mackey is a supervisor as defined in Section 2(11) of the Act. I recommend that the challenge to Mackey's ballot be sustained.

J. C. Ragas: Ed Daigle testified that J. C. Ragas currently holds the nonsupervisory position of measurement technician. According to Daigle and records in the files, from 1 October 1984 until 10 October 1985 J. C. Ragas was a senior measurement technician. Daigle testified that during that period, J. C. Ragas had "the authority to discipline or suspend on the spot as the other two supervisors (Gerald Ragas and August Mackey)." Daigle testified that before 25 June 1985 J. C. Ragas directed the work of employee A. J. Duplessis, and after Duplessis moved out of the measurement section, various employees from the construction crew were assigned as J. C. Ragas' helper. On 10 October 1985 Ragas was displaced and demoted from senior measurement technician to measurement technician. Currently, Jim Barron holds the senior measurement technician position. However, Ed Daigle admitted that although he was the one that appointed J. C. Ragas to the position of senior measurement technician, he did not tell Ragas of his supervisory authority and, to his knowledge, no other supervisor explained to Ragas that Ragas was a supervisor.

A. J. Duplessis testified regarding his former position of meter technician assistant and his understanding of the authority of J. C. Ragas:

> Q. So J. C. was there to help train you?
> A. Right, J. C. was more or less training me in this line of work.
> Q. Did he have any authority to suspend you?
> A. No.
> Q. Who had that authority?
> A. Bobby Cure or Mr. Ed Daigle.
> Q. Did he have any authority to reprimand you?
> A. No. Not to my knowledge, he didn't. Never did.
> Q. Who was responsible for giving you your job assignments?
> A. Bobby Cure would make—well, the schedule would come from New Orleans office. We had a schedule to go by. It would come from the New Orleans office, and Bobby would make sure that it was being run by this schedule, or he would assign us jobs or change our positions, the jobs if we have to. If he had to change us from the schedule, well he'll change us, he'll tell us. He would tell J. C. and J. C. would say we had to do this, so we'd get it done.

J. C. Ragas testified that until 11 October 1985 he worked under the supervision of Bobby Cure. Ragas described his job as senior measurement technician:

> A. I test gas flow meters, change charts, sample gas, fight meters in—
> Q. I'm sorry, I couldn't hear you.
> A. Fight meters in, take specific gravities of gas, inspect orifice plates.
> Q. Is that orifice plates?
> A. Orifice plates, yes.

Ragas tested meters pursuant to a schedule prepared by his supervisor Bobby Cure. As to his alleged supervisory authority J. C. Ragas testified:

> Q. As a measurement technician, do you have any authority to discipline employees?
> A. No, I don't.
> Q. Do you have any authority to reprimand employees?
> A. No, I don't.
> Q. To send them home?
> A. No.
> Q. Who has that authority?
> A. Ed Daigle, I imagine or Robert Cure, I don't think he could discipline anybody, which—well, he did tell me, yeah, he could have disciplined me or sent me home, Robert Cure.
> Q. How about Mr. Baron, does he have any of that authority now?
> A. No, he never told me.
> Q. Who gives you your work orders?
> A. I get them from Jimmy Baron.
> Q. And before Mr. Baron?
> A. I used to get them from Robert Cure.

Ragas testified that only one employee worked under his direction:

> Q. And do have anybody now working with you as a helper?
> A. No, I don't.
> Q. When was the last time you've had a helper working for you?
> A. The last helper I had was A. J. Duplessis.
> Q. And when was that?
> A. Up until June, the last part of June when they took him out of measurement and put him back in the crew.
> Q. Doing what?
> A. I think he went back in the gang as a shovelman or whatever.
> Q. Shovelman, are you talking about a common laborer?
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. Is there any—the type of work you do, is that anywhere related to that at all?
> A. No, sir, it's different.
> Q. Do you work with a shovel?
> A. No.
> Q. Do you have any authority to give out work assignments at all?
> A. No.

On cross-examination Ragas testified:

> Q. And at that time, the beginning of last year, you had A. J. Duplessis also working in measurement, correct?
> A. Yes.
> Q. And at that time were you not keeping A. J.'s time sheets for him?
> A. You mean keeping his time sheets?

Q. Yes.
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Keeping his time sheets, all right. And weren't you training him on what work to do out at the meters?
A. I was more or less training him, yeah.
Q. More or less? Weren't you the one training him?
A. Well, I was training him when he was working with me. He wasn't working all the time with me.
Q. Because sometimes he would work on some meters and you would work on others?
A. We'd go opposite ways.
Q. He did not know how, for example, to calibrate meters, did he?
A. No, he never got into it.
Q. You were supposed to be training him on that?
A. No, he wasn't there long enough.
Q. If he had stayed there you were the one who would train him on how to calibrate a meter?
A. Yes.
Q. And you were the one who trained him on how to change charts?
A. No.
Q. You didn't train him on anything, is that your testimony here today?
A. I never trained him on changing charts, no.
Q. What did you train him on?
A. I taught him how to catch a sample, how to run a gravity, how to get a dew point, how to change an orifice plate.

Conclusions: Unlike Gerald Ragas and August Mackey, J. C. Ragas was never told that he possessed any supervisory authority. The record proved that J. C. Ragas regularly engaged in routine duties as a measurement technician. He did not exercise independent judgment but followed the directions of his immediate supervisor Bob Cure. Cure had overall supervision of some five employees. After June 1985 J. C. Ragas worked without the assistance of a regular helper. As to his helper, the record showed that neither Ragas nor the helper understood that Ragas had any supervisory authority. Ragas never directed more than one employee, his helper, and the helper looked to Ragas' supervisor, Bob Cure, for all supervisory directions. I found that the record shows that J. C. Ragas was not a supervisor during material times. I recommend that the challenge to his ballot be overruled.

2. The Union challenged the ballot of Timothy Williams, Sam Cooper, and Steven Lehew.

Timothy Williams: Timothy Williams is a son of Homeplace superintendent Lawrence Williams. Lawrence Williams testified that he hired Timothy Williams after consulting with Ed Daigle. Lawrence Williams testified:

A. Okay. Tim is my son. Tim was going to college. Tim hadn't worked in 21 years, and Tim—it was a opportunity for him to get a job, and I had needed the money, because like I say, I had three other children in college, and that was a way for to help Tim out, and that's why I asked Mr. Daigle to help me out and help him out, and so that's why I give him a job. And so far as Tim working for me, Tim was a—it was working relationship. It wasn't a father and son deal. I treated him just like I treat my other employees.

According to Lawrence Williams, Timothy Williams was a full-time employee that received "no special favors." However, according to Lawrence Williams both he and Ed Daigle knew that Timothy Williams planned to quit his job and return to college in January 1986.[3] In that regard Lawrence Williams testified:

Q. And you hired your son, Tim Williams so that he could earn some money to go to college, didn't you?
A. Yeah.
Q. At the time you hired your son you knew he was going back to college.
A. Yeah, I knew he was going back.
Q. So Mr. Daigle was well aware of the fact when you hired Tim that he was only going to be there for the summer?
A. Yeah.
Q. And that he was going back to work in January [sic]?
A. Yeah.
Q. That was understood between you and Mr. Daigle and Timothy, wasn't it?
A. Yeah.
Q. And in fact Tim left and went back to school, didn't he?
A. That's right.
Q. As scheduled?
A. That's right. I told you why I hired him.

Lawrence Williams testified that Timothy Williams could not return to college until January 1986 and that Timothy planned to resign at that time.

The record contains Timothy Williams application for employment. That application shows a date of 6/18/85. At the bottom of the first page of the application Timothy Williams wrote: "I plan to continue my studies and become a Psychologist."

In the upper right-hand corner of Timothy Williams' application for employment the following notation appears: "hired temp. working 6 mos. only."

Respondent's "Employee Data Sheet" on Timothy Williams is also in the record. That document shows that Timothy Williams was hired on 8 August 1985 as a "Temporary Construction Worker" at the rate of $5.50 per hour. According to the testimony of Lawrence Williams, Timothy Williams worked until 17 January 1986, when he resigned to return to college.

[3] Daigle denied that he was told Timothy William planned to return to college in January. I credit the testimony of Lawrence Williams over Daigle's denial. Williams' testimony is fully supported by documents in file. Additionally, I was impressed with Williams' demeanor. Lawrence Williams has continued to be employed as Respondent's superintendent. There is no reason why he should be less than truthful regarding the employment of Timothy Williams. Lawrence Williams' testimony illustrated a keen recollection of the events surrounding the hiring of Timothy Williams. I am convinced that his recollection is good and that he testified truthfully.

Conclusions: It is obvious from Respondent's records and the credited testimony that Timothy Williams never planned to become a permanent employee. Moreover Respondent was fully aware of Timothy Williams' plans to return to school in January 1986.

Jurisprudence has established that temporary employees, like Timothy Williams, do not share sufficient community of interest with permanent unit employees to justify their inclusion in the bargaining unit. Comet Corp., 261 NLRB 14141, 1438 (1982). Timothy Williams was hired for a definite limited period as shown on documents in his personnel file and he neither expressed a desire nor had a basis to consider that he would be retained or later recalled. Meier & Frank Co., 272 NLRB 464 (1984). I find that Timothy Williams was a temporary employee and I recommend that the challenge to his ballot be sustained.

Sam Cooper: Sam Cooper was hired by Respondent on 10 August 1985 at a pay rate of $9 per hour.[4] Respondent's employee data sheet on Cooper contains a blank space under the column "position."

Cooper testified, "I'm self-employed and I also am employed by Delta Gas." Concerning his job classification with Respondent, Cooper testified:

> Q. Sam, at the time you were hired what was the job classification you were hired into?
> A. I guess—I'm not sure, I think it was Meter Technician.
> Q. Meter Technician?
> A. I'm not—I don't, I'm not sure what it was.

Cooper operates a lease service checking oil and gas wells on a "subcontract" basis for companies not associated with Respondent, including Apache Corporation and Sowell Oil and Gas. Concerning the amount of time Cooper works for Respondent each week, he testified: "It's usually about 20 hours, when I'm not too busy to help."

Cooper testified that when he is too busy with his lease service, he is unable to work for Respondent. According to Cooper, his personal business takes "preference" over his work for Respondent. Cooper worked on a normal schedule for Respondent, "unless something came up that I had an emergency." Then he could not report for work with the Respondent.

Cooper testified that his weekly schedule at Respondent has varied and the hours per day have fluctuated. Cooper recalled that he would sometimes receive a phone call from Respondent on the day before Respondent planned to change its charts and if his other work permitted he would report to Respondent to change charts on that day. As an example, Cooper testified regarding his most recent work. On the week of his testimony, March 17 through 21, Cooper was not scheduled to work for Respondent. On each of the 2 weeks before, Cooper had been scheduled to work for Respondent on each Thursday, but because he got "tied up" with his other business he did not work for Respondent on either of those weeks. Therefore, at the time of the hearing, Cooper had not worked for Respondent during any of the 3 weeks including the week of the hearing.[5]

Conclusions: The record shows that Sam Cooper is a casual employee who works on a sporadic, irregular basis, at his convenience and that his primary occupation is his lease service. I find that the circumstances of his employment are sufficient to sever any community of interest he may have had with the Respondent's regular unit employees. Mariposa Press, 273 NLRB 528, 530 fn. 12 (1984).

Steve Lehew: Steve Lehew was hired by Respondent on 18 July 1985 and he started work on 22 July 1985 as a pipeline technician at $9 per hour. Lehew reported to Bob Cure and worked at Respondent's Homeplace facility.

On 1 October 1985 Lehew transferred to Respondent's New Orleans office where his current position is "Gas Control." Concerning his employment out of Homeplace, from 22 July to 30 September 1985, Lehew testified that he did not work with any bargaining unit employees. Instead Lehew performed inspection of the work of an independent contractor in the construction of a 12-inch pipeline connecting Texas Gas Meter Station to Respondent's existing station. Lehew described his job:

> A. I was just inspecting to make sure that when Montero was building the pipe line they built it to our specifications, that there was no faults in the way they wrapped the pipe, protected the pipe, or inspected it. There's a—I was there as a backup.

In a pretrial affidavit Lehew testified that he had no work contact with any bargaining unit employees. At the hearing Lehew changed his testimony to reflect that he occasionally had contact with unit employees, maybe once or twice a week when he carried supplies or other needed items to one of the crews.

Lehew holds an A.S. degree in petroleum engineering.

Conclusions: The Union argues that Lehew should be excluded because he is a technician and has no community of interest with other unit employees.

It is true that Lehew holds a 2-year degree in petroleum engineering. However his job duties during the period before his transfer to New Orleans show that he did not engage in technical activities to a greater extent than several admitted unit employees.

Concerning community of interest, while Lehew had little or no job contacts with other unit employees, he did share common benefits, central job location, and supervision with other unit employees. Moreover, if Lehew is excluded, the position he occupied will be excluded from union representation because it would constitute a one-man unit.

[4] Other starting employees have received wage rates which varied from $3.25 per hour (in 1977) to $5.50 per hour (in 1984). Employees Sam Cooper and Steve Lehew (infra) were each hired in 1985 at pay rates of $9 per hour.

[5] Although the above example involved dates well after the election, there was no showing that Respondent had changed Cooper's job since the election.

I am mindful that Lehew's current position places him outside the scope of the unit. However, at the time of the election he was working out of Homeplace. I find that he should have been included in the unit at the time of the election and therefore, I recommend that the challenge to Lehew's ballot should be overruled.

In view of the above findings I recommend that a revised tally of ballots issue showing two challenge ballots, a number of insufficient to affect the election results.

The Objections

The Board, on 14 January 1986, directed consideration of the "employer's objections 2, 4, and 5 insofar as they relate to the facts and surrounding circumstances of the alleged threats directed against employee Douglas Dinet on or about 2 August 1985."

Douglas Dinet testified about his conversation with employee Mervin Riley on 2 August 1985:

> Q. Can you tell us as best you can remember what exchange if any did you and Mickey Riley have on that afternoon?
> A. About back pay.
> Q. About what?
> A. About back pay.
> Q. Can you tell us exactly what words was exchanged, as best you can remember?
> A. Let's see he asked me if—he asked me if I wasn't no back pay [sic], I told him. I didn't want to have nothing to do with back pay.
> Q. And was this back pay in reference to what, do you know?
>
> A. No, I don't.
> Q. Was it involving Union activity?
> A. No.
> Q. Was it a lawsuit?
> A. I guess it was, I don't know.
> Q. Did you sign a lawsuit against Delta Gas?
> A. No, I didn't sign no lawsuit.
> Q. Was that conversation you and Mickey had, did Mickey threaten you about joining the Union?
> A. No, he didn't threaten me about joining no Union.
> Q. Did Mickey threaten to fight with you that evening?
> A. No, he argued with me, but I told him I wasn't even going that route.
> Q. And the route was filing a lawsuit?
>
> A. Nope.
> Q. What was it about?
> A. About back pay and going to see a lawyer and getting some money about my back pay or something like that, and I told him I wasn't going that way, I didn't want to have nothing to do with that.
> Q. Okay. Who was the lawyer involved, do you know?
> A. Mr. Defley.
> Q. Joe Defley?
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. And you didn't want to get involved with that?
> A. That's right.
> Q. And at any time on that afternoon did anybody have to hold Mickey Riley back from attacking you?
>
> A. No, not as I know of.
> Q. Did Mickey invite you outside to beat you up?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Did Mickey in any way threaten and do you any physical harm?
> A. No.
> Q. Did at any time did Mickey talk to you about joining the Union or participating in Union activities?
> A. No.

Mervin Riley denied that he ever spoke to Douglas Dinet about the Union. Riley testified about a 2 August 1985 conversation he had with Dinet:

> A. Okay, it was around knocking off time, and a guy by the name of Tim—Tim Young, who was being introduced to us. He was a new guy they just had hired to work in the measurement department. And—let's see, we was talking, and Doug was talking, Doug was saying he needed some money for his trailer. So I walked over to Doug, and I told Doug, I said, "You see, if you come with us on the lawsuit you'll have money for your trailer." And Doug started telling me he didn't want to hear that shit. And I told him—and then he kind of got me angry, because I was trying to show him a point where he was right—where I was right and he was wrong. And earlier that day there was some allegations going around talking about tests for this and tests for that, reading this and reading that. And so I was telling Doug that the Company was bringing all these guys in here to take his job. And so he didn't like the idea I was telling him that, and so we started talking, and we started arguing, and I told him if he wanted to come in on the lawsuit he would have this money. He said he didn't want to hear that shit. And that's why I'm in trouble now, and I'm going to lose my job over this lawsuit shit.
> Q. Who was going to lose their job over the lawsuit?
> A. I was going to lose my job.
> Q. He was telling you that you were going to lose your job?
> A. Lose my job over that lawsuit shit. "That's why you all going to lose you all's job, over that lawsuit shit." And I was trying to tell him that we wasn't going to lose our job because what we was doing was right, and what they owed us would belong to us. We wasn't doing nothing illegal against the Company.
> And so we had a few words, and so I told him, I said, "Go ahead and be a dummy." And he said his old man, he's knows what they doing and stuff like that. So I said, "Well, I'm not going to help you, go ahead and be a dummy all your—you know—life." And so he didn't like the idea I was talking to him about it, and so we started arguing and raising our voices, and that was it.

Q. Did this discussion have anything to do with Union activities?

A. No.

Q. Was the Union ever discussed in that discussion?

A. No.

Q. Was the word "Union" ever mentioned?

A. No.

Claudia Phillips also testified about the 2 August conversation between Dinet and Riley:

A. Okay, it was right about—it was right before time for us—it right before it was time for us to go home, and something—it started off, Mickey was telling Douglas about going up to Joe Defley's office to sign a papers—to sign papers to join us in the suit to get back pay, and Douglas was saying that he wasn't going up there to sign the paper and we just said, "Well, you already signed one with us, so why don't you want to go and sign another one, sign this one with the lawyer and get some money back, because you have more to lose—you have more money to get back than us because you've been here longer than what we have?" And Douglas kept—you know, you couldn't make Douglas understand, you know, that it was for his benefit. And Mickey called him Stupid and stuff like that, and Douglas you know, he said some stuff back and that was it. Mickey left and Douglas punched his clock and he left.

Finally, Steve Lehew was called by Respondent. Lehew presented a different version of the 2 August incident:

A. Bob Cure walked out with Tim Young, who was hired as a metering technician, to assist J. C. Ragas in his metering calibrations and checking on meter stations. Bob Cure introduced Tim Young to J. C. Ragas, and said, "J. C., this is Tim Young. He's going to be working for Delta Gas as metering assistant. He'll be working with you." And they introduced themselves to each other, Tim Young and J. C. J. C. asked him if he had ever done any metering work beforehand, and Tim said, "No, I just graduated from Vocational—or Votech school, and my first job." And at that point Mickey Riley exploded, I should say, and get real upset and said, "They've gone and hired another Votech student. We're not going to ever get anywhere, we'll never be anything." And he was cursing a lot and yelling, and then he turned to Douglas and said, "And you, you wanted to vote no for the Union. You're stupid. You're too stupid to get a job anywhere else. Why do you want to vote no?" And Douglas just said, "Leave me alone and don't bother me." And he said, "We're never going to get anywhere, we'll never be anything. You're being stupid." And then at that point he kind of—he turned like he was going to—not hit Douglas, but just wanted to get closer to him, and the rest of the crew members separated them. And Mickey continued to yell and make a lot of comments about the white crew being hired and the black crew, and that the votes were trying to be stacked against them, but then he turned to Douglas again and said, "Let's step outside. You're too stupid to do anything, let's step outside. And you're stupid 'cause you want to vote no." And Douglas said "Leave me along [sic]." Mickey lunged at him, and some of the men just separated them, said "Don't fight in here, don't fight in here." Mickey said, "Let's go out front. Let's go out front, let's get out of the warehouse, let's go out front." And Douglas just stood behind everybody and wouldn't approach Mickey and wouldn't answer him or anything. Finally after a few minutes Mickey was mad and he just punched out and left. Douglas waited around a few minutes, and then he punched out and he left.

Conclusions: Respondent argues that the testimony of Steve Lehew should be credited over that of Riley, Dinet, and Phillips.[6]

Respondent concedes in its brief that the record failed to show that Riley was an authorized spokesman for the Union. Nevertheless, Respondent argues that Steve Lehew's testimony reveals conduct by Riley which justifies sustaining its objections and setting aside the election.

On 2 August 1985, both the so called wage and hour or overtime suit and the union campaign were active issues among some, if not all, Respondent's Homeplace employees. On 21 June 1985 some 12 employees including Mervin Riley filed suit against Respondent claiming that they were being deprived of earned overtime pay. In a prior unfair labor practice hearing (Case 15–CA–9709), Mervin Riley was identified as one of three employees that set up the meeting with the lawyer that resulted in the filing of the overtime suit. According to Respondent's vice president, Ed Daigle, only two Homeplace employees did not join as plaintiffs in that suit. One of those two employees was Douglas Dinet.

Regarding the union campaign, the Union filed the 15–RC–7190 petition on 11 July 1985. As of 2 August an election date had not been set. In fact the representation case hearing was not held until 5 August.

Respondent argues in its brief that the union campaign was a hot topic on 2 August. However, in view of the status of the overtime suit and Douglas Dinet's failure to engage in that suit, it appears more likely that any hostility from Riley involved the suit rather than the Union. In that regard I am mindful that Mervin Riley is an alleged 8(a)(3) discriminatee in this case. It would be in Riley's interest to show that he was deeply involved in union activities. However, Riley testified that the only employees that he talked to about the Union were A. J. Duplessis, Errol Turner, and the several white employees hired by Respondent. Riley admitted that he told the white employees that he felt Respondent had hired them to "block the Union" because he felt there was not enough work otherwise to justify their employment. Steve Lehew is white. Riley said nothing about race in his comments to the "white" employees. The record does not show when Riley talked to the white employees nor does it show whether those employees were eligible to vote.

[6] Respondent also pointed to testimony by employee Joseph Rhodes as supporting the testimony of Steve Lehew. Rhodes testified regarding a conversation between himself and Douglas Dinet in which Dinet told him "they had threatened to whip his ass if he didn't go along with them." I find that Rhodes testimony contributes nothing to assist in the resolution of this credibility issue. The comments Dinet allegedly made to Rhodes could just as well have involved the wage and hour suit which was the focus of the 2 August confrontation between Dinet and Riley according to Riley, Dinet, and Phillips, as it could have been referring to the union election.

According to Riley he did not speak up in any of the antiunion meetings held by Respondent. However, Riley did speak up about his pay. Riley admitted that he told Vice President Daigle that he should have received a higher pay increase than the $36-a-month increase he did receive in October 1984.

I find that I am unable to discredit the testimony of Dinet, Riley, and Phillips regarding the subject of the Dinet-Riley confrontation on 2 August. I was especially impressed with Claudia Phillips' demeanor and her testimony regarding that incident.

Additionally, I note that Phillips also testified in support of Riley regarding his union activities. Phillips testified that she did not hear Riley talk about the Union.

I am convinced that Steve Lehew was mistaken in his understanding of why Riley was upset with Douglas Dinet on 2 August. Lehew started work for Respondent on 22 July, a month after the "overtime" suit was filed. Lehew was not one of the employees involved in that suit and there is no showing that he was aware of the suit. As shown above Lehew had little or no job contact with other employees. Additionally, I note that of all the witnesses regarding Riley and Dinet, no one recalled any references to race other than Lehew. I do not believe Lehew's testimony.

In view of my findings, the credited evidence fails to support Respondent's contention in its objections. Specifically, the record fails to show that anything was said to employee Douglas Dinet on 2 August 1985 regarding the Union, the union election or Dinet's vote. Therefore, I recommend that Respondent's objections be overruled and the election results certified.

The 8(a)(1) allegations

(1) On or about 1 November 1985 Respondent through Lawrence Williams threatened employees that they were denied pay raises because of the Union or protected activities.

August Mackey testified that on 1 November 1985, in the warehouse, he and J. C. Ragas asked Lawrence Williams why they had not received a raise. Raises had been granted to some other employees in October 1985. Lawrence Williams expressed surprise saying he had been told some of the hourly men received a raise. Williams then asked Mackey and Ragas, "You're sure you didn't get one?" Then Williams said: "Well its a bottom line, because you participated in union activities, and you sued the company for back wages."

J. C. Ragas recalled Lawrence Williams' response to he and Mackey's inquiries about why they did not receive raises in October 1985: "Well . . . you know, you all suing those people. . . . You figure people are going to give you all a raise . . . and you all having union activities."

On cross Ragas recalled that Lawrence Williams included a comment about the bottom line, saying "because you all got those people in a law suit, the bottom line is your union activity."

Lawrence Williams recalled that only August Mackey asked why he had not received a raise. Williams said that he replied to Mackey that he did not know why Mackey had not received a raise. Williams admitted saying, "You know as well as I know why you didn't get one, but I don't know why."

According to Williams, Mackey asked if it was because of the Union and Williams replied, "I don't know, your guess is as good as mine."

Conclusion: Both August Mackey and J. C. Ragas impressed me as truthful in their testimony about a 1 November conversation with Lawrence Williams. On the other hand Lawrence Williams appeared equivocal in his version of that conversation especially in regard to whether J. C. Ragas was present. The testimony of Mackey and Ragas were similar although not so similar as to indicate collusion in preparing their testimony. I am convinced that Williams told them that they had not received an October raise because they had sued Respondent and because of the union activities. That comment has the tendency to coerce and restrain employees in regard to protected rights and is violative of Section 8(a)(1).

(2) On 17 October 1985, Respondent, through Lawrence Williams, threatened that it had discharged an employee because of his union and/or protected activities.

J. C. Ragas testified to a conversation with Superintendent Lawrence Williams after Mervin Riley was discharged on 17 October 1985. Ragas placed the conversation in Respondent's warehouse around 11 a.m. Ragas complained to Williams that it was not right for Respondent to discharge Riley because Riley had an auto accident while he was off work. Williams told Ragas: "Well, John, you know when you're suing those people, and the bottom line is they fired the man for his union activities."

Lawrence Williams denied talking to J. C. Ragas late on the morning of 17 October and he denied telling Ragas that Respondent had fired Riley because of the Union.

Conclusion: I found above that Lawrence Williams threatened J. C. Ragas and August Mackey that they had been denied a wage increase because of their involvement in suing Respondent and because of their union activities. In general I find J. C. Ragas was a truthful witness. However, his testimony about the 17 October conversation with Lawrence Williams is bothersome. I am especially concerned with the similarity of Ragas' testimony about his 1 November and 17 October conversations with Williams. Under cross-examination regarding the 1 November 1985 conversation, Ragas recalled Williams saying: "The reason why you all didn't get a raise . . . because you all got those people in a law suit, and the bottom line is your union activity."

The above testimony is similar to that of August Mackey regarding the same incident. That is to be expected if, as I believe, both Ragas and Mackey were truthful on that occasion. However, it is difficult to believe that Williams' 1 November comment would be almost the same comment he made on 17 October 1985 in regard to the discharge of Mervin Riley. That comment, as recalled by J. C. Ragas was: "Well, John, . . . you know when you're suing those people, and the bottom line is they fired the man for his union activities."

Although J. C. Ragas gave several affidavits to the Region, including one on 5 November, he did not testify about Lawrence Williams telling him the reasons for Riley's discharge, until 11 March 1986. Ragas offered a reasonable explanation of why the 17 October conversation was not included in his 5 November affidavit. However, due to the similarities between what he recalled Lawrence Williams said on 1 November and what Lawrence Williams said on 17 October, a strong possibility exists that those conversations had become confused in Ragas' mind when he testified in the 11 March 1986 affidavit. Under those circumstances, I shall not credit Ragas' version of the 17 October conversation because it was not supported by any other evidence. Lawrence Williams denied that the conversation took place.

(3) On or about 4 March 1986 Respondent, through Ed Daigle, told employees they would not receive a wage increase because of pending unfair labor practice charges.

August Mackey recalled a conversation involving Ed Daigle, J. C. Ragas, Lawrence Williams, and himself in Lawrence Williams' office on 4 March 1986. Daigle came to Homeplace because Mackey and Ragas had asked Lawrence Williams for a pay raise. Williams said he could not grant a raise but he agreed to ask Daigle to come and discuss their requests. According to Mackey, Daigle told him and Ragas that Respondent cannot give them a raise because "We had sued the company for . . . or rather him for an unfair labor practice." Daigle went on, "You people have filed it. The Labor Board, they filed it."

J. C. Ragas recalled the same conversation. Ragas also recalled that Daigle told him and Mackey that they could not receive a raise because they "filed a unfair labor practice charge against us." Daigle continued saying, "It would be up to the judge to decide whether they received a raise."

According to Lawrence Williams' version of the 4 March 1986 conversation, Daigle told Ragas and Mackey that "he cannot talk about no raise at the time because everything was in court."

Williams admitted that he did not recall all that was said between Daigle, Mackey, and J. C. Ragas.

Daigle recalled the 4 March meeting. He testified that Mackey told him they would "like to talk to [him] about some green." Daigle replied: "August, I can't talk to you about that. We've already had our raises back in October. This whole thing is a matter of Unfair Labor Practice Act now, and there is nothing I can discuss with you."

Daigle, Ragas, and Mackey agreed that they discussed the possibility of a crawfish boil after concluding their discussion regarding the pay raise request.

Conclusion: I noticed that three witnesses, Mackey, Ragas, and Lawrence Williams all recalled that Daigle said something about a suit, court, or a judge, in their recollection of the 4 March conversation. According to Daigle he said nothing about court, instead Daigle recalled saying the raise question was a matter of "Unfair Labor Practice Act."

As indicated above, I found August Mackey to be a credible witness. In this instance his testimony finds some support in the testimony of Superintendent Lawrence Williams as well as in the testimony of J. C. Ragas. Therefore, I credit the testimony of August Mackey. Mackey's testimony reveals that he and Ragas could not be considered for a raise because they and the Labor Board sued Respondent.

It is perhaps understandable for an employer to explain that it cannot grant increased benefits while the question is tied up in court. However, that is not what Daigle told Mackey and Ragas. Daigle said they could not get a raise because they (and the Labor Board) had sued Respondent. The so-called overtime or wage and hour suit and the instant unfair labor practice complaint, both constitute protected activities. As shown above almost all the Homeplace employees joined in suing for overtime wages and, of course, charges and complaints under the National Labor Relations Act are protected under the Act. Therefore, Daigle's comments constitute an 8(a)(1) violation regardless of which suit he was referencing in his comments to Ragas and Mackey. (See Neo-Life Co. of America, 273 NLRB 72 (1984).)

The 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) allegations

(1) Respondent has, since 1 October 1985, refused to grant pay increases to employees Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley.

In October 1985, employees of Respondent were considered for a merit increase in pay. Out of some 24 unit employees and two or more hourly paid supervisors at Homeplace, only four unit employees and one hourly paid supervisor received merit increases in October 1985. The General Counsel contends that of those 20 employees[7] that were denied wage increases, 3 were denied increases because of their union activities or because of their involvement in the overtime suit or because they gave testimony in prior unfair labor practice hearings.

The General Counsel correctly points out that Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Riley were prominent in displaying protective activities. All three wore union buttons, J. C. Ragas permitted the Union to hold employee meetings at his house, Ragas and Mackey spoke in favor of the Union at company meetings, and all three employees testified against Respondent in a prior unfair labor practice hearing. Although Riley testified that he did not speak in favor of the Union at company meetings, Ed Daigle testified that he recalled Riley did speak in favor of the Union. Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Riley were all plaintiffs in the overtime suit against Respondent. During the unfair labor practice hearing in Case 15–CA–9707, Riley was identified as one of the three employees that set up the initial meeting with an attorney that led to the overtime suit.

The evidence shows that on October 1985, for the first time, Gayland Simmons, president and chairman of the board of Respondent's parent company, granted wage increases on the basis of ratings on performance reviews. The performance reviews for Respondent's employees were prepared by Vice President Ed Daigle. Daigle testified that when he prepared the performance reviews, he did not know what scores would be required for an employee to receive a wage increase. Simmons made that determination on his own. Simmons decided that all employees with more than 1-year seniority, that rated an overall score from three to five, would receive an increase with those rated from four to five receiving a larger increase than those rated three to four. Those rated below three received no pay increases. The same system was used throughout all the affiliated companies including Respondent.

Daigle rated J. C. Ragas 2.52, August Mackey 2.31, and Mervin Riley 2.02. Of the eligible people, only employees Claudia Phillips, Dwight Bartholomew, Joseph Rhodes, and Douglas Dinet and hourly Supervisor Gerald Ragas were rated 3 or over by Daigle. Those five received pay increases.

The General Counsel does not argue that Respondent altered its pay review procedure in order to illegally discriminate against its employees. The record shows that Gayland Simmons applied his three-and-over analysis to performance reviews from all companies of LEDCO, the parent company. Moreover, there was no showing that any performance reviews were changed by Simmons. Therefore, it appears that my analysis should be limited to a consideration of whether J. C. Ragas, Mackey, and Riley were discriminatorily denied a rating of three or more because of their protective activities.

Initially, in view of my findings above that August Mackey is a supervisor, I must find that all his union and concerted activities are unprotected in view of Board law (see Parker-Robb Chevrolet, 262 NLRB 402 (1982)). Therefore, even though I shall consider Mackey in my analysis to the extent his treatment may involve J. C. Ragas and Riley, I recommend that the 8(a)(1) and (3) allegations going to Mackey be dismissed. I shall consider whether Mackey was deprived of a wage increase because of his testimony in prior NLRB proceedings (see Parker-Robb Chevrolet, supra). Mackey's prior testimony in unfair labor practice Case 15–CA–9709 was received in evidence. The record shows that Mackey's material testimony was limited to one company meeting in which, according to the testimony, Ed Daigle said, "It looked like A. J. was trying to bring the union in there, and he said if it come to that he won't have no union there, he'd run everybody off and hire a new crew.

In view of the above evidence and especially in view of the fact that Mackey's testimony involved a disputed allegation regarding Ed Daigle, the supervisor that prepared Mackey's performance reviews, I shall consider the evidence concerning the 8(a)(1) and (4) allegations regarding August Mackey.

Conclusions: The General Counsel argued that there are a number of items which support a prima facie case. I have considered several items which I consider critical including, (1) as shown above, on 1 November Superintendent Lawrence Williams admitted to Mackey and J. C. Ragas that they were denied raises because of their union activity and the overtime suit; (2) J. C. Ragas, and Riley were shown to have been heavily involved in union and other protected activities; (3) Daigle did not consult with on the site supervision before rating the Homeplace employees; (4) Respondent's employees in Jonesboro, Louisiana, where there was no union activity, were both[8] granted raises; and (5) Daigle's alleged basis for downgrading Mackey, Ragas and Riley was not supported by credible evidence.

Lawrence Williams' 1 November comments

As shown above I credited the testimony by August Mackey and J. C. Ragas regarding comments by Lawrence Williams on 1 November. Of the two, August Mackey's testimony was more complete. According to Mackey, Williams expressed surprise that Ragas and Mackey had not received raises. Williams then said they had been denied raises because they sued Respondent and because of their union activities.

Obviously, if Williams' comments are imputed to Respondent, the above evidence constitutes strong support for the General Counsel. However, in recent cases, the Board has demonstrated a reluctance to routinely impute knowledge of a supervisor to a respondent (see Dr. Phillip Megdal, D.D.S., Inc., 267 NLRB 82 (1983); Garrett Flexible Products, 270 NLRB 1147, 1148 (1984)). Here, several factors indicate Williams was not speaking from actual knowledge of the basis for the wage increase denials. One such factor is Williams' expression of surprise that Mackey and Ragas had not received raises. If Williams had known before that conversation that Mackey and Ragas had been denied raises because of their protected activities, it is unlikely that he would have been surprised at their comments. Second, Lawrence Williams testified that he was not consulted about the ratings. Third, Williams' comments and later suggestion that Mackey and Ragas talk to Daigle about pay raises, further supports the determination that Williams was never privy to the reasons for denying employees wage increases.

Therefore, I am convinced that Lawrence Williams was only voicing his opinion in his 1 November conversation with Mackey and Ragas. While his comments constitute an 8(a)(1) violation, they should not be taken as showing the true reason why Respondent denied wage increases to Mackey and Ragas.

[8] Only two Jonesboro employees had the necessary seniority to qualify for consideration of a wage increase.

Mackey, Ragas, and Riley's Protected Activity

As shown above, with the possible exception of employee A. J. Duplessis,[9] J. C. Ragas and Mervin Riley were the most prominent of the employees involved in union and protected activities.

Moreover, two of the employees that received pay increases, Dinet and Rhodes, were the only two eligible hourly paid employees that did not join as plaintiffs in the overtime suit against Respondent.

Daigle did not consult with Lawrence Williams

According to Respondent's letter of position to the Region, Ed Daigle evaluated the Homeplace employees with the assistance of Lawrence Williams.[10] However, Lawrence Williams credibly testified that he was not consulted and did not participate in the October 1985 employee evaluations. Williams testified that in 1984 the usual practice involved his consulting with Daigle regarding employee work performance:

> The evaluation-on-the-job performance, how they was working with other people and different things like-like normal evaluation, that's what I usually tell [Daigle].

Lawrence Williams' failure to participate in the evaluations is significant because Ed Daigle was not stationed in Homeplace. Daigle, whose office is in New Orleans, is over employees in Houston and Bryan, Texas, Jonesboro and New Orleans, Louisiana, and various locations throughout the States of Texas and Louisiana, in addition to Homeplace. Daigle did not have an opportunity to routinely observe all the Homeplace employees. Daigle testified that he would visit Homeplace > per month probably two times a month for a period of five or six hours. There could be months that I won't make it at all, there could be other months when I'd be down there more often.

Daigle stated that he usually spent his time in the office at Homeplace, but he testified that he did occasionally visit the jobsites: "Not often, oh, maybe every third trip out I'll go to a particular jobsite if something's going on."

According to Daigle he never went to the jobsites with the meter readers.

Therefore, it is apparent that Daigle only observed some of the hourly Homeplace employees during their work. According to his testimony he would go to a jobsite every third trip. At the rate of two visits per month that translates into Daigle seeing a few of the Homeplace employees at work every 6 weeks. Some of the employees, e.g., the meter readers, were never observed working by Daigle.

The Jonesboro employees all received wages increases. The bargaining unit employees were stationed at Homeplace and Jonesboro, Louisiana. According to record testimony, Daigle rated all four employees at Jonesboro. Two of those employees had worked less than 1 year and were ineligible for a raise. Of the two eligible employees, both were rated three or above and received a wage increase.

Daigle rated J. C. Ragas, Riley, and Mackey low even though the low ratings were not supported by evidence. In the areas where J. C. Ragas, Mackey, and Riley received low ratings, there was a dearth of documentation supporting specific actions or inactions by the employees. Ed Daigle admitted that Respondent has a general practice of documenting poor performance.

Regarding J. C. Ragas, Daigle rated him 2 (one below average) in five subcategories and 3 in six subcategories. Ragas was not rated above average (i.e., 4) in any subcategory,[11] nor was Ragas rated excellent or poor (5 and 1) in any subcategory. Although Daigle complained that J. C. Ragas was not seeing after meters as he should, was not keeping schedules as he should, and was absent without explanation, Daigle was unable to testify about a single specific instance where Ragas engaged in any of those shortcomings. Daigle admitted there were no records showing the occurrence of any of those complaints. Regarding Ragas' below average rating under safety consciousness, Daigle testified to two incidents, one when Ragas "blew some material into his eyes," and the other when Ragas slipped on a ladder. The General Counsel argues that J. C. Ragas was innocent in both instances. In the former, Ragas testified without contradiction, that a faulty gasket ruptured blowing trash into his eye and in the latter, Ragas was carrying tools up a ladder when he slipped.

Moreover, as to Daigle's contention that Ragas missed appointments, J. C. Ragas testified, again without conflict, that some appointments were missed but those occurrences resulted from conflicting assignments from his Supervisor Bob Cure. Cure did not testify.

Daigle claimed that J. C. Ragas failed to turn in calibration schedules on five occasions after Daigle specifically requested the schedules. J. C. Ragas testified that after he made a schedule, that schedule was changed by Daigle and Bob Cure. Ragas then asked if Bob Cure could make the schedules because Ragas did not have the authority to follow the schedule if he had conflicting assignments. According to Ragas, Daigle did not ask about the schedules after that incident. Again, Daigle admitted that he had no records which supported his allegation and he did not rebut J. C. Ragas' testimony.

Regarding acceptance of supervision, Daigle testified that J. C. Ragas oftentimes circumvented Supervisor Bob Cure and talked directly with Daigle. When asked if that was not permitted, Daigle responded that on some occasions Ragas was permitted to deal directly with Daigle.

[9] Duplessis was hired on 16 January 1985 and lacked the seniority necessary to warrant consideration for an October 1985 pay increase.

[11] As noted below, Daigle also rated J. C. Ragas and other employees on another form, the employee progress report, on the same dates (8 October 1985, in the case of Ragas) that he rated employees on their performance review. On that form, after consultation with J. C. Ragas, Daigle rated Ragas above average in six subcategories, excellent (equivalent to 5 on the performance review) in two subcategories, average in six subcategories and below average (the equivalent of 2 on the performance review) in only 1 out of a total of 15 subcategories.

Daigle was unable to furnish records supporting this allegation and Daigle was unable to recall specific incidents when Ragas had circumvented the chain of command. Ragas admitted talking with Daigle about once a week, but he testified those conversations followed instructions from Daigle to contact him anytime Ragas had problems.

Concerning Mervin Riley, Daigle rated him 1 (two below average) in four subcategories, 2 in six subcategories and 3 in two subcategories. Riley was not rated above a 3 in any subcategory.[12] Daigle was asked about the low performance review ratings given Riley. Concerning being deficient in his understanding of his job, Daigle testified that Riley "just never showed to me any individual initiative whatsoever." Daigle could not point to any incidents when Riley demonstrated lack of initiative other than on 21 June 1985, Riley had "heated words" with Daigle's assistant wherein Riley complained that Riley "was a machine operator and that's what he ought to be paid for." (See Tr. 166.) Daigle recalled generally that Riley wanted to be a machine operator but did not want to perform duties other than operate a machine. Daigle stated that he downgraded Riley on safety consciousness and skills of work because Riley would swing the trenching machine boom very, very wildly. Daigle did not warn Riley but, according to Daigle, he sent word through Supervisor Gerald Ragas that he did not like the reckless way Riley was operating the machine. As to the subcategory "effectiveness in working with fellow employees," Daigle testified that "[q]uite often [Riley] would get quite angry with the other employees, lose his temper and almost fight." Daigle said he could not recall a specific incident of Riley getting quite angry.

Riley's immediate supervisor, Gerald Ragas, worked with Riley on a daily basis. Ragas' testimony was quite different from Daigle's. Gerald Ragas testified that he never had problems with Riley operating the backhoe trencher improperly; he never had to correct Riley from swinging the "bucket" improperly; that Riley was a good worker; that Riley never refused to take orders; that he never saw Riley trying to fight other employees, and that he never had occasion to reprimand Riley.

Mervin Riley testified that no one ever criticized his work, that neither Lawrence Williams nor Gerald Ragas told him he was operating the backhoe trencher improperly; that he never refused any assignments and that he never tried to start a fight on the job.

Lawrence Williams testified that on one occasion, "about two years ago," Gerald Ragas complained to him that Riley "didn't want to listen to him." Subsequently, Williams recalled an occasion before Elton Turner died,[13] when Riley complained that he was not receiving operator's pay.

I am convinced, from the testimony of Supervisors Gerald Ragas and Lawrence Williams, that Ed Daigle was not truthful in his testimony that Riley operated the backhoe trencher recklessly. Ragas' testimony was in direct conflict with Daigle's testimony that Daigle sent word through Ragas that he did not like the way Riley operated the machine. Additionally, I do not credit Daigle's testimony that Riley would almost fight other employees. Daigle's testimony that Riley complained about his pay is supported by the testimony of Lawrence Williams. I credit Daigle and Williams in that regard.

In regard to the performance review of August Mackey, Daigle rated him 2 in eight subcategories and 3 in three subcategories. Mackey received no ratings of 5, 4, or 1. However, as mentioned below, Mackey received two "a" (the equivalent of 5) ratings, three "b" (4) ratings, nine "c" (3) ratings; one "d" (2) rating and no "e" (1) rating on his progress report. Daigle responded that Mackey's ratings of 2 on his performance review resulted from the facts that Mackey "just didn't do very much [work]," he showed lack of initiative by declining promotion to supervisor, he would not accept additional responsibilities, his assigned vehicle was not properly maintained, he did not display "very many" academic skills, and he stirred up trouble by talking poorly about the Company and calling it a "white man's company." Daigle admitted that none of Mackey's alleged deficiencies had been documented, and Daigle never talked to Mackey about any of those alleged problems. Daigle did not recall specific instances illustrating Mackey's deficiencies except for an instance at a shrimp boil. On that occasion, according to Daigle, Mackey said he could create overtime situations by having his "brothers to go out and run over some meters." Mackey denied that he made that statement to Daigle.

Superintendent Lawrence Williams testified that Mackey is a "good" employee. Williams testified that he complained about Mackey to Ed Daigle on only one occasion. That occasion was when Mackey refused to accept that he was a supervisor. In view of the entire record and my findings herein regarding credibility, I credit the testimony of Lawrence Williams. I also credit Mackey's denial that he ever said he would have his brother run over meters.

In view of my findings above, I am convinced that the General Counsel has proven a prima facie case. I make that finding despite my determination that Lawrence Williams did not know the reason behind Respondent's actions when he told Mackey and J. C. Ragas they were denied a wage increase because of their suit and union activities. The other factors mentioned above convince me that Respondent considered J. C. Ragas' and Riley's protected activities in the rating process. I am convinced Respondent also considered the prior NLRB testimony of Mackey, Ragas, and Riley.

Second, I shall consider whether the record proves that August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley would have been deprived of a wage increase in the absence of their protected activity or prior testimony (see Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980)).

As to the question of whether Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Riley would have received a wage increase absent their protected activities or prior testimony, the record is confused.

[12] On Riley's progress report, Daigle rated him in the highest category ("a" which is the equivalent of (5)) in two subcategories; "b" (4) in three subcategories; "c" (3) in eight subcategories; "d" (2) in two subcategories; and "e" (1) in no subcategories.

One area of consideration should involve concern with the employees' evaluations before they engaged in protected activities. However, on that point the record is unclear. Daigle testified that he did not evaluate hourly employees before October 1985. Concerning prior raises, Daigle testified that the last raise, October 1984, was combination of merit and cost of living and that Respondent's records do not show whether a raise granted at that time represented both merit and cost of living or simply cost of living. In view of that confusion, I find that Respondent has failed to show that Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley performed below average before they engaged in protected activities. In fact, the opposite appears to be true. Daigle admitted that J. C. Ragas received merit raises "pretty consistently" when merit raises were granted. Regarding Mervin Riley, his immediate supervisor, Gerald Ragas, testified that Riley was a good worker. Contrary to the assertions of Daigle, Gerald Ragas testified that Riley did not operate machinery improperly, Riley never refused to take orders or directions, Riley argued but never tried to pick a fight and Ragas never had occasion to give Riley a warning. Concerning Mackey, Superintendent Lawrence Williams testified that he was a good worker.

Another factor to consider in determining whether Mackey, Riley, and J. C. Ragas would have received wage increases absent their protected activities is a consideration of whether Respondent's evaluations of the employees are consistent with other actions of Respondent.

Ed Daigle testified that he prepared two forms on each employee during October 1985, the performance reviews and the employee progress reports. On completion Daigle reviewed those forms with each employee and, in some instances, made changes. The performance reviews included percentage ratings in subcategories under each of the three general categories.[14] The percentage ratings totaled 100 percent. Each subcategory also included a "performance rating" and a "weighted rating." The weighted ratings, which were computed by multiplying the performance rating times the percentage rating for each respective subcategory, were then totaled. That total figure was divided by 100 for the "employment overall performance rating," a figure somewhere between 0 and 5. The average rating, according to the testimony of Chief Executive Officer Gayland Simmons, was 3.0. All 3.0 and above received a wage increase.

The second form, the employee progress report, included five general categories with three subcategories under each of the five general categories. Those general categories for measuring each employee's work, included attendance, personal qualifications, capacity, attitude toward job, and job performance. In comparison, the performance review general categories included job performance, job knowledge, and general attitude.

Because both forms were completed by Ed Daigle in October 1985, a comparison of the two forms should show a consistent pattern especially in comparison with similar general categories.

In the case of August Mackey, his average on the performance review shows an average score of 2.2 under job performance while Mackey's progress report shows an average between c and b under job performance. Because the progress report subcategories are rated from "a" downward to "e," a conversion to numerical ratings would have "e" as 1 and "a" as 5. After conversion to a numerical accounting, Mackey's score is an average of 3.67 under job performance on his progress report. Mackey scored an average 2.0 under general attitude on his performance review while his converted average under "attitude toward job" on his progress report shows an average score of 2.67. Mackey's overall performance review score was 2.31 while his overall converted progress report shows an average score of 3.4.

J. C. Ragas was scored an average 2.4 on job performance and 2.5 on general attitude in his performance review, while his average converted score on his progress report was 3.33 on job performance and 3.0 under attitude toward job. J. C. Ragas received an overall performance review score of 2.52 while his overall converted progress report shows an average score of 3.6.

Mervin Riley was scored an average 2.0 on job performance, 1.0 under general attitude, and 1.0 under work attitude in his performance review, while his average converted score on his progress report showed that he scored 3.33 on job performance and 2.67 on attitude toward job. Riley received an overall performance review score of 2.02 while his overall converted progress report shows an average score of 3.33.

The only other employee performance review and progress report in the record are those of three employees that received wage increases, Gerald Ragas, Claudia Phillips, and Dwight Bartholomew.

On his performance review Gerald Ragas received an average score of 3.6 under the job performance and 4.0 under general attitude while his converted average scores on his progress report were 3.7 under job performance and 3.67 under attitudes toward job. Gerald Ragas received an overall performance review score of 3.59 while his overall converted progress report shows an average score of 3.93.

On her performance review, Claudia Phillips received an average score of 3.0 under job performance and 3.5 under general attitude. Phillips was rated 3.0 under work attitude. Her converted average score on her progress report reflects 3.33 under job performance and 3.67 under attitude toward job. Phillips received an overall performance review score of 3.15 while her converted progress report shows an average score of 3.53.

Dwight Bartholomew's performance review average under job performance was 2.8, under general attitude 4.0, and work attitude 3.0. Bartholomew's progress report's converted scores were 3.3 under job performance and 3.33 under attitude toward job. His overall performance review average was 3.12 and his converted overall progress report averaged 3.73.

The above figures reveal a general inconsistency between Daigle's ratings on the performance reviews and [14] Four categories were listed but Daigle usually gave no rating in the category "other." Daigle did on occasion rate under the "other" category and employees Riley, Phillips, and Bartholomew received ratings in that category.

his ratings on the progress reports. It appears that Daigle consistently rated employees higher on their progress reports than he did on the performance reviews. However, there is a more pronounced inconsistency shown when the progress report scores on Riley, J. C. Ragas, and Mackey are compared with progress reports and performance reviews of Bartholomew, Phillips, and Gerald Ragas.

In comparison J. C. Ragas' progress report showed an overall converted score 1.08 points above his performance review average. Bartholomew, Phillips, and Gerald Ragas scored higher on the progress report by 0.61, 0.38, and 0.34 respectively. Riley scored 1.31 points higher on his progress report while August Mackey was 1.09 points higher on his progress report.

As to comparison scores, J. C. Ragas had a higher progress report average score than Claudia Phillips, 3.6 to 3.53. Gerald Ragas and Dwight Bartholomew had average converted progress report scores of 3.93 and 3.73, while similar scores for Mackey and Riley were 3.4 and 3.33.

Respondent did not explain the above-noted inconsistencies. While I find the inconsistencies are not persuasive in considering whether the General Counsel has proved a violation, I am persuaded that they should be considered in weighing whether Respondent has proved that Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Riley would have been rated below 3.0 absent their protected activities. Respondent's arguments backed by the testimony of Ed Daigle did not show that August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley would have been rated below 3.0 absent the protected activities or testimony. The examples recalled by Daigle to illustrate deficiencies in the work performance of Mackey, Ragas, and Riley were generally not specific. Moreover, Daigle's testimony in that regard was negated through credible explanations from Mackey, Ragas, and Riley. Due to the successful rebuttals of Daigle's testimony, the lack of specificity in his charges, and the absence of any documentation, I am convinced that Respondent was satisfied with the work performance of August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley until after they engaged in protected activities and gave testimony. Those factors and the inconsistencies in Daigle's ratings, demonstrate that Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Riley would have received an average (i.e., 3.0) or better rating, absent their testimony or protected activities.[15]

(2) Respondent discharged Mervin Riley: On 17 October 1985, Ed Daigle told Mervin Riley that he was discharging Riley because Riley "had access to Company vehicles and drove daily, knowing [Riley] had an invalid license."

While off work on Saturday, 5 October, Riley was ticketed for driving with an expired license. Riley had been rear ended while driving his own automobile. Ed Daigle learned of Riley's traffic ticket from his assistant Ed Raber. Daigle then requested his insurance agent to run a check on Riley's driver's license. Daigle learned that Riley's license expired on 15 November 1984 and that Riley had received an earlier traffic citation in January 1985.

The General Counsel argues that Riley was discharged because of his protected activities and the fact that his license had expired was only a pretext.

Conclusion: I shall examine whether the General Counsel proved, prima facie, that Respondent discharged Riley because of his protected activities and, if so, whether the record demonstrated that Riley would have been discharged absent his protected activities (see Wright Line, supra).

As shown above Mervin Riley was one of the most visible of those employees involved in protected activities. Riley was involved in union activities. He signed a card, attended meetings, and testified in NLRB hearings. During the prior unfair labor practice hearing Riley was identified as one of the three employees that precipitated the overtime suit against Respondent. The record shows that Respondent was aware of Riley's protected activities.

Second, it does appear that Respondent acted hastily in discharging Riley. Daigle first testified that he learned that Riley's license had expired in November 1984 and that Riley had been first ticketed in January 1985. On the basis of that information Daigle phoned Riley when Riley next reported for work, and told Riley of his discharge. Subsequently, when an issue arose during the hearing about the extent of Riley's use of company vehicles in 1984 and 1985, Daigle testified that he directed one employee in Homeplace to check the gasoline tickets to see if Riley drove company trucks after his license expired. According to Daigle he was told "that there was numbers of tickets during this period of time which Mickey Riley had signed for." Daigle admitted that he did nothing else to check into Riley's use of company vehicles.

J. C. Ragas and Mervin Riley credibly testified that gasoline tickets are used to show only which employees filled a particular vehicle with fuel. Employees other than the operator oftentimes filled a vehicle at a gasoline pump at Respondent's Homeplace facility. Additionally, the record including testimony by Ed Daigle, shows that logs are required to be maintained by each vehicle operator. Those logs show that the vehicle allegedly driven by Riley was, until shortly before Riley's discharge, assigned to other employees.

I am convinced that Ed Daigle[16] made no more than a cursory investigation which was designed to show that [15] In view of the comparisons of the progress report ratings of J. C. Ragas, Riley, Gerald Ragas, Bartholomew, and Phillips, I am convinced that Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Riley would not have scored over 4.0 absent their protected activities and prior testimony. Therefore, their wage increase backpay entitlement should be the same as the October 1985 increase award to employees that scored from 3.0 to 4.0.

[16] As noted herein, Daigle's testimony frequently conflicted with other supervisors' testimony including that of Superintendent Lawrence Williams and Supervisor Gerald Ragas. Additionally, Daigle's testimony was not consistent with some of Respondent's records. Those inconsistencies have been mentioned herein. For example, Lawrence Williams testified in direct conflict with Daigle regarding what Daigle was told regarding Tim Williams' plans to return to college. Tim Williams' work application submitted to Respondent, also shows that he planned to work only until he could return to college. Daigle's testimony was inconsistent with the records and the testimony of Lawrence Williams.

Riley had operated company vehicles since his license expired in November 1984. In fact, testimony of Supervisor Gerald Ragas and Riley, and Respondent's vehicle operator logs show that Riley was not assigned a company vehicle until shortly before his discharge.[17]

In regard to the length of time Riley operated a truck, Ed Daigle admitted that that fact would have made a difference in his discharge decision.

Moreover, the record, including Daigle's testimony, illustrated that Daigle made no inquiries about why Riley had failed to renew his license. Riley's unrebutted testimony, which I credit, shows that he had little reason to seek renewal of his license until August 1985. Before then Riley's car was broken down and he had little occasion to drive. Riley testified without rebuttal that the license office was closed due to a funeral, when he tried to renew his license in August. After Riley was assigned a vehicle by Respondent, he returned to the license office but was told that the computer was jammed. On 11 October 1985, some 6 days before his discharge, Riley was issued a new chauffeur's license. That license will expire on 19 November 1989.

Third, at the time of his discharge, Riley owned a valid chauffeur's license. Again Ed Daigle's testimony is in conflict with credible evidence. I credit the testimony of Superintendent Lawrence Williams that Riley showed Williams a copy of his valid chauffeur's license during Riley's discharge phone conversation with Daigle and that Williams immediately told Daigle that Riley had a valid license. Obviously, at that point, Respondent had no liability exposure as alleged by Daigle.

Fourth, Daigle admitted the Respondent normally used a progressive disciplinary system. Nevertheless no explanation was offered about why Riley was discharged even though he had never received an oral or written warning. Moreover, the record shows that other employees had accidents in Respondent's vehicles but were not disciplined and, in the mind of Ed Daigle, Dwight Bartholomew operated unit 5 without a proper license. Bartholomew testified that he had a class A driver's license. Daigle admitted that a chauffeur's license is required to operate unit 5.[18] Bartholomew had not been disciplined for his failure to hold a chauffeur's license.

The above facts convinced me that Riley was discharged because of his protected activities and that the basis alleged by Respondent, through Ed Daigle, is pretextual.

I shall consider whether Riley would have been discharged absent his protected activities.

One measure of whether Riley would have been fired in any event is a determination of how Respondent has reacted on similar occasions. Unfortunately, there were no other occasions of Respondent learning that a vehicle operator was holding an expired license. The closest situation to the instant one is the overall question of how Respondent polices its employees' driver's licenses. The record illustrated that Respondent does not regularly inquire into the status of its employees' driver's licenses. In fact, although Ed Daigle admitted that unit 5, the unit assigned to Riley immediately before his discharge, must be operated by someone holding a chauffeur's license, the current operator, Dwight Bartholomew, has never held a chauffeur's license (see above). Mervin Riley held a chauffeur's license at the time of his discharge. The record shows that offenses similar to Riley's failure to timely renew his license are routinely permitted without discipline. Moreover, Respondent failed to follow its progressive discipline policy concerning Riley. I find that the record shows that Riley would not have been discharged absent his protected activities.[19]

I find that Riley was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers International Union and its Local 4–447 is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees including meter readers/servicemen, measurement technicians, welders, construction and repair crewmen and warehouse employees employed by the Employer at its Homeplace and Jonesboro, Louisiana facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Respondent, by threatening its employees that they had been denied a pay increase because of their union or protected activities; and by telling its employees they would not receive a wage increase because the employees and the Labor Board had sued Respondent, engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[17] Respondent correctly argued that the record is confused about the period of time during which Riley drove a company vehicle. Nevertheless, I find that the record clearly established that Daigle made no more than a cursory investigation and Daigle was not aware of the extent of Riley's driving duties when he decided to discharge Riley.

[18] Respondent, in its brief, argues that Daigle was mistaken and, in fact, the law does not require the operator of unit 5 to hold a chauffeur's license. Be that as it may, the record shows that Daigle treated Riley in a disparate manner since Daigle thought a chauffeur's license was required.

[19] Daigle also testified that he would not rehire Riley because he discovered court records showing Riley had been charged with disturbing the peace, attempted murder, and simple burglary. The record does not prove that Daigle's discovery should preclude reinstatement of Riley. The record shows that of the above charges, Riley was found guilty of disturbing the peace and sentenced to $25 fine or 10 days in jail; regarding the attempted murder charge Riley pleaded guilty to a lesser charge of aggravated battery and was sentenced to three years in jail; and regarding the simple burglary charge, Riley was found not guilty.

On his job application with Respondent dated 27 December 1982, Riley indicated that he had been convicted of assault. Riley was interviewed and hired by a relative of his, Superintendent Lawrence Williams. At that time Riley was also related to another of Respondent's supervisors, Elton Turner (see Riley's job application). Riley testified that Williams knew of his criminal proceedings. Williams admitted knowing that Riley had been in prison. Therefore I find that Respondent was aware of Riley's one felony conviction at the time he was hired. Riley's application form specifically excludes the necessity of listing "misdemeanors." Therefore, Riley was never asked to list his other conviction, that of disturbing the peace.

I find that Respondent knew of Riley's criminal record when he was hired. Therefore, I recommend that Riley should be entitled to full reinstatement.

5. By refusing to grant wage increases to its employees J. C. Ragas and Mervin Riley, Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

6. By refusing to grant a wage increase to its supervisory employee August Mackey, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act.

7. By discharging its employee Mervin Riley on 17 October 1985, Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act.

8. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, I shall order it to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that Respondent has illegally denied wage increases to Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Riley and has illegally discharged Riley, in violation of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (4) of the Act, I shall order Respondent to offer Riley immediate and full reinstatement to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and to make August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them. Backpay and interest shall be computed in the manner described in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[20]

Recommendations

In view of my findings above regarding objections and challenges to ballots in Case 15–RC–7190, I recommend that a revised tally of ballots issue showing 13 votes were cast for the Union, 9 votes were cast against the Union, and there were 2 challenged ballots. The challenged ballots are insufficient in number to affect the results of the election.

In view of the determination about the challenged ballots being insufficient in number to affect the results of the election, and my finding that Respondent's objections should be overruled, I recommend that the Union be certified as exclusive bargaining agent for the employees in the unit described as follows:

> All production and maintenance employees including meter readers/servicemen, measurement technicians, welders, construction and repair crewmen and warehouse employees employed by the Employer at its Home Place and Jonesboro, Louisiana facilities; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[21]

ORDER

The Respondent, Delta Gas, Inc., a subsidiary of Louisiana Energy & Development Corporation, Homeplace, Louisiana, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening its employees that they were denied a pay increase because of their union and protected activities, and by telling its employees they will not receive a wage increase because the employees and the Labor Board have sued the Company.

(b) Denying wage increases, discharging, and refusing to reinstate employees because of their union activities, protected activities, or because they gave testimony under the Act.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer immediate and full reinstatement to Mervin Riley to his former position or, if that position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed, and make August Mackey, J. C. Ragas, and Mervin Riley whole for any losses they may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Remove from August Mackey's, J. C. Ragas', and Mervin Riley's personnel files any reference to its denial of wage increases to them and to its discharge of Riley, and notify Mackey, Ragas, and Riley in writing that this has been done and that evidence of its unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against any of the three employees.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its Homeplace, Louisiana facility copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[22] Copies of the

[21] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[22] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 15, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places, including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

A. J. Ross Logistics, Inc. and Miguel Santiago. Case 22–CA–14209

30 March 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 10 November 1986 Administrative Law Judge Edwin H. Bennett issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, A. J. Ross Logistics, Inc., Keasbey, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

The Respondent contends that the judge's conduct at the hearing, interpretation of the evidence, and his credibility findings showed bias and prejudice against the Respondent. On examination of the judge's decision and the entire record, we are satisfied that the contentions of the Respondent in this regard are without merit.

The Respondent's request to reopen the record is denied as lacking in merit.

Gary A. Carlson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Thomas F.X. Foley, Esq. (Foley, Shelly & Neiman), for the Respondent.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

EDWIN H. BENNETT, Administrative Law Judge. On 14 January 1986 an unfair labor practice charge was filed by Miguel Santiago against A. J. Ross Logistics, Inc. (Respondent or Company). On 27 February 1986 a complaint and notice of hearing was issued alleging, inter alia, that Respondent had discharged Santiago and Anselmo Larquin in January 1986 because of their activities on behalf of United Steelworkers of America, District No. 9 (Union), thereby violating Section 8(a)(3) of the Act. Additionally, the complaint alleged several instances of independent violations of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Respondent denies that it violated the Act in any respect. The hearing on these charges was conducted in Newark, New Jersey, on 14 May 1986.[1]

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is located on a site of approximately 40 acres in Keasbey, New Jersey, where it is engaged in the fabrication, storage, sale, and distribution of structual steel components for use in the construction industry, including the fabrication and sale of rebars, which are steel bars used for reinforcing concrete. It has revenues of several million dollars a year, of which amount, in excess of $50,000 is derived from the sale of its products directly to places located outside the State of New Jersey. Respondent admits, and I find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Respondent also admits, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent began in business in 1975 and has grown steadily under the direction and control of its President and Chairman of the Board, Thomas Petrizzo. Petrizzo, who characterized himself as a "hands-on" executive, plays an active role in the day-to-day operations and management of the Company. Respondent's prospectus states: "The business of the Company is greatly dependent on the active participation of" Petrizzo. He works long hours six days a week, at times arriving as early as 4 a.m., and is thoroughly familiar with every phase of the business. He personally has guaranteed $6 million worth of Company indebtedness and manifests his concern for the Company by overseeing its operations, performing manual labor, and regularly consulting with all the managers.

He tours the facility almost daily at which time he talks to the employees and observes work performance. He is particularly concerned with having "positive attitudes" among his employees and employs a secret intelligence system in order to detect "negative attitudes." Although he declined to specify all of the methods he employs to achieve this objective, his testimony left no doubt that he is constantly aware not only of the production operations but of employees concerns and attitudes towards the job.

Petrizzo's chief assistant is Ronnie Ferrer, who has been with the Company since its inception having held a variety of positions. For the past 3 years he has been a vice president whose duties place him in charge of the entire production facility. He is responsible for all receiving of new products and shipment of finished goods, as well as maintenance of the equipment and evaluation of the production process. Additionally, he plays a key role as the liason between Petrizzo and the Spanish speaking employees who constitute approximately 50 percent of the total work force of about 200 employees. Ferrer frequently accompanies Petrizzo on his daily tours of the facility and serves as a Spanish translator for him.

A major component of Respondent's operations is the rebar division located in a 40,000 square foot building with an adjacent lunchroom. That operation contains two automatic machines for fabricating steel bars used to reinforce concrete. The division operates on two, 8-hour shifts daily, employing from 20–30 employees per shift. The actual fabrication of the bars is done by computerized machinery operated by highly skilled employees. In addition, there are general laborers who are used to remove the bars, bundle them, tag them, and load them on the trucks. The two alleged discriminatees were employed in this unskilled labor category on the day shift. The rebar division is headed by a vice president, Hugh Brady, and the supervisor on the day shift is Larry Greenough, both of whom admittedly are supervisors within the meaning of the Act.

B. The Union Activity

Dissatisfaction surfaced among the employees in January, apparently as a result of the failure to receive expected raises the previous Christmas. Brady acknowledged that this disappointment could have contributed to the development of negative attitudes among the employees. In any event, Santiago felt that he was not being treated fairly and contacted a representative of the Union, a choice he decided on because the Union had represented employees where Santiago previously had worked in 1984. As a result, a union representative, Morton, met with Santiago, and his wife Gloria, at their home on the evening of 9 January. Morton gave him about 200 authorization cards for distribution among his coworkers to solicit their support for the Union.

The credited testimony of Santiago and Larquin establishes that on 10 January they arrived at the plant at approximately 6 a.m., about 45 minutes prior to their normal starting time. Larquin generally traveled with Santiago to and from work in Santiago's automobile which usually was driven by Gloria Santiago. The two men were socially friendly, a fact known to Ferrer and Petrizzo. Both employees stationed themselves in a locker room area used both by rebar and yard employees. With Larquin acting as lookout, Santiago distributed cards to about 20 to 25 employees and received approximately 15 signed cards in return.

About 4 p.m., that same day, following his discharge as described more fully below, Santiago and Larquin, who joined him on completion of his shift, distributed union cards to employees arriving for the second shift. They continued this union solicitation outside the plant until about 5 p.m., during which time they distributed approximately 20 to 30 additional cards, with several employees signing them on the spot. The foregoing account constitutes the only significant union activity prior to the two discharges in question and is based on the credited testimony of the two employees.

C. The Discharge of Santiago

Santiago was hired by Ferrer in April 1984. He initially was employed as a security guard until June 1984 when he was transferred to work in the yard as an assistant to the hi-lo operator. In January 1985 he was transferred to the rebar department where he performed general labor work until his discharge on 10 January. His duties in that department included such various tasks as sweeping, throwing rods on the line, and loading cut rods on to the truck. His immediate supervisor was Greenough who in turn reported to Brady. In May 1985 he received a raise to $6.50 an hour which remained his rate of pay until his discharge.

Although Ferrer asserted that Santiago had problems as a security guard (sleeping on the job) he conceded that he was an average employee. Both Ferrer and Petrizzo sought to portray Santiago as a less than adequate rebar employee as well but could describe only a single incident to support their testimony. In July 1985 Santiago, Larquin, and two other employees were fired by Brady for refusing to work overtime on a particular Saturday. Within days of that discharge, however, and at the request of Santiago and Larquin, Ferrer interceded with Petrizzo on their behalf and the employees were reinstated. No other disciplinary action of any kind was ever taken against Santiago for any other reason throughout the period of his employment. Nor is there any evidence that he was warned in any manner concerning his work performance. Furthermore, Santiago was assigned crane operation on Saturdays when the two regular operators normally did not work, despite the fact that Petrizzo described crane operation as a dangerous job. Other duties performed by Santiago, such as flipping bars and loading trucks, also were described as dangerous and it is clear that Respondent assigned these various tasks to Santiago throughout his employment in the rebar department. Finally, although Respondent elicited testimony from many of its witnesses purporting to demonstrate that Santiago was a particularly slow, incompetent, or dangerous worker, the alleged reason for his discharge was not related to his job performance.

As noted above, Santiago arrived early for work on Friday, 10 January and together with Larquin distributed union authorization cards to employees. Following this activity he clocked in and began his regular work at 7 a.m. About 10 a.m., Greenough called him aside and told him that he had heard there was an attempt to unionize the plant and that because he was a friend of his he did not want him to have problems. Santiago denied knowledge of any union activity. Nevertheless, Greenough told him to talk to Petrizzo because "he's a good guy and don't try to get a union because that's not going to get you anything." Santiago returned to work and although Greenough proceeded to transfer him from job to job, Santiago credibly testified that he was under constant observation by Brady. Greenough, who still is employed as a supervisor, did not testify, and therefore Santiago's testimony in this regard is credited and uncontroverted.

Santiago was discharged before the regular end of his shift and before the end of the regular workweek which runs from Monday through Saturday with payday the following Thursday.

According to Santiago's credited testimony, he was sweeping the floor following the unloading of a truck when Petrizzo and Brady approached him about 3 p.m. Petrizzo told Santiago that he did not like him anymore and when Santiago asked why Petrizzo said he did not like the way he was working and that he was fired. These few words were spoken in English and were understood by Santiago. Santiago did not reply and immediately left the building followed by Petrizzo and Brady. Petrizzo told a security guard that he did not want to see Santiago at the plant again.

Brady testified that since he had become vice president in charge of the rebar department in May 1985, and prior to Santiago's discharge, approximately seven employees had been fired. In each instance, Brady made the decision to discharge the employee and communicated that action to the employee. In not a single case did Brady consult with Petrizzo in advance although in some of the cases he notified Petrizzo subsequently. All of these discharges were for poor work performance of one type or another. The discharge of Santiago was unique in the manner in which it was made by Petrizzo and in the fact that neither Brady nor Ferrer had been informed of Santiago's impending discharge. Neither of these corporate officers, who normally would have at least been involved in, or advised of, such personnel action, had so much as a suspicion that Petrizzo was contemplating such step.

Although no reason was communicated to Santiago at the time of discharge, Respondent asserts that it had good and compelling justification for the sudden discharge of Santiago. Petrizzo testified that his reason for firing Santiago in the manner described was that for several weeks Santiago had worked at a noticeably slower pace and, more importantly, had been soliciting his fellow employees to join him in this slowdown campaign. However, Petrizzo conceded that although he knew of Santiago's slowdown tactics, he never warned Santiago to cease such activity, nor had he told any of his supervisors about his observations or instructed them to take measures to deter Santiago from this most serious conduct. Petrizzo was insistent that the reason for firing Santiago was the "slowdown" campaign he had been urging on other employees. However, Petrizzo's testimony is not supported by any independent evidence from other workers who were the recipients of Santiago's alleged slowdown activities nor is he supported by any of the supervisory staff or indeed by Respondent's formal response to the complaint.

Thus, Petrizzo's testimonial contentions are inconsistent with Respondent's opening statement asserting that both Santiago and Larquin were fired for their refusal to perform specifically assigned work. Their discharges in January, it was alleged, were motivated by the same type of conduct that resulted in their discharges in July 1985, at which time, it will be recalled, they were fired, although later reinstated, for their concerted refusal to perform overtime work. This alleged nonperformance of duties as the reason for Santiago's discharge is repeated in Respondent's brief, i.e., that he was fired because Petrizzo observed him not working. Brady's testimony, while supportive of the formal position, is at odds with Petrizzo's testimony. According to Brady, he and Petrizzo had been observing Santiago loafing for several minutes prompting a comment to this effect by Petrizzo. It was at that very moment that Petrizzo summoned Santiago and fired him. It was Brady's belief that although he had not been informed of the reasons of the discharge, Santiago's loafing was the immediate cause therefor. Ferrer, who was the liaison between Petrizzo and the Spanish-speaking employees, and who can be described as Petrizzo's right hand man in the overall operations of Respondent, first learned of Santiago's discharge later that afternoon from an employee and not from Petrizzo or Brady. There is no explanation in the record for Ferrer's ignorance of Petrizzo's intent to discharge an employee who for several weeks allegedly had been instigating a slowdown.

D. The Discharge of Larquin

Larquin had been hired by Ferrer in February 1985 and had worked the entire period of his employment in the rebar department, tying and ticketing cut rods. At the time of his discharge he was earning $6 an hour, a rate of pay that he started to receive in May 1985. He was described by Brady as a good worker, essentially no different than any other worker in the rebar department. He had never been warned or disciplined for poor work performance, except for the disciplinary action in July 1985 noted above, involving the concerted refusal to work overtime.

On Saturday, 11 January, the day after Santiago's discharge, about noon time, while Larquin was performing his assigned duties, he was approached by Petrizzo and Ferrer. Petrizzo called him over and told him, in English, that he was fired. At Larquin's request, Ferrer confirmed the discharge in Spanish. Neither official gave Larquin any reason. Nevertheless, as was the case with Santiago, Respondent, during the trial of this matter, offered several reasons for his discharge.

As noted, Respondent's position at the opening of the hearing was that Larquin and Santiago were fired essentially for the same reasons that motivated their discharges in July 1985, that is, that they refused to perform assigned work. Respondent's brief, however, asserts that Larquin was fired for "gesturing and screaming in Spanish at the other workers," and for continuing such threatening conduct despite efforts by Petrizzo to stop him. Notwithstanding these two reasons, Respondent's witnesses did not entirely agree and they testified at variance to both.

The crucial testimony, and the most contradictory, was given by Petrizzo who made the decision to discharge Larquin without any consultation whatsoever with Ferrer or Brady and who actually communicated the discharge notice. He testified repeatedly and unequivocally that he fired Larquin for the same reason that he fired Santiago, namely that Larquin, for a prolonged period of time, had been urging employees to engage in a work slowdown. Further, although he claimed to have observed that conduct personally, he did not explain his failure to warn Larquin or to take measures to have him cease these slowdown tactics. His testimony regarding Larquin mirrors his testimony concerning Santiago. In addition, Petrizzo specifically denied that he had observed Larquin on the day of the discharge creating any sort of disturbance with the other employees or that Larquin's prior work performance, which he considered generally unsatisfactory, motivated his discharge decision.

Ferrer, on the other hand, testified that although he had no advance knowledge from Petrizzo that Larquin would be fired, and although Petrizzo did not communicate a reason to Larquin, he was sure that Larquin was fired because, on that day but not before then, he had been urging a slowdown. Unfortunately for Respondent, Ferrer was equally sure that such conduct was not the cause of the discharge but rather that he was fired because of his misconduct in cursing at other employees. Thus, Ferrer testified, "I think that the reason that he was laid off, it was because of these—the way he—he was cursing at everybody and everybody else and not because of the slowdown," and that this conduct occurred only moments before the discharge. Brady, in whose department Larquin worked and who had determined to fire Larquin and the others in July 1985, testified that he did not learn of the discharge until later and that to the best of his understanding, Larquin was fired for arguing or fighting and that he was not aware that Larquin had ever urged employees to engage in a slowdown.

E. The Postdischarge Events

On Monday, 13 January, Larquin, Santiago, and Santiago's wife drove to the plant about 6:30 a.m., to try and persuade Ferrer to again intercede with Petrizzo to have them reinstated. They waited for Ferrer to arrive and spoke with him outside the plant. Gloria Santiago, who knew Ferrer for several years, was the principal spokesperson. There was a brief conversation in which Ferrer was told that the two men wanted to return to work. According to the credited testimony of Gloria Santiago, Ferrer replied that "your husband is the leader of the union, and we can't have a union here because if the union comes in we'll have to close." The conversation ended with Ferrer stating that he would see what he could do about their reinstatement after such request was repeated. The testimony of the three General Counsel's witnesses is in substantial accord regarding this meeting, while Ferrer did not specifically testify about this event.

Several days later, at Ferrer's request, they all met again at a liquor store he owned in Elizabeth, New Jersey. Ferrer asked them what they wanted, to which they replied that they wanted their jobs back. In addition, Santiago and Larquin said they wanted wages lost as a result of their discharges and the wage increase that had been promised around Christmas time. Ferrer commented that they should have spoken to him before they became involved with a union. Furthermore, he told them he could do nothing about getting them any money but he would see what could be done about reinstatement. He also repeated his statement that the Company would close rather than deal with a union in which case, he added, even he would have to collect unemployment. The foregoing account is based on a composite of the credited testimony of the three General Counsel's witnesses. Ferrer did testify about this meeting and denied that there was any mention of a union, that he made any of the threats attributed to him, and that the only subject discussed was reinstatement. I do not accept Ferrer's account of this meeting. The testimonial demeanor of the General Counsel's witnesses throughout was much more favorable. Ferrer's testimony generally was inconsistent and self-contradictory (particularly concerning the reason for the firings), and this second meeting, which he requested (a matter about which he also was evasive), was in keeping with the first meeting, which as noted, he did not specifically deny. I conclude that Ferrer, as well as Petrizzo, were not reliable witnesses and that their testimony concerning the alleged violations of the Act was not candid or complete.

F. Analysis

1. The discharges of Santiago and Larquin

It is now firmly established that if the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that an employer's discharge decision was motivated by protected conduct, the employer has the burden of persuading, by a preponderance of the evidence, that such discharge would have occurred even in the absence of that protected conduct.[2] Whether or not an inference of a discriminatory motive exists, rests on the presence, or absence, of various indicia knowledge of protected conduct, the timing of the discharge in relation to such conduct, animus or hostility towards the protected activities—including the existence of other independent violations of the Act—and the validity of the asserted business justification for the discharge. In this last respect, the General Counsel notes in his brief, citing Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966): "If [the administrative law judge] finds that the stated motive for a discharge is false, he certainly can infer that there is another motive. More than that, he can infer that the motive is one that the employer desires to conceal—an unlawful motive—at least where, as in this case, the surrounding facts tend to reinforce that inference."

Applying these guidelines to the credited evidence, I find there is a substantial basis for concluding that a prima facie case, and a compelling one at that, has been established with respect to the discharges of Santiago and Larquin. The following recapitulation of the evidentiary highlights shows that on 10 January, Santiago and Larquin engaged in significant protected activity by soliciting union membership from their colleagues at the workplace.[3] This conduct became known to Respondent

[2] See generally Roure Bertrand Dupont, Inc., 271 NLRB 443 (1984), for a discussion of the Wright Line analysis in discrimination cases.

[3] Larquin served only as a lookout on the morning of 10 January while Santiago did the actual card distribution. Larquin nailed his own coffin, however, by joining Santiago in direct card distribution that day after almost immediately, for within hours Santiago's supervisor, Greenough, cautioned him about participating in such conduct. The involvement of Santiago and Larquin in union activity was a repeat display of a "negative" attitude towards the Company for it clearly showed their dissatisfaction with employment conditions. These two employees previously were linked in a protest regarding compulsory overtime for which they had been fired and, after a joint appeal, ultimately reinstated. Whether or not this earlier conduct implicated rights under the Act is not an issue in this case. However, it does reinforce the conclusion that Respondent considered them as a source of friction between management and employees for which a corrective measure (discharge) was required. In fact, one of Respondent's defenses is that they were fired in 1986 for the same reason for which they had been fired in 1985. Thus, we have the element of company knowledge of protected activity.

Respondent's denial of knowledge is without merit. Not only is there direct evidence of such knowledge in Greenough's statement to Santiago, but it is confirmed by Ferrer's statements on 13 January and a few days later to Larquin, Santiago, and his wife on the occasions outside the plant and at the liquor store when they sought Ferrer's help in securing their reinstatement as he had done in July 1985. Moreover, there is strong circumstantial evidence that Petrizzo learned of the card distribution immediately, in the morning and in the afternoon of 10 January. Petrizzo lauded his "secret service" for ferreting employee "negative" attitudes and when this is combined with the statements of Greenough and Ferrer, and the pretextual excuses given for the discharges (discussed more fully below), the inference of such knowledge by Petrizzo prior to the discharges is inescapable. "The same set of circumstances may be relied on to support both an inference of knowledge and an inference of discrimination." Coca Cola Bottling Co., 237 NLRB 936, 944 (1978).

The other aspects of the prima facie case are that the discharges came immediately (the same day and next) on the heels of the union activity, they were done in the middle of a day and before the end of a pay period; they were effectuated in an unprecedented manner, i.e., by Petrizzo himself; no supervisor was aware of or consulted about the discharges; there is other evidence of animus towards the union activity (see discussion below regarding the independent 8(a)(1) allegations), no reason at all was stated at the time of the discharges; and, finally, the reasons for the discharges advanced in this proceeding are so flimsy and paperthin as to be almost nonexistent.

We turn then to the Respondent's purported justification for firing both men, i.e., that Petrizzo claimed they both had been engaged in fomenting a slowdown campaign for several weeks among the other employees. Yet not a single supervisor or manager was aware of such conduct, not a single employee supported the testimony, and, most significantly, Petrizzo conceded that he allowed and permitted such disruptive conduct to occur without so much as a word of displeasure to anyone. Considering Petrizzo's total involvement in the Company—physically, emotionally, and financially—I find it inconceivable that he maintained total silence in the face of such serious misconduct. On the other hand, if as I conclude, the allegation of "slowdown" is but Petrizzo's euphemism for union activity, it is not surprising, and in keeping with his managerial style, that immediate and forceful action was taken to root out this manifestation of "negative attitudes."

Accordingly, I reject Petrizzo's assertion that he had just cause (incitement of a work slowdown) for firing Santiago and Larquin. I am confirmed in this finding by Respondent's own case, for as described above, various other contradictory and inconsistent reasons were offered for the necessity of firing the two men in such precipitous manner. Thus, Respondent also claims that Santiago was fired for loafing on the day of discharge, that Larquin was fired for loud and disruptive behavior immediately prior to his discharge, and that both were fired for insubordination, i.e., refusing to perform specific assignments. In cases of this kind it has been said that "an unfavorable inference can be drawn from an employer's shifting explanations for its treatment of an employee." Louisiana Council No. 17, AFSCME, 250 NLRB 880, 886 (1980) (see fn. 38 and cases cited). The instant case is a classic example of that proposition. Inasmuch as Petrizzo's reasons are without merit and it was he who made the decision, a fortiori the reasons advanced by other Respondent officials are equally fallacious. The insubstantial, unreliable, and pretextual justification for firing Santiago and Larquin does not satisfy Respondent's burden of overcoming the General Counsel's strong prima facie case. According, I conclude that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) in discharging these employees as alleged in the complaint.

2. The independent 8(a)(1) allegations

The complaint alleges that Respondent, through Ferrer during the two postdischarge conversations he had with the Santiagos and Larquin, unlawfully promised a wage increase, threatened the closing of the plant in the event of unionization, and unlawfully solicited grievances.

The credited evidence establishes that on both occasions, Ferrer made statements to the effect that the plant would close if employees obtained union representation. No lengthy discussion is required to conclude that such remarks are coercive and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as alleged.

The credited evidence also establishes that at no time during these meetings did Ferrer so much as suggest that wage increases would be granted if employees cease their support for the Union. In fact the General Counsel's witnesses all testified that Ferrer categorically rejected the demand for reinstatement. The General Counsel does not pursue this allegation in his brief, but whether or not it is abandoned, I conclude there is no evidentiary support for it and therefore find it lacks merit.

work, thus sealing his fate for the discharge that followed the next day. If Respondent was not fully aware of Larquin's union involvement in the morning of 10 January, as discussed below, it undoubtedly learned of his union activity that afternoon.

The evidence regarding the allegation of solicitation shows that on 13 January, at the meeting outside the plant, Ferrer was told that the men wanted reinstatement to which he replied that he would see what he could accomplish. However, the conversation was initiated by the discriminatees and Ferrer did not "solicit" or ask their wishes about anything. On the other hand, the meeting at the liquor store began by Ferrer asking the discriminatees what they wanted and again saying that he would see what he could do about their request for reinstatement. The General Counsel argues that by such conduct, Respondent unlawfully solicited grievances.

The vice in such violation lies not in the solicitation itself but rather in the promise—be it inferred or explicit—that the grievance will be corrected without union representation. Uarco Incorporated, 216 NLRB 1 (1974). Of course, without a solicitation by the employer to begin with there can be no unlawful solicitation at all (which is not to say that there might not be an unlawful promise). Consequently, there is no factual support to the General Counsel's argument with respect to the meeting on 13 January.

The meeting at the liquor store, however, raises different considerations because at that time Ferrer did ask, i.e., "solicit," their concern or "grievance." Nevertheless, I do not believe that the context in which that question was asked constitutes the type of conduct envisioned by the Board when it refers to the soliciting of grievances in order to remedy them without union representation. Here the "grievance," if it be that, concerned not an ongoing term of employment, e.g., wages, hours, discipline, etc., which would be improved if employees ceased their union support, but rather a discriminatory discharge. Although it might be argued that Respondent might have considered reinstatement if the men abandoned their union interest, thus satisfying the element of corrective action, that inference appears too remote in the circumstances of this case. Considering the high degree of evidence supporting the case for finding that the discharges were discriminatory, Ferrer's question seems more rhetorical than solicitous. Moreover, absent controlling case authority, I am reluctant to conclude that discussions concerning possible reinstatement of illegally discharged employees, albeit that it is conditioned on foregoing union representation, constitutes an unlawful solicitation of grievances within the lexicon of Board law. It would suffice to deal with and remedy that conduct as part of the 8(a)(3) violation and therefore, I will recommend dismissal of this distinct 8(a)(1) allegation.

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discriminatorily discharging and refusing to reinstate its employees Miguele Santiago and Anselmo Larquin because of their activity on behalf of the Union, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. By threatening its employees with the closing of its plants if they seek representation by a union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

6. Respondent has not violated the Act in any respect other that specifically found.

The Remedy

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. Having found that Respondent discharged and failed to recall Miguel Santiago and Anselmo Larquin in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer them immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions of employment or, if these positions are not available, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges previously enjoyed.

I shall also recommend that Respondent be ordered to make each of them whole for any loss of earnings they may have suffered from the date of their respective discharges to the date each is offered reinstatement. Their loss of earnings shall be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and shall include interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

I shall also recommend that Respondent remove from its files any reference to the discharges of Santiago and Larquin and notify them in writing that it has done so, and that evidence of their discharges will not be used as a basis for future, personnel action against either of them. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

The prayer for relief in the complaint requests, as part of the remedy, authorization for discovery proceedings pursuant to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure in order to secure compliance with any order of the Board. The General Counsel does not contend that there are any special circumstancees necessitating departure from the standard remedy in similar cases and I will not include that requested remedy here. Northwind Maintenance Co., 281 NLRB 317 (1986); O. L. Willis, Inc., 278 NLRB 203 (1986).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[4]

[4] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

ORDER

The Respondent, A. J. Ross Logistics, Inc., Keasbey, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against employees in regard to hire or tenure of employment, or any term of condition of employment, because of their activities on behalf of United Steelworkers of America, District No. 9, or any other union.

(b) Threatening employees that the plant will close if they seek to be represented by a union.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to Miguel Santiago and Anselmo Larquin immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Make whole Miguel Santiago and Anselmo Larquin for any loss of pay they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's unlawful discharges in accordance with the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the discharges of Miguel Santiago and Anselmo Larquin and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against either of them.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary or useful to the analysis of the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its place of business in Keasbey, New Jersey, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the complaint be, and it is hereby, dismissed in all other respects.

[5] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge, or otherwise discriminate against our employees, because of their activities on behalf of United Steelworkers of America, District No. 9, or any other union.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees that the plant will close if they seek to be represented by a union.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce our employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Miguel Santiago and Anselmo Larquin immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or other rights and privileges, and make them whole, with interest, for any loss of earnings they may have suffered because we unlawfully fired them.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the discharges of Miguel Santiago and Anselmo Larquin, and we will notify them that this has been done and that evidence of their unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against either of them.

30 March 1987

DECISION AND ORDER QUASHING NOTICE OF HEARING

BY MEMBERS BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 3 June 1986 by the National Broadcasting Company, Inc. (the Employer or NBC) alleging that Local 11, National Association of Broadcast Employees and Technicians, AFL–CIO (Local 11) violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Local 23, International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees, AFL–CIO (IATSE). The hearing was held 13 November 1986 before Hearing Officer John T. Downs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

NBC, a Delaware corporation, owns a radio station in Boston, Massachusetts, where it annually has gross revenues in excess of $100,000 and makes purchases in excess of $50,000 directly across state lines. The parties stipulated, and we find, that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that both Local 11 and the IATSE are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

The Employer has a collective-bargaining agreement with Local 11 whose members travel with NBC-owned and leased equipment for remote broadcasts. NBC contracted with boxing promoter Dave Duma to televise a boxing match from the Providence Civic Center on 18 May 1986. NBC's director of staff labor relations David Heiser testified that on 7 May 1986 he received a copy of a collective-bargaining agreement between the Providence Civic Center Authority (PCC) and IATSE. He testified that Ernie De Rosa, NBC's technical manager of sports, obtained the contract at Heiser's request after De Rosa told him there might be a problem concerning who should perform the loading and unloading of NBC's technical equipment. According to unsworn statements on the record by Local 11's counsel, on 8 May 1986 Heiser received a phone call from PCC representative Robert Casey, who insisted that, pursuant to PCC's contract with IATSE, the work of loading and unloading NBC-owned technical equipment used for the boxing match must be given to IATSE. Local 11 and the Employer stipulated that some time around 8 May 1986 Local 11 Business Representative John Clark contacted Heiser and threatened to withhold all services if his members did not load and unload the equipment. De Rosa testified that the work was assigned to and performed by members of Local 11 on 18 May 1986.

B. Work in Dispute

The work in dispute is the loading and unloading of NBC-owned and leased technical equipment and NBC-owned lighting equipment for televised events at the Providence Civic Center.

C. Contentions of the Parties

NBC and Local 11 claim that whenever NBC is present at the Providence Civic Center the work in dispute should be awarded to employees represented by Local 11 based on their collective-bargaining agreement, the skills and experience of employees Local 11 represents, industry practice, efficiency of operation, employer preference, and Board precedent. Neither NBC nor Local 11 filed a brief. PCC and IATSE did not appear at the hearing, nor did they file briefs.

D. Applicability of the Statute

We find that the record in this case is insufficient to establish a jurisdictional dispute cognizable under Section 10(k) of the Act.

There is little or no evidence that NBC is faced with two or more competing employee groups claiming the work disputed above. No evidence was adduced at the hearing that IATSE contacted NBC or PCC about the work. Neither party present at the hearing alluded to this omission or lack of evidence concerning two employee group claims. At most, the parties have shown that NBC obtained a copy of a PCC-IATSE contract that purports to cover the work in dispute, and that an NBC representative speculated there might be a problem about what employees should perform the work.[1]

Accordingly, we conclude there is insufficient evidence to support a finding that the Employer is faced with competing employee group claims. We further conclude that there is no jurisdictional dispute within the meaning of Sections 8(b)(4)(D) and 10(k) of the Act. We shall therefore quash the notice of hearing.

[1] Further, even if we were to consider as evidence the unsworn representation of counsel for Local 11 regarding the Heiser-Casey phone conversation, we would still find the record insufficient to support a finding that the Employer is faced with competing employee group claims.

ORDER

The notice of hearing is quashed.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 27 October 1986 Administrative Law Judge Robert W. Leiner issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Asociacion Hospital del Maestro, Inc., San Juan, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The General Counsel seeks a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

[2] We grant the General Counsel's request that the notice marked "Appendix B" be posted in Spanish as well as English.

Raymond E. Morales, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Roberto Vega-Pacheco, Esq. (Cancio, Nadal & Rivera), of San Juan, Puerto Rico, for the Respondent.

DECISION

ROBERT W. LEINER, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard on four occasions on and between 26 February and 1 April 1986, in San Juan, Puerto Rico, on the General Counsel's consolidated amended complaint,[1] as further amended at the hearing, alleging, in substance, that Asociacion Hospital Del Maestro, Inc. (Respondent), violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by promulgating and maintaining an unlawful rule prohibiting employees from wearing union insignia and buttons on their uniforms, threatening employees with discipline if they did not remove insignia from their uniforms, indefinitely suspending employees for wearing insignia on uniforms, conditioning their return to work on the removal of such insignia from the uniforms, and, on 26 November 1985, discharging its employee, Heibert Rojas Hernandez, and thereafter failing and refusing to reinstate him, because of his union activities.

At the hearing, all parties were represented by counsel, were given full opportunity to call and examine witnesses, submit oral and written evidence, and to argue orally on the record. At the close of the hearing, the parties waived final argument and elected to file posthearing briefs which have been carefully considered.[2]

On the entire record, including the briefs, and from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses as they testified, I make the following

I. RESPONDENT AS STATUTORY EMPLOYER

The consolidated amended complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Asociacion Hospital del Maestro, Inc., a corporation existing under the laws of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, has maintained its principal office and place of business in Hato Rey, San Juan, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, where it has continuously engaged in the operation of a health care institution, an acute hospital, providing medical and related services. During the year ending January 1986, a representative period of its annual operations, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its hospital operations, derived gross revenues in excess of $250,000 and, during the same period, purchased and caused to be shipped and delivered to its aforesaid place of business from points located outside the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico materials and supplies valued in excess of $50,000. Respondent, as it admits, at all material times, has been and is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and is a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

II. THE UNIONS AS STATUTORY LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

The consolidated amended complaint alleges, Respondent in its amended answer admits, and I find that at all material times Union Local No. 2 de Enfermeras y Enfermeros Auxiliares Practicos Licenciadoes y Escoltos del Hospital del Maestro, affiliated with Confederacion Obrera Puertoriquena (Local 2) is, and has been at all material times, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[3]

[1] The underlying unfair labor practice charge filed by Juan David Rosario on 15 October 1985 (Case 24–CA–5245), was served on 16 October 1985. His amended charge was filed and served on 20 November 1985. Complaint and notice of hearing were issued and served on 26 November 1985. The underlying charge in Case 24–CA–5276, filed by Heibert Rojas Hernandez on 29 November 1985, was served on 2 December 1985. The General Counsel's order consolidating cases, the consolidated amended complaint, and notice of hearing were issued and served on 16 January 1986. Respondent's timely answer to the consolidated amended complaint is dated 27 January 1986. Its amended answer is dated 14 February 1986.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES[4]

A. Background

Respondent's hospital in Hato Rey employs 700 employees in 7 bargaining units each with its own local union. They are designated Locals 1 through 7, Locals 1, 2, 5, and 6 being affiliated with the Confederacion. Local 2 represents a unit of 180 LPNs, nurses aides, and "escorts."[5] All collective-bargaining agreements representing these labor organizations expired in 1985 and there are no collective-bargaining agreements in effect between the Respondent and any of its employees through the time of the hearing.

On 9 September 1985, Juan Rosario, president of Local 2, requested a meeting with Respondent regarding rumors of an impending layoff of the licensed practical nurses (LPNs) and their replacement by registered nurses (RNs). Respondent and representatives of Local 2 met on 9 September and Respondent, by Supervisor Jesse Pou Rivera, told the Local 2 representatives that they had heard only rumors and if there was any decision, the hospital would notify the Union. Within a short time thereafter, however, Respondent decided to terminate all the practical nurses and, in a meeting of 16 September 1985, notified Confederacion President Frank Ruiz that it intended to replace all the practical nurses with registered nurses and that it was willing to negotiate and discuss this decision. Pou told Ruiz that the reasons for this decision included the hospital's desire to upgrade the quality of its services, that fewer registered nurses could provide the same services as the LPNs, and that the use of registered nurses would shorten the hospital stay of patients through the upgrading of services.

While no LPNs were actually laid off until 5 October,[6] commencing on or about 30 September, 90 of the 180 Local 2 unit employees started wearing black ribbons on their uniforms. The black ribbons measured about 4 inches in length and consisted of a folded-over piece of cloth creating two "wings," each of which was about 4 inches long. At or about the same time that the black ribbons appeared, a handbill was distributed at the hospital on the letterhead of Local 1199 of the Hospital Workers Union. It is uncontested that Local 2 was seeking to affiliate with Local 1199 and that sometime in July 1985, Local 1199 filed a petition for certification as statutory representative of the employees represented by Local 2. The handbill protested the threat of discharge of the LPNs and criticized Confederacion President Frank Ruiz for taking a position giving the employer any advantage in ridding itself of the LPNs. The handbill also stated that the purpose of the wearing of black ribbons was to show unity and solidarity among all the members of the unit (G.C. Exh. 7(a)).

The black ribbons were worn commencing on or about Tuesday, 3 October 1985, and were worn for about 7 days thereafter ending on or about 9 October. Commencing on or about Monday, 7 October 1985,

[3] Respondent also admitted that the following employees of the hospital were Respondent's supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) and Respondent's agents within the meaning of Sec. 2(13) of the Act: Jesse Pou Rivera, industrial relations and personnel director; Maria T. Rivera, nursing director; and Juana Maldonado Ortiz, general supervisor. There was also no dispute that Charging Party Juan David Rosario, at all material times, has been president of Local 2; and that Charging Party Heibert Rojas Hernandez, a member of Local 2, a nurses aide and therefore a member of the unit represented by Local 2, a former vice president of Local 2, was discharged on 26 November 1985. Lastly there is no dispute that Frank Ruiz, at all material times was president of Local 2's parent, the Confederacion Obrera Puertoriquena (the Confederacion), also a labor organization.

[4] In its answer, at the hearing, and again in its brief, Respondent pleaded as a defense that the instant alleged unfair labor practices be deferred to arbitration. The parties stipulated that a collective-bargaining agreement between the Confederacion and Local 2 and Respondent expired on 8 April 1985. There is no current agreement. While Respondent desires to proceed to arbitration, the General Counsel, Local 2, and the individual Charging Parties herein oppose. Respondent has stated a willingness to waive all procedural defenses as well as the issues of substantive arbitrability of the controversy and the timeliness of filing the arbitration request. The General Counsel defends principally with the argument that under Board rules, although allegations involving violations of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) are ordinarily deferrable to arbitration, United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), they should not be deferred when the interests of the Union which might be expected to represent the employees are adverse to those of the employee, United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB at 560. In the instant case, there is evidence of "friction" between Local 2 and the Confederacion. This ill feeling was known by Respondent at all material times. Local 2, on this record, has sought to disaffiliate from the Confederacion and has sought to affiliate with another labor organization, Local 1199 of the Hospital Workers Union. Moreover, there was evidence on this record of antagonism on the part of Confederacion President Frank Ruiz against the members of Local 2 whose interest the Confederacion might be called on to defend in an arbitration proceeding. Respondent notes that the expiration of the contract is no defense to its continued vitality as a vehicle permitting arbitration, Nolde Bros. v. Bakery Workers Local 358, 430 U.S. 243 (1977); American Sink Top Co., 242 NLRB 408 (1979). The deferrability of a discharge allegedly in violation of the Act under United Technologies, when the discharge occurs well after contract expiration and is not linked with any element of the expired contract, appears to be a matter raising doubts on the applicability of Nolde Bros. See Teamsters Local 238 v. C.R.S.T., 795 F.2d 1400 (8th Cir. 1986). Furthermore, the Board appears to be not entirely satisfied with its American Sink Top decision. Southwest Security Equipment Corp., 262 NLRB 665 (1982). See also Emery Air Freight Corp. v. Teamsters Local 295, 786 F.2d 93 (2d Cir. 1986). (Nolde requires, inter alia, that the grievance be raised within a reasonable time after contract expiration). Here, the grievances arose 6 months after contract expiration.

However, in resolving Respondent's deferral defense it is unnecessary to reach or decide the Nolde Bros. issue or the General Counsel's argument of union hostility. For whatever reason, the parties have failed to submit in evidence the expired contract, or even its terms, if any, relating to arbitration, including the binding nature thereof, or what issues the arbitrator might consider. There is nothing on this record other than a stipulation that a contract binding the parties expired in April 1985. Nor was the contract or its arbitration provisions, if any, introduced in evidence or described in a companion case (Case 24–CA–5293) involving some of the same parties, certain issues in which apparently were submitted to arbitration. Because the Board rule is settled that a precondition to deferral is the existence of a contract which an arbitrator may interpret, Teamsters Local 287 (Reed & Graham), 272 NLRB 348 (1984), and because there is insufficient evidence of the existence, scope, or binding nature of an agreement to arbitrate any dispute, I must necessarily recommend to the Board that Respondent's request for deferral under the doctrine of Collyer Insulated Wire, 192 NLRB 837 (1971), and United Technologies Corp., 268 NLRB 557 (1984), be denied. See Arizona Portland Cement Co., 281 NLRB 304 fn. 2 (1986).

[5] Local 1 represents warehouse, maintenance, and laundry employees; Local 3 represents clerical workers; Local 4 represents X-ray technicians; Local 5 represents operating room technicians; Local 6 represents practical nurses in the clinics only; and Local 7 represents registered nurses.

[6] More than 20 LPNs were laid off on 15 October, with a further group in excess of 20 laid off on 29 November. Thirty-five registered nurses were hired to replace them.

some of the employees ceased wearing black ribbons and wore only a round union button, while others wore the black ribbon and the union button. Whereas the black ribbon (G.C. Exh. 6) measures about 4 inches long in each wing, the union button (G.C. Exh. 12) is 2-1/2 inches in diameter and is white with black letters and yellow markings showing affiliation with Local 1199 (Union Nacional de Trabajadores de la Salud).

This was not Respondent's first experience when black ribbons were worn by its personnel. In August 1981, eight of its emergency room employees wore black ribbons with the word "protest" on the ribbon. The administrator of the hospital at that time (Jose Antonio Brull) contacted Confederacion President Frank Ruiz and told him that the wearing of the ribbons in the hospital was illegal. Ruiz answered that if the hospital withheld disciplinary action, he would try to get them to remove the ribbons. The ribbons were removed after a few days and the hospital took no action against the employees. The parties did not take the matter to arbitration or seek to further specify in the succeeding collective-bargaining agreement, or otherwise, what prohibitions, if any, on wearing items on uniforms, existed.

Commencing about Wednesday, 9 October 1985, more than 90 unit employees ceased wearing the black ribbons and commenced wearing 6-inch long red ribbons (G.C. Exh. 8), the red ribbons consisting of a single wing approximately 7-1/4 inches long and bearing, in parallel lines along its length, the words "Protesta por Despido" ("protest for discharge"). The employees wore the red ribbons on their uniforms inside the hospital from around 10 October to 15 October. At that time no black ribbons were worn. Some employees wore Local 1199 union buttons with the red ribbons.

Many unit employees are employed in the nursing department (total of 286 employees) under the direction of Nursing Director Maria T. Rivera. In four to six meetings (9 to 14 October) of nursing department personnel,[7] many of whom were wearing union buttons and ribbons in various colors, Nursing Director Rivera told the employees that wearing the ribbons and buttons violated a hospital rule and that they had to remove the ribbons and union buttons from their uniforms or face "severe disciplinary measures" very few employees removed the ribbons. These meetings were a result of 9 and 10 October meetings of hospital supervisors called by Pou. Pou told his supervisors that the red ribbon could not be worn anywhere or at any time in the hospital. There is no dispute that both the black and red ribbons were worn pursuant to Local 2's protest against the replacement of LPNs by registered nurses.

As a result of Pou's meeting with hospital supervisors, Respondent invoked its "uniform code" and instructed its supervisors to direct the employees to remove the ribbons and any other object on the uniform other than employee nametag and the name of the school in which the employee trained. It might be noted that Rivera told the employees under her control in the nursing department, at these four to six meetings, that they would have to remove the black ribbons even before the appearance of the red ribbons (Tr. 443); and that the employees also had to remove the Local 1199 buttons (Tr. 443–444). Rivera testified that a great majority of the employees wearing the ribbons were involved in direct care of patients (Tr. 445). She did not tell any of the employees, whether involved in direct patient care or not, when or where they could wear any of the ribbons or buttons. It is uncontested, for instance, that the unit employees and other employees eat in a cafeteria on hospital grounds which is restricted to the employees of the hospital. No others may eat there.

Pou convened the 9 October meeting of his supervisors because of reports, discussed below, of dissention among employees and harassment of patients with regard to the wearing of the ribbons and buttons. It was on that basis that Pou directed his supervisors to direct the employees to remove ribbons and any other objects from their uniforms.

On 11 October, Respondent issued the following letter (G.C. Exh. 9(a)) to all employees wearing the red ribbon:

> As you are aware, it is this Hospital's policy not to allow its uniformed employees to wear insignias or buttons not pertinent to same, other than the identification, employee name or other articles which are part of your uniform or essential for your work.
> The reason for this policy is that the use of this insignia, buttons or objects not pertinent to the uniform interferes with the rendering of the health services assigned to you, causes confusion and insecurity in our patients and provokes friction and discord between visitors and employees.
> We hereby urge you to comply with this policy. If you fail to act pursuant to same, we will be forced to take more severe disciplinary action which may include your suspension from work without pay until same is complied with. Expecting your usual cooperation, I remain,
> Very truly yours,
> /s/ Jesse Pou Rivera
> Industrial Relations and Personnel Director

On the same morning (11 October) that the letters were distributed, Local 2 President Rosario, wearing a red button, met with Personnel Director Pou and asked why the letters were being distributed. Pou said that they had to remove the ribbons because the wearing of the ribbons was against the hospital's "norms and regulations" (Tr. 84). When Rosario asked Pou for the authority in the hospital manual restricting the use of the red ribbons on the uniforms, Pou did not show him any such rule or regulation but told him that if he did not take off the ribbon he would have to leave. Rosario told him he would not leave without a letter of suspension and Rosario returned to work without consequence. The employees continued to wear the red ribbons through 14 October 1985.

[7] While Supervisor Rivera testified that the meetings started in the week of 3 October, Pou testified that they started around 9 October. I credit Pou's recollection.

B. Respondent's Dress Code

At all material times, Respondent has maintained in its nursing department employee manual a dress code (R. Exh. 1(a)). The dress code appears in the manual but is not otherwise distributed to employees at the time of first hire or any other time. The manual is maintained in the nursing department and applies only to nursing department employees:

STANDARDS FOR USE OF UNIFORMS

Purpose

To project adequate and correct image, both to the patients, family members and visitors, as well as to the other fellow employees in the hospital.

Standards

1. The nursing personnel at all levels will use the complete and correct uniform in all shifts.
2. In the newborn, maternity and sterile supplies departments, the nursing staff will arrive at their respective departments with the completely white uniforms as it corresponds to them. Afterward, he or she will change to the proper clothing in these departments.
3. The maternity ward, newborn ward, and sterile supplies personnel will use their completely white uniforms to go down to the dining room as well as to go out to other areas of the Hospital. This personnel will only be allowed to perform pertinent tasks in the light blue flowered robe or the white robe over the light blue clothing used in these departments.
4. It is an indispensable requirement as part of your uniform the use of the Hospital identification pin.

Professional Nurses:

Feminine: White uniform, with 3/4 length sleeve, nursing cap, and school insignia, white stockings and white shoes. You can wear a skirt or white pants following the same indications.

Masculine: White pants, shirt, socks and shoes, as well as school pin.

Escorts:

Feminine: White uniform with short sleeve, brown socks and white shoes.

Masculine: Black pants, blue shirt (preferably Guayabera), do not use sweaters.

Practical Nurses:

Feminine: White short sleeve uniforms, nursing cap and school insignia, white socks and white shoes. She can wear an ensemble of skirt or pants following the same indications.

Masculine: In the case of the male nurse he will use white pants and shirts with the school insignia as well as white shoes and white socks.

Hospital Aids:

Feminine: White short sleeve uniform, brown socks, white shoes.

Masculine: White pants, shirts, socks and shoes.

Respondent does not suggest the existence of any other rule with regard to the use of uniforms. With regard to actual practice in the wearing of insignia, General Counsel's witness Maria L. Badillo testified without contradiction that at all times since her employment as a registered nurse in June 1978 she has worn on her uniform, while dealing with patients, various insignias including a yellow metal flower with leaves 2-1/2 inches by 1 inch; and particularly in the period September 1985 through November 1985 a 1-1/2-inch turkey to celebrate Thanksgiving, a 1-inch snowman, a 2-1/2-inch by 3/4-inch orange cat and ribbon; a 1-1/2-inch round purple union button; a 1-inch white plastic owl; a 1-inch green plastic elephant; a 2-inch enamel bird, a 1-1/2-inch by 2-1/2-inch black bat and a 3- to 4-inch double red ribbon holding a 1-inch figure of a doctor (this pin was distributed by the Hospital itself). General Counsel's witness testified that she has continued to wear these pins, even through the time of the hearing, and that she sees physicians, nurses, and other personnel wear various types of insignia and has not heard that they had been cautioned or disciplined therefor.

C. Invocation of Respondent's Rule against Wearing of Insignia

Jesse Pou testified that the reason he held the 9 and 10 October meetings with his supervisors which resulted in Respondent issuing its 11 October letter (G.C. Exh. 9) forbidding employees from wearing the red ribbon (as well as the Local 1199 button) was that he had received reports from Nursing Supervisor Rivera and from other supervisors that patients were inquiring why LPNs were wearing ribbons, and red ribbons in particular; that there was friction among unit employees in the unit with regard to the wearing of ribbons; and that there was friction between LPNs and RNs with regard to the wearing of the ribbons; and that a patient had been discovered with a red ribbon attached to his bedclothes. In addition, he testified that the president of Local 7, a registered nurse, told him that she had been threatened by the LPNs. This president of Local 7 was never produced and the report of such a threat was never supported. In any event, these reports led to the meetings of 9 and 10 October among Respondent's supervisors, attended by Respondent's lawyer, where it was concluded that employee use of the red ribbon, in the light of all the circumstances, had to be curtailed for the best interest of the hospital and that they would have to invoke the dress code (Tr. 611). Pou testified that Respondent notified all supervisors to tell the employees to remove the red ribbons and any other object that was not part of the uniform. Respondent then issued its 11 October letter to employees forbidding the wearing of insignia and buttons (G.C. Exh. 9(a)).

Pou also testified that in a meeting of 11 October with Confederacion President Frank Ruiz, he told Ruiz that the wearing of the red ribbons violated a hospital rule and that Ruiz agreed.[8] At the time of his conversation with Ruiz, Pou knew of friction between Local 2 and the Confederacion and that Local 2 might affiliate with Local 1199. When Pou asked Ruiz to speak to the unit members and have them remove the red ribbons, as he had done in 1981, Ruiz refused and said that any hospital discipline over wearing the red ribbon was Local 2's problem and not his problem (Tr. 631).

In support of Pou's testimony that the 11 October warning letter to remove the red ribbon was occasioned by reports of employee and patient friction, Respondent produced Supervisor Nilda Camora who testified that commencing with the wearing of red ribbons, patients told her that nurses had told them that the nurses were to be fired and that no one would take care of them. She told the patients that services would improve with registered nurses. These first conversations with patients occurred when the LPNs began wearing red ribbons. Indeed, she found one of the patients wearing a red ribbon. She observed that of the 65 employees under her supervision, 25 to 30 of the employees wore the black ribbon and even some registered nurses work black ribbons; and that perhaps 40 patients or family members approached her in the first 2 weeks of October regarding the ribbons and the layoffs which were going to occur among the LPNs. She reported all of these incidents to her nursing director, Maria T. Rivera.

Nursing Director Rivera testified that her department started to receive calls from patients regarding the use of black ribbons and wanted to know what it was all about. In meetings which followed these reports regarding black ribbons, she told employees that the insignia affected the patients negatively regardless of the reasons that the insignias were being worn and that the hospital did not want to affect patient care. Rivera further testified that the red ribbons were being worn from 1 to 2 days before the 11 October warning letter went out. She admitted that the rules with regard to employee dress were never distributed and appeared only in the manual. She testified that in meetings in early October, she told employees that the wearing of ribbons was against the nursing department standard and told them to remove the ribbons or face severe discipline. Lastly, Rivera testified that the great majority of nursing department employees are involved in patient care, but that the rule prohibiting insignia of any kind applied to employees regardless of where they wore them, even in the cafeteria (which is restricted only to employees) and related to nursing department employees whether or not they were involved in direct patient care.

In support of Jesse Pou's testimony, Respondent adduced testimony from employee Gladys Bermudez, who testified that she refused the request of members of Local 2 to wear the black ribbon or the Local 1199 button and thereafter her fellow employees did not talk to her. She reported her co-employees' conduct to Nursing Director Rivera. Furthermore, on 7 October, she received an anonymous note (R. Exh. 4) that stated that "squealers and brown nosers will be treated the same way as our enemies." She told this to Director Rivera. Rivera reported these facts to Pou prior to Pou's 9 October meeting with supervisors.

D. Suspension of 96 Unit Employees for Wearing the Red Ribbon

As above noted, after distribution of the 11 October warning letter (G.C. Exh. 9), and after Local 2 President Rosario and other employees refused to remove the red ribbons, many unit employees reported to work in the period 11 through 14 October wearing red ribbons in spite of having received the 11 October warning letters.

On 14 October, the LPNs, aides, and escorts punched in without ribbons but pinned on the red ribbons once inside the hospital. Pou told his supervisors to tell the employees to remove the ribbons and if they were not removed to give them a "suspension letter" (G.C. Exh. 10(a)). Thereafter, commencing 14 October and ending 16 October, as the employees wearing red ribbons reported for work and/or refused to remove them while at work, each was handed a letter dated 14 October 1985 as follows:

> Dear Sir:
> You have refused to comply with the rule of not wearing insignias or buttons not pertinent to the uniform other than the identification, employee name or other articles which are part of your uniform or essential for your work.
> In view of your refusal, which constitutes an act of insubordination, you are suspended from work without pay.
> Very truly yours,
> M. T. Rivera RN MSN
> Nursing Director

The parties agreed that pursuant to Respondent's letter, Respondent suspended 96 named employees (Appendix A) for wearing the red ribbon, over a 3-day period, 14–16 October. The parties further agreed that the suspensions were for an indefinite period until the employees removed the ribbon. On 17 October, all the employees who had been suspended returned to work at the hospital but did not then or thereafter wear the red ribbons.

E. Discharge of Heibert K. Rojas Hernandez

Heibert Rojas Hernandez was discharged on 26 November for wearing a red ribbon in the hospital. He punched in at 3 p.m. for his 3–11 p.m. shift and was told by an employee that Respondent had discharged two employees for chronic absenteeism and was going to terminate the next group of LPNs on 30 November rather than waiting until 15 December. Hernandez was concerned that Respondent's termination procedure in discharging these two employees was inconsistent with the prior method of terminating employees: to have Confederacion President Frank Ruiz meet with Jesse Pou prior to the actual terminations to discuss them. Hernandez telephoned Union President Rosario, discussed the two discharges and the impending early layoffs of the LPNs, and told Rosario he was going to wear a red ribbon to protest these Respondent actions.

Hernandez pinned on the ribbon about 5:30 p.m. At 6 o'clock, he was assisting a registered nurse in giving emergency treatment to a patient. He left the patient area and went to a nurses' counter to request an EKG machine when Supervisor Wanda Maldanado came by and noticed the red ribbon. She told him to remove the ribbon or else he would have "problems." Hernandez told her that he was wearing the ribbon in support of the LPNs.

Personnel Director Pou was notified of this event and paged Supervisor Maldanado by telephone about 6:40 p.m. She told him that she had found Heibert Hernandez wearing a red ribbon, told him to remove it, and that he had refused. Pou told her that he was coming to the hospital. Maldanado testified that at the time she spoke to Hernandez, he was about 10 to 12 feet from the nearest patient's room and that there were no visitors or patients nearby.

When Pou found Hernandez in the hospital, he was wearing a red ribbon and, with another employee, was moving an oxygen tank to the store room. The record is not clear whether there were any patients nearby or this was a patient care area. Pou told Hernandez to remove the red ribbon; Hernandez refused; Pou told him that he was "forcing a situation," but Hernandez refused again. Hernandez told Pou that he was wearing the ribbon in protest of his companions. Pou told him that if he did not remove the ribbon it would be an act of insubordination. They went to the supervisor's office where Pou asked him to remove the ribbon. Hernandez again refused. Pou asked him to punch out and go home. When Hernandez asked for a discharge letter, Pou told him that he would send it later because he had no secretary present at the time. Contrary to Hernandez' testimony, Pou testified that Hernandez did not mention the issue of employees terminated that day for chronic lateness but said that he was wearing the red ribbon because of the layoff of his "companions." It is unnecessary to resolve this conflict. In any event, Heibert Rojas Hernandez left that day and on or immediately after 29 November 1985 received a letter (G.C. Exh. 11(a)) signed by Jesse Pou advising him that his services were terminated for his insubordination on 26 November 1985 because of his wearing of the red ribbon in violation of the rules of the hospital; and that he was discharged because of "the most recent incident of insubordination and [his] past record which reveals a serious absenteeism problem, and other behavior problems ever since [he] started to work for the hospital."

IV. DISCUSSION AND CONCLUSIONS

The facts show that Respondent, in early October 1985, was presented with sufficient circumstances of patient anxiety and employee friction regarding employees' wearing red ribbons (a) to promulgate a rule restricting the wearing of union insignia at certain times and places in the hospital, but (b) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in promulgating, maintaining, and enforcing an overly broad rule banning the wearing of all union insignia on uniformed personnel everywhere and at all times in the hospital. Such a rule would be invalid in its breadth even if employees' wearing the red ribbons posed a threat to patient care in immediate patient care areas. Mesa Vista Hospital, 280 NLRB 298 (1986). Moreover, (c) although there was some evidence of friction among employees occasioned by the wearing or refusing to wear the ribbons, the evidence thereof did not rise to the level of posing a threat to patient care or breaches of discipline so as to ban the red ribbons, as Respondent did, everywhere and at all times in the hospital, Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 200 NLRB 667 (1972).

The General Counsel, in paragraph 5(a) of the consolidated amended complaint, as further amended at the hearing, alleges that, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, Respondent's 11 October 1985 letter to its employees promulgated and maintained an overly broad rule prohibiting its uniformed employees from wearing insignia and buttons on their uniforms in order to discourage the employees from wearing the red ribbon (bearing the legend "Protest for Discharge") and from engaging in other concerted activities protected by the Act.

A. Promulgation

The initial question regarding unlawful "promulgation" is whether Respondent already had a rule in existence which in any way prohibited the wearing of insignia by its employees. Respondent argues that its nursing department "Standards for Use of Uniforms" was and is such a rule (R. Exh. 1). I find, consistent with the General Counsel's argument, that the nursing department's rules for uniforms amount essentially only to a style code and do not amount to any proscription of what may not be worn on the uniform. Certainly the imposition of the affirmative obligation to wear the employee's school insignia and name identification card, without more, does not suggest the negative obligation to wear no other insignia. Moreover, as a matter of actual practice, the uncontradicted and credited evidence is that at all material times, employees, including LPNs, registered nurses, and even physicians, while administering patient care, wore all sorts of idiosyncratic insignia on their working uniforms, including animals, political pins, and similar elements, even red ribbons and union buttons, without evoking any disciplinary action or even verbal admonition from Respondent. The wearing of ribbons, buttons, and pins was fully acceptable conduct.

The only prior evocation of any employer reaction to the wearing of insignia was in 1981 when a group of employees wore black ribbons to protest taking orders from a particular nurse (Tr. 558). The black ribbons contained the word "protest" on them.

While it is true that Respondent's supervisor, in 1981, spoke to Confederacion President Ruiz about disciplining employees for wearing black ribbons (Tr. 561), the matter was mooted because the employees discontinued wearing the ribbon (there were about eight employees who wore the ribbon) (Tr. 562). Respondent's former officer who testified that the wearing of those black ribbons was against hospital rules was able only to point to the Respondent's "Standards For Use of Uniforms" as the source of his statement that it was against the hospital rules (Tr. 564–565). It was only his interpretation of that document that led him to testify that the hospital rules had been violated by the wearing of the black ribbons (Tr. 566).

In any event, I conclude that, on its face, there is nothing in Respondent's "Standards for Use of Uniforms" that proscribes the use of insignia on uniforms. The one instance in which employees ceased wearing ribbons because the supervisor told Ruiz it was against the rules does not establish union acquiescence in that interpretation. To the contrary, as above noted, the practice of wearing all types of insignia, including red ribbons and union buttons, has brought and does not bring, admonition or disciplinary action by Respondent.

Nor can Confederacion President Ruiz' apparent 11 October 1985 agreement (R. Exh. 2) that the employees' wearing of the ribbons and Local 1199 buttons violates hospital rules constitute a waiver of Local 2's and employees' rights to support Local 2 and Local 1199. The record is clear that by October 1985, Ruiz was aware of Local 2's antagonism against the Confederacion and its support of Local 1199. Under such conflicted circumstances, any Ruiz agreement with Respondent could not limit employee support for another labor organization or their disaffection for the Confederacion, NLRB v. Magnavox of Tennessee Co., 415 U.S. 322 (1974). I therefore agree with the General Counsel that Respondent's "Standards for Use of Uniforms" does not constitute a proscription against insignia and that there was no rule or practice in existence, in or about September through November 1985, that proscribed these Local 1199 union buttons or red ribbons. As I have found, the evidence of practice was substantially to the contrary (Respondent distributed a 4-inch red ribbon with the attached figure of a doctor on one occasion).

I further conclude, consistent with the General Counsel's argument, that the initiation of a rule proscribing union buttons (never before banned) and insignias commenced with the issuance of Respondent's 11 October letter (G.C. Exh. 9(a)) and that it was in response to and retaliated particularly against the wearing of the red ribbons. Respondent does not contest this latter fact. The red ribbons, protesting LPN layoffs, were a concerted and union activity, and so known to Respondent.

The Supreme Court has held that the display of union insignia on wearing apparel proclaiming union support or support for union activities is a right protected under Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 801–803 (1945). This right to display union insignia and union slogans is part of the employees' right to organize, to engage in activities for mutual aid and protection, and to solicit support among themselves toward that end. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, supra; Midstate Telephone Corp. v. NLRB, 706 F.2d 401, 403 (2d Cir. 1983). As the court noted in Midstate Telephone Corp. v. NLRB (at 403):

> As a general rule, the balance must tip against rules restricting employees' right to wear union-related insignia or attire, unless the employer demonstrates "'special circumstances' showing that such rule is necessary to maintain production and discipline."

With particular regard to health care facilities, the Board has recently ruled, in Mesa Vista Hospital, 280 NLRB 298 (1986), that:

> In health care facilities, rules that contain restrictions of nonworking time solicitation outside immediate patient care areas are presumptively invalid. NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, 422 U.S. 773, 781 (1979). The presumption is also applicable to rules restricting the wearing of insignia outside immediate patient care areas. George J. London Memorial Hospital, 238 NLRB 704, 708 (1978). . . . An employer may rebut the presumption by demonstrating that the rule is "necessary to avoid disruption of health-care operations or disturbance of patients." [Citing Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 507 (1978)]. The Supreme Court has observed that the Board's presumption "does no more than place on the hospital the burden of proving, with respect to areas to which it applies, that union solicitation, may adversely affect patients." [Emphasis added.]

In view of my findings above that Respondent had no rules or established practice restricting the use of union insignia on uniforms, or indeed any insignia on uniforms, prior to the issuance of its 11 October letter; and because the 11 October letter was specifically designed to prevent the wearing of union insignia on uniforms while the employees were any place in the hospital, I find that Respondent's promulgation, as a prima facie matter, was designed for the purpose of interfering with and preventing the wearing of union insignia on hospital uniforms and therefore its promulgation was presumptively unlawful and a violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Rich Plan of Weather Reserve v. NLRB, 796 F.2d 864 (6th Cir. 1986); Harry M. Stevens Services, 277 NLRB 276 (1985); Woodview Rehabilitation Center, 265 NLRB 838 (1982).

My observation of Respondent's witnesses and review of the record indicates a genuine fear by Respondent that the wearing of the red ribbons and attached slogans, indeed the wearing of any ribbons and even the Local 1199 union insignia, but especially the red ribbons, would have an adverse affect on patients and patient care. The uncontradicted evidence shows, through Nursing Director Rivera's testimony, that patients told her that they were apprehensive because LPNs reported that they might be fired, thus leaving the patients in a state of apprehension over future care in the hospital. In addition, there is uncontradicted evidence that unit employee Bermudez received an anonymous note accusing her of "brown nosing" and being an "enemy." This was a threat from the employees wearing the ribbons because of employee Bermudez' refusal to wear the ribbon or union button. I conclude that Jesse Pou was, in fact, concerned whether employees wearing the red ribbons might and did cause dissention among employees on the basis of the reports to him of the Bermudez incident, supra; and on the basis of reports from Supervisor Rivera that patient care was being affected because patients told her of being uneasy concerning their future treatment if the LPNs were fired (as the LPNs reported to the patients).

As the Board noted in Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 200 NLRB 667 (1972), the employer there had a right, as a reasonable precaution against discord and bitterness among employees, to prevent wearing of an otherwise protected union T-shirt bearing an obscene slogan. More important, as the Board noted in Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 200 NLRB at 671, the employer was under no compulsion to wait until employee and supervisor resentment piled up and physical violence occurred before it could suppress the wearing of the T-shirt as a method to enforce employee discipline. In this regard, it must be noted that employee Bermudez threatened to go "elsewhere" if there was a repetition of the threatening anonymous note to her.

Taking this uncontradicted evidence into account with regard to patient anxiety and this evidence of an employee threat, I nevertheless conclude that Respondent has failed to prove as a defense the presence of special circumstances sufficient to rebut and overcome its promulgating a rule overly broad in its scope. In short, as the Board recently held in Mesa Vista Hospital, supra:

> Even if we again assume that the wearing of the union insignia poses a threat to patient care, the Respondent cannot rely on this alone as a "special circumstance" to restrict the wearing of union insignia at all times when employees are working. [Emphasis added.]

Under the Mesa Vista rule, above, Respondent may not ban the wearing of union insignia at all places and at all times as it has done in its 11 October letter to all unit employees. Read literally, the newly promulgated rule applies to uniform personnel even outside the hospital. Thus, even in the presence of evidence of widespread patient anxiety due to the wearing of the red ribbons, Respondent may not promulgate such an overly broad rule as a response. Nor is the single threat to employee Bermudez nor co-employee ostracizing her of such significance as to permit Respondent to promulgate such an overly broad rule which applies everywhere and at all times. The Bermudez incidents do not suggest the imminence of riot or widespread employee friction so as to bring the facts within the rule of Southwestern Bell Telephone Co., 200 NLRB 667 (1972), in which a total ban was permitted to avoid widespread discord and perhaps violence.

B. Maintenance and Enforcement of the Rule Against Wearing Union Insignia on Uniforms

1. Maintenance

As above noted, in Mesa Vista Hospital, 280 NLRB 298 (1986), the Board has recently held that in health care facilities, rules that contain restrictions of nonworking time solicitation outside immediate patient care areas are presumptively invalid (NLRB v. Baptist Hospital, 422 U.S. 773, 781 (1979)); and the presumption is also applicable to rules restricting the wearing of insignia outside immediate patient care areas (George J. London Memorial Hospital, 238 NLRB 704, 708 (1978); St. Vincent's Hospital, 265 NLRB 38 (1982). The maintenance of an unlawfully broad rule restricting union solicitation is presumptively unlawful regardless of its enforcement. St. Vincent's Hospital, 265 NLRB 38, 41–42.

As the present rule shows on its face, and as Respondent's counsel at the hearing conceded, the rule makes no distinction relating to immediate patient care areas, other patient care areas, and nonpatient care areas. In terms of enforcement, it would be enforced even in Respondent's employee cafeteria which is restricted to use only by employees. There was no showing that any patients even used the cafeteria where employees only were permitted; nor does the rule permit employees to wear their ribbons and buttons in any hospital nonwork area. It therefore follows, under the authorities cited in Mesa Vista Hospital, supra, Respondent is then obliged to rebut the presumption of invalidity since the rule applies outside immediate patient care areas by showing that the rule is "necessary to avoid disruption of health-care operations or the disturbance of patients" everywhere in the hospital and at all times. Respondent has failed to do so. The mere maintenance of the rule therefore violates Section 8(A)(1) of the Act as alleged. St. Vincent's Hospital, supra. As discussed above, the evidence does not support the special circumstances defense of Respondent's total ban of insignia.

2. Enforcement of the rule

I agree with General Counsel that when Nursing Director Rivera told employees during department meetings in early October that, because of hospital policy, they would meet severe discipline if they did not remove their black ribbons, union buttons, and red ribbons, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. This threat is unlawful enforcement of an unlawful rule. The Board has held in St. Vincent's Hospital, supra, 265 NLRB at 42, that formal disciplinary action is not a prerequisite to finding that an overly broad rule has been unlawfully enforced. In St. Vincent's Hospital, the supervisor merely told an employee to remove a union pin which she was wearing in a patient care area. The Board there held that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act where the supervisor told the employee to remove her union pin pursuant to an unlawful rule notwithstanding that there was no supervisor threat and notwithstanding that it was in a patient care area. Here, Director Rivera threatened employees with discipline. I therefore conclude, consistent with the allegation of the compiaint, as amended at the hearing (the newly added subparagraph 6(d)), that Nursing Director Maria T. Rivera, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act unlawfully threatened employees with severe disciplinary measures if they failed to remove from their uniforms the red and black ribbons and the union button. I further conclude that Jesse Pou's 11 October letter itself, threatening discipline for the wearing of buttons or insignia on uniforms at any time or at any place,[9] similarly violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act under the above-cited authorities, as alleged in paragraph 6(a) of the consolidated amended complaint.

a. Suspension of employees for wearing union insignia

With regard to the suspension of 96 employees commencing 14 October 1985, the uncontradicted evidence is that they were suspended solely for wearing red ribbons. Respondent did not even adduce evidence that they were wearing red ribbons in patient care areas; but regardless of that fact, under Board rule, absent "special circumstances," as here, the indefinite suspension of the 96 employees for wearing the red ribbons pursuant to an unlawful rule violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged. St. Vincent's Hospital, supra, 265 NLRB at 42.

b. Discharge of Heibert Rojas Hernandez

Lastly, the November 26 discharge of Heibert Rojas Hernandez indicated that he was discharged for wearing the red ribbon[10] pursuant to Respondent's rule. The discharge, based on the enforcement of the hospital's unlawful rule, appears on the face of Respondent's 29 November 1985 discharge letter to Hernandez (G.C. Exh. 11(a)). There is no mention therein that he was engaged in patient care or was in a patient care area. But assuming that for at least part of the time he was engaged in patient care or certainly in a patient care area (he was wearing the red ribbon within 15 feet of a patient's room while at the nurses' station desk seeking an EKG machine but the precipitating act of "insubordination" occurred when, alone with Pou in a supervisor's office, he refused to remove the red ribbon) his discharge nevertheless violates Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act because the discharge was solely based on enforcement of an unlawful rule. As in the case of the layoff of the 96 employees for wearing the red ribbon, the discharge of Heibert Rojas Hernandez similarly violates the Act, St. Vincent's Hospital, supra. I further find, as alleged, violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act in Jesse Pou's conditioning the 96 employees' return to work on their not wearing the red ribbon. This was also pursuant to Respondent's unlawful rule.

Finally, I find that Jesse Pou Rivera unlawfully threatened Heibert Rojas Hernandez with discharge for failing to remove his ribbon from his uniform on or about 26 November as alleged in the complaint in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

While it is true that families, as well as patients, need a restful, uncluttered, relaxing, and healthful atmosphere in hospitals, rather than one remindful of the tensions of the market place, Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483 (1978), the means of achieving this desirable end in hospitals do not include the promulgation, maintenance, and enforcement of prohibitions of employee statutory rights to such a degree that the prohibitions apply even in areas far removed from patient care areas. Mesa Vista Hospital, supra. In short, the answer is for Respondent to draft, maintain, and enforce a lawful insignia rule.[11]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Asociacion Hospital del Maestro, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) and is a health care institution within the meaning of Section 2(14) of the Act.

2. Union Local No. 2 de Enfermeas y Endermeos Auxiliares Practicos Licenciados y Escoltos del Hospital del Maestro, affiliated with Confederacion Obrera Puertoriquena, Confederacion Obrera Peurtoriquena, and Local 1199, Union Nacional de Trabajadores de la Salud, are, and have been at all material times, labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By promulgating, maintaining, and enforcing a rule prohibiting its employees' wearing union insignia on their uniforms, not limited to immediate patient care areas or other specifically identified areas where the wearing of union insignia would adversely affect patient care, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By threatening employees, pursuant to the rule in paragraph 3, above, with discipline for wearing ribbons or other union insignia on behalf of Local 1199, Local 2, or any other labor organization, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By suspending those 96 employees listed in Appendix A, on or about 14 October 1985, pursuant to the above-described rule, for wearing or failing to remove union insignia, Respondent is engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

6. By conditioning the recall of the 96 employees listed in Appendix A on their not wearing red ribbons, designating union activity, Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

7. By discharging and refusing or failing to recall Heibert Rojas Hernandez, Respondent's employee, commencing about 26 November 1985, because he wore union insignia while at work, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by discriminating against such employee thereby discouraging membership in a labor organization.

[9] Cases such as Evergreen Nursing Home, 198 NLRB 775 (1972), cited in Mesa Vista, supra, are not in point. In Evergreen, the Board upheld a dress code rule requiring no adornments on white uniforms. In the instant case, as a matter of actual practice, Respondent has long tolerated, and continues to tolerate, all kinds of ribbons and buttons on its uniformed personnel.

[10] To the extent that Respondent's discharge letter to Rojas Hernandez alludes to misconduct other than the "insubordinate" wearing of the red ribbon as a basis for the discharge, such other alleged misconduct is rejected as unproven. NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

[11] Respondent engaged in the very conduct proscribed in Beth Israel Hospital v. NLRB, 437 U.S. 483, 500–501: in banning insignia without regard to impact on patient care under its assessment of the need to ensure patient care and avoid employee friction, "[it] is not surprising that [the hospital's] assessment of the need for a particular practice might overcompensate its goals, and give too little weight to employee organizational interests." Cf. Hudgens v. NLRB, 424 U.S. 507 (1976). In Beth Israel, supra, the Supreme Court found unlawful the hospital's ban on union solicitation in the hospital cafeteria used by employees, patients, and visitors.

8. The above-described unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent is engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, I shall recommend to the Board that Respondent cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative actions designed to effectuate the policies of the Act. Accordingly, I shall recommend to the Board that Respondent make whole those 96 employees unlawfully suspended commencing about 14 October 1985 for any loss of earnings, including all contract benefits, they may have suffered as a result of their unlawful suspensions with interest to be computed in the manner described in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 657 (1977); see Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Similarly, I shall recommend to the Board that Heibert Rojas Hernandez, discharged because of his wearing the red ribbon, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, be offered immediate reinstatement to his old job, discharging if necessary any replacement, and similarly make him whole for any net loss of earnings he may have suffered because of Respondent's discrimination against him, with interest, pursuant to the above-noted Board rules. Backpay shall be computed on a quarterly basis as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950).

On the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law, and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

ORDER

The Respondent, Asociacion Hospital del Maestro, Inc., San Juan, Puerto Rico, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging, suspending, refusing to recall, or otherwise discriminating against employees pursuant to an unlawful rule governing their wearing of union insignia on uniforms or for engaging in other union or concerted activity protected by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) Promulgating, maintaining, or enforcing any rule, regulation, or other prohibition which forbids the wearing of union insignia on employee uniforms, outside immediate patient care areas, or outside other specifically identified areas where the wearing of union insignia would adversely affect patient care.

(c) Threatening employees with discipline, pursuant to an overly broad rule governing the wearing of union insignia, or the wearing of insignia otherwise protected by the provisions of Section 7 of the National Labor Relations Act.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to Heibert Rojas Hernandez immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if such job no longer exists, to substantially equivalent employment, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him, and those employees listed on Appendix A, whole for any loss of earnings, including contract benefits, they may have suffered by reason of Respondent's discrimination against them in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Rescind its 11 October 1985 rule governing the wearing of insignia to the extent that it prohibits employees from wearing union insignia on their uniforms, outside immediate patient care areas, or outside other specifically identified areas where the wearing of union insignia would adversely affect patient care.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful suspensions of any of the employees listed in the attached Appendix A and of Heibert Rojas Hernandez, and notify each of them, in writing, that this has been done, and that evidence of the unlawful suspensions or discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions concerning them.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(e) Post at its San Juan, Puerto Rico hospital facilities, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[13] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 24, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(f) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[12] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[13] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge, suspend, or otherwise discriminate against any of our employees, pursuant to an overly broad rule restricting employees' right to wear union insignia, where the wearing thereof is lawful and protected pursuant to the terms of the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT promulgate, maintain, or enforce any rule, regulation, or other prohibition which forbids the wearing of union insignia on employee uniforms, outside immediate patient care areas, or outside other specifically identified areas where the wearing of union insignia would adversely affect patient care.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees to cease wearing union insignia on pain of severe discipline pursuant to an overly broad rule governing the wearing of insignia.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL rescind our rule, issued on 11 October 1985, governing the wearing of insignia, to the extent that it prohibits employees from wearing union insignia, outside immediate patient care areas, or outside other specifically identified areas where the wearing of insignia would adversely affect patient care.

WE WILL offer immediate and full reinstatement to our employee Heibert Rojas Hernandez, to his old job or, if that job no longer exists, to substantially equivalent employment, and WE WILL make him and the 96 employees listed in Appendix A whole for any loss of pay they may have suffered as a result of our unlawful discrimination against such employees, plus interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the unlawful discharge of Heibert Rojas Hernandez or suspensions of any of our employees listed in Appendix A of the decision of the National Labor Relations Board, and notify each of them, in writing, that this has been done, and that evidence of these unlawful acts will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions concerning them.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 18 July 1983 Administrative Law Judge Harold B. Lawrence issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the General Counsel, and the Charging Party filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Charging Party filed a brief in answer to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] as modified, and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing to provide the Union with information relevant and necessary to the Union's representation of bargaining unit employees. In addition, the judge concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by delaying in furnishing information requested by the Union regarding the Respondent's minority personnel and its contract with USSI. In reaching the latter conclusion, the judge relied on amendments made to the complaints at the hearing alleging that the Respondent delayed in providing the Union designated portions of the information requested by it. For the following reasons, we conclude that the judge improperly permitted these amendments to the complaints, and we reject his conclusion that the Respondent violated the Act by delaying in furnishing information to the Union.

The complaints in the instant cases issued on 24 and 30 April 1981 and alleged that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing between December 1980 and February 1981 to provide certain enumerated items of information requested by the Union, including copies of the Respondent's annual reports to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) and information related to the Respondent's relationship with USSI. In May 1981 the Respondent answered the complaints, denying that it had violated the Act. On 5 June 1981 the Regional Director issued an order consolidating the cases for hearing and setting a hearing date of 26 April 1982. The Regional Director subsequently issued orders postponing the hearing until 14 September 1982.

The hearing was held on 14, 15, 16, 17, and 24 September 1982. On the final day of hearing, counsel for the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to include an allegation that the Respondent unlawfully delayed furnishing information

[1] In sec. II,B,6 of his decision, the judge erroneously found that the Union's request for information about the personnel employed by User Services Systems, Inc. (USSI) pursuant to USSI's contract with the Respondent was not limited to USSI personnel employed on the Respondent's premises, whereas the Union's request was so limited. This error does not affect our decision. In addition, in sec. II,B,3 of his decision, the judge erroneously found that in response to the Union's request for information regarding writers and photographers holding independent contractor, freelance, or stringer status with the Respondent between 1978 and 1981, the Respondent provided information for only a 2-month period, whereas the record reflects that the Respondent provided information for 1980 and January 1981. We shall modify the judge's recommended Order accordingly.

[2] We agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to provide the Union with statistical and other information relating to the equal employment opportunities of unit employees and promotions from the bargaining unit. We further agree with the judge that similar statistical information relating to nonunit and managerial personnel is relevant for purposes of assessing the Respondent's record of promoting unit personnel to managerial positions. With respect to this nonunit information, however, we find that the Union has not established the relevance of the wage and benefit information requested. Additionally, while we agree with the judge that copies of the reports filed by the Respondent with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission are presumptively relevant, we find that he erred in excluding them on the grounds that they "would appear" to be duplicative of other information the Respondent is obligated to furnish. Thus, we find that to the extent they are not repetitive of other information the Respondent is obligated to furnish, these reports must be provided to the Union.

In addition, while we agree with the judge's conclusion that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to provide the Union with information regarding the kind and extent of advertising work performed by subcontractors after November 1979, we note that at the hearing counsel for the General Counsel withdrew those portions of the complaint alleging that the Respondent unlawfully failed to provide the amounts billed to it and the information regarding employees in the Respondent's Creative Services Department, who, but for the subcontracting, would have performed the advertising work. Accordingly, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order to exclude this information and to require only that the Respondent provide a list of all promotion jobs assigned to subcontractors since November 1979 and the hours spent on each job. In this regard, the Respondent need not identify the individual subcontractors, as the Union has not established the relevance of this information.

Although we agree with the judge that the Respondent is obligated to provide information regarding personnel employed by USSI at the Respondent's premises, we shall limit the Union's request to exclude the names and addresses of these individuals, work schedules, and employee manuals. Further, we shall order the Respondent to provide this information only to the extent it has access thereto.

Finally, with regard to the Union's request for information relating to the Respondent's use of independent contractors, freelancers, and stringers, the judge, relying on Press Democrat Publishing Co., 258 NLRB 1355 (1981), determined that the Union was not entitled to information concerning the amounts paid to these individual nonunit writers. In agreeing with the judge, we note that, unlike Press Democrat, the Union here arguably does claim to represent the independent contractors, freelancers, and stringers, and this claim provided the impetus for the information requested. We find, however, that the Union has not demonstrated the relevance of the individual financial information requested. We therefore shall adopt the judge's recommended Order in this regard.

to the Union regarding the Respondent's EEOC reports and its relationship to USSI. The judge permitted the amendments over the Respondent's objections. On the basis of the amended complaints, the judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by its delay until June 1982 in furnishing the Union with a listing of the Respondent's minority employees, their job classifications, and their employment histories and by its delay until September 1982 in furnishing the Union with a copy of the Respondent's contract with USSI.

Under Section 102.17 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, an amendment to a complaint may be granted "upon such terms as may be deemed just." As indicated above, counsel for the General Counsel first moved to amend the complaints on 24 September 1982, the last day of hearing. There is no explanation why counsel for the General Counsel waited until the last minute to add this allegation to the complaints. Further, the amendments were proposed by counsel for the General Counsel at the conclusion of his case-in-chief and were not formally offered and ruled by the judge until immediately before the close of the hearing. Although the record reveals some discussion from which the Respondent may have earlier surmised that amendments to the complaints might be proposed, we do not share the judge's confidence in finding that the Respondent was not prejudiced by the 11th-hour amendments.[3] Under the circumstances, we find that the judge erroneously allowed counsel for the General Counsel to amend the complaints to allege that the Respondent had unlawfully delayed in furnishing information to the Union. Accordingly, we dismiss these allegations of the complaints.

In addition, the judge found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by refusing to supply the Union with information requested by it regarding the use of sick leave by the Respondent's employees and the names and absentee records of individuals placed on the Respondent's absentee control program. In recommending a remedy for this conduct, the judge made no provision for the protection of employee privacy, notwithstanding the Respondent's contention that the requested information is confidential and the obviously sensitive nature of these individually identified records. Johns-Manville Sales Corp., 252 NLRB 368 (1980); Minnesota Mining & Mfg. Co., 261 NLRB 27 (1982), enfd. sub nom. Oil Workers Local 6–418 v. NLRB, 711 F.2d 348, 363 (D.C. Cir. 1983). Accordingly, we shall modify the judge's recommended Order to delete from the individual absentee records, which must be supplied to the Union, information revealing the identity of the employees concerned.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified and set out in full below and orders that the Respondent, The New York Post Corporation, a Wholly Owned Subsidiary of News Group Publications, Inc., New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with Newspaper Guild of New York, Local 3 of the Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO by refusing on request to supply relevant information needed by the Guild to perform its duties as collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit consisting of all employees in the Editorial, Business, Advertising, Circulation, Publication, Mechanical and Maintenance Departments, excluding exempt employees and employees already covered by a union contract other than that between the Respondent and Newspaper Guild of New York, Local 3 of The Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Furnish, on request and to the extent not already furnished, to Newspaper Guild of New York, Local 3 of The Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO the following information, updated, if necessary, to the current period:

(1) Information requested by the Guild in a memorandum dated 23 February 1981 consisting of a list of minority personnel by name, job classification, and history of promotional record relating to

[3] Thus this situation differs from that presented in Clark Equipment Co., 278 NLRB 498 (1986), in which we found that the complaint properly included allegations not specifically set forth in the charge. In Clark Equipment, the employer, through the complaint, had notice of the allegations brought against it and could therefore meaningfully prepare its defense. Here, however, the allegations of delay, unlike the allegations of refusal to provide information, were not specifically known to the Respondent until the final day of the hearing. Thus, because the Respondent did furnish some of the requested information prior to the hearing, and the complaint did not serve as notice to the Respondent of the additional allegations of delay, the Respondent may have been misled about the nature of the evidence required for its defense. Because the Respondent objected to the amendment and had not previously litigated the factual basis for such a violation, this is not a case in which the General Counsel was merely seeking to amend the pleadings to conform to the proof. Hence nothing in this decision affects the precedential value of those cases in which the Board and courts have found that violations not alleged in either the complaint or a formal amendment of the complaint could properly be found because they had been fully and fairly litigated by the parties. See, e.g., Alexander's Restaurant v. NLRB, 586 F.2d 1300, 1304 (9th Cir. 1978); Multi-Medical Convalescent & Nursing Center, 225 NLRB 429 and fn. 5 (1976).

both unit and nonunit employees, excluding wage and benefit information for nonunit employees.

(2) Reports submitted by the Respondent to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission since 1978 to the extent such information is not repetitive of other information the Respondent is required to provide.

(3) Information requested by the Guild on 23 February 1981 consisting of the total number of staffers and the number taking sick leave and the number of days of sick leave taken in the years 1977, 1979, and 1980 and, with respect to those years, a breakdown showing the number of occurrences of illness, the average length of absences, the number of persons affected by and the number of days docked under the terms of article XI, section 1, paragraph 2, of the collective-bargaining agreement, and the names of the individuals placed on the absentee control program and their individual absentee records. With respect to such individual absentee records, the Respondent shall provide such records only after deleting therefrom information identifying the employee concerned. The Respondent, in connection with this request, shall permit photocopying of pertinent records and the making of statistical abstracts therefrom.

(4) Information requested by the Guild consisting of the names and contractual status of writers and photographers holding independent contractor, freelance, or stringer status with the Respondent in 1978 and 1979, excluding individual financial information.

(5) A list of all promotion jobs assigned to advertising agencies since November 1979 and the hours spent on each job, except that the Respondent need not identify the advertising agencies.

(6) Information requested by the Guild on 28 November 1980 consisting of the terms and conditions of the contract under which work was being performed for the Respondent by Stat-Tab and the volume of work performed by Stat-Tab pursuant to its contract with the Respondent.

(7) Information requested by the Guild on 28 November 1980 consisting of the terms and conditions of the Respondent's contract with User Service Systems, Inc. (USSI) and to the extent it has access thereto the following data concerning all USSI personnel, past or present, who worked on the Respondent's premises: their classifications or job titles and job descriptions, a description of duties performed by them, their current and past pay rates, and their fringe benefits, excluding names and addresses, work schedules, and employee manuals.

(b) Post at its office and place of business where notices to employees represented by Newspaper Guild of New York, Local 3 of The Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO in the bargaining unit hereinabove described are customarily posted by the Respondent copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including, as described above, all places where notices to employees employed in the appropriate bargaining unit are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(c) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with Newspaper Guild of New York, Local 3 of The Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO by refusing to supply, on request, relevant information needed by the Guild to represent the employees covered under its contract with us.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, furnish the Guild with the following information:

1. Information requested by the Guild in a memorandum dated 23 February 1981 consisting of a list of minority personnel by name, job classification, and history of promotional record relating to both unit and nonunit employees, excluding wage and benefit information for nonunit employees.

2. Reports submitted to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission since 1978, if such information is not repetitive of other information we must provide.

3. Information requested by the Guild on 23 February 1981 consisting of the total number of staffers and the number taking sick leave and the number of days of sick leave taken in the years 1977, 1979, and 1980 and, with respect to those years, a breakdown showing the number of occurrences of illness, the average length of absences, the number of persons affected by and the number of days docked under the terms of article XI, section 1, paragraph 2, of the collective-bargaining agreement, and the names of the individuals placed on the absentee control program and their individual absentee records. In connection with this request, we will permit the photocopying of pertinent records and the making of statistical abstracts therefrom.

4. Information requested by the Guild consisting of the names and contractual status of anyone holding independent contractor, freelance, or stringer status with us in 1978 and 1979, excluding individual financial information.

5. A list of all promotion jobs assigned to any advertising agencies since November 1979 and the hours spent on each job as reflected by billing statements.

6. Information requested by the Guild on 28 November 1980 consisting of the terms and conditions of the contract under which work was being performed for us by Stat-Tab and the volume of work performed by Stat-Tab pursuant to its contract with us.

7. Information requested by the Guild on 28 November 1980 consisting of the terms and conditions of our contract with User Services Systems, Inc., and the following data concerning all personnel of User Services Systems, Inc., past or present, who worked on our premises: their classifications or job titles and job descriptions, a description of the duties performed by them, their current and past pay rates, and their fringe benefits, but excluding names and addresses, work schedules, and employee manuals.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HAROLD B. LAWRENCE, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated proceedings were tried before me on September 14 to 17 and 24, 1982, at New York, New York. The charges were filed on March 10, 1981, by the Newspaper Guild of New York, Local 3, The Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO, or "The Guild." The complaints and notices of hearing in Cases 2–CA–17906 and 2–CA–17905 were issued on April 24 and 30, 1981, respectively. The proceedings were consolidated by order dated June 5, 1981.

The complaint alleges that Respondent, publisher of the New York Post, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act by failing and refusing to furnish certain information requested by the Guild and, in certain instances, by procrastination in furnishing information. The Respondent contended that no violation of the Act had occurred because in the case of every request either the information was in fact furnished or was already in the Guild's possession, or was not legally required to be furnished.[1]

The parties were afforded full opportunity to be heard; to call, examine and cross-examine witnesses; and to introduce relevant evidence. Posthearing briefs have been filed on behalf of the General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Charging Party.

On the entire record and based on my observation of the witnesses and consideration of the briefs submitted, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

There is no issue concerning jurisdiction. The Respondent, The New York Post Corporation, a wholly owned subsidiary of New Group Publications, Inc., admits that it is now and at all material times has been an

[1] The Respondent was permitted, on motion, to incorporate in its answer certain allegations which it denominated as affirmative defenses, so as to conform the answer to such evidence as may have been introduced during the hearing with respect to the following matters: lack of joint employer status between Respondent and certain companies to whom work had been subcontracted (so as to excuse Respondent's failure to produce information from the files of those companies); confidentiality of information respecting freelancers and employees of certain companies to whom work had been subcontracted; lack of good faith on the part of the Guild in making requests for information; lack of relevancy of information sought; the burdensome nature of the requested-for information; misuse of information by the Guild; lack of delay on the part of the Respondent in furnishing information. To the extent that material evidence was submitted by the Respondent which tended to establish any of these contentions, such evidence is discussed in connection with the informational request to which it is pertinent. Except in certain instances noted below, no substantial evidence was introduced by Respondent which would have tended to establish any of these defenses. The contention that requests were burdensome is disposed of by the suggestion made in Safeway Stores, 252 NLRB 1323, 1324 (1980), enfd. 691 F.2d 953 (10th Cir. 1982):

> In short, Respondent's obligation is to provide the information it has available, to compile it, or to give the Union access to the records from which it can reasonably compile the information. And, if the production of the information ordered involved substantial costs, the parties may bargain over the allocation of these costs.

employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act and that the Guild is now and at all material times has been a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. It was stipulated that News Group Publications, Inc., which owns the New York Post Corporation, is a subsidiary of a corporation known as News America, which owns publications and other corporations in Texas and New York and which is itself a subsidiary of News Limited of Australia, which is a subsidiary of News Corporation.

II. THE ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF SECTION 8(A)(5) AND (1)

A. Background

The Respondent has had a collective-bargaining relationship with the Guild since 1935. The last two collective-bargaining agreements were for the periods from March 31, 1978, through March 30, 1981, and March 31, 1981, through March 30, 1984. The bargaining unit is:

> All employees in the Editorial, Business, Advertising, Circulation, Publication, Mechanical and Maintenance Department, excluding exempt employees and employees covered by another job contract.

During the period from November 28, 1980, to February 23, 1981, Joy Cook, the Guild's unit chairperson, addressed a series of requests for information to Leonard Arnold, personnel director and industrial relations manager of the Respondent. These are claimed by the Guild to relate to several broad categories of union activity or interest. Thus requests for information relating to the Respondent's absentee control program and for copies of complaints filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission are claimed to have been made in order to enable the Union to monitor the performance of the existing contracts. The alleged need to ascertain whether union jurisdiction was being violated is claimed to underline a request for data respecting independent contractors, freelancers, and stringers. The claimed need to ascertain whether the jobs of the unit were being eroded and jurisdiction of the Union thereby impaired forms the basis of requests for information regarding three companies doing work for Respondent formerly performed by unit personnel and the nature of the work being performed.

B. Monitoring Functions

1. Request for data relating to equality of employment opportunities

Article XX, section 1 of the collective-bargaining agreement prohibits "discriminations in hiring or promotion for reasons of race, creed, color, sex, national origin, political belief, or membership or activity in the Guild." It obligates the Respondent to continue to abide by the principles of nondiscrimination embodied in Federal and state statutes and to observe "the spirit as well as the letter of this provision . . . so that relationships between the parties may develop constructively."

On February 23, 1981, the Guild requested information respecting various Guild-covered employees who are members of minority groups and copies of some reports filed by the Respondent with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission since 1978, as follows:

> Name, Date of Hire, Date of Birth, Sex, Race, Marital Status, Salary Group, Job Classification, Rate of Pay, Merit Pay and Experience Level for all staffers in Guild jurisdiction, by alphabetical listing. A separate breakdown by wage group showing the number in each group, age, sex and race or national origin.
> A breakdown of all persons on posted rates in Groups 1-5B who were hired after June 9, 1978, their names, date of hire, job classification, salary rate, experience level, sex, race and age.
> The average salary for Post employees.
> The number of Post employees in Guild jurisdiction as of February 1, 1981 with a breakdown by full time, part time, temporary, voucher; by age, sex and race.
> Copies of the Post's EEOC reports filed since 1978.

The Respondent provided a listing of minorities in Guild jurisdiction by name and job classification and a history of their promotion records. However, the information was not transmitted to the Guild until June 22, 1982, and was limited to June 1982. None of the other information requested has been furnished. No data has been furnished for the previous years. No information was provided respecting managerial positions.

The Union contends that the statistical breakdown and the prior years' information would have enabled it to ascertain whether a pattern of discrimination existed and, if so, whether conditions in this regard were improving or deteriorating.

Cook's February 23 memorandum advised the Respondent that the information was requested in order to facilitate preparations for contract bargaining and arbitration. Cook testified that she was interested in obtaining the statistical breakdown of the Post's work force because she had been approached by Guild members who wished to invoke the grievance machinery for alleged violations; that their complaints corroborated her personal observations; that she had perceived a decline in minority representation in top pay groups in the reporter category and in the top level responsibilities; that complaints received by her included complaints from black reporters and from the Chairman of the Human Rights Committee at the Post; and that complaints also were received relative to the absence of minorities and women in managerial capacities and to their under-representation in promotions from Guild ranks to managerial positions. None of these persons filed individual complaints respecting their own failure to achieve promotion to management positions; their complaints related to their general perception of the situation at the Post.

The Respondent has taken the position that its failure to comply with the Guild's request is excused because the information which it refused to furnish is available to the Guild from several other sources, including a roster of employees previously supplied to it as of February 1, 1981, weekly personnel transaction sheets which have been sent to the Guild routinely since 1971, weekly voucher reports (relating to persons hired on a temporary basis) that the Post has furnished since 1979, and weekly reports respecting personnel changes at the Post provided pursuant to the collective-bargaining agreement. Arnold sent Cook a memorandum explaining in some detail the means by which the data sought by the Guild could be extracted from all this material. This would disclose which personnel had been terminated, who were full and who were part-time employees, and whether individuals have received increases due to changes in experience levels. However, he insisted that the EEOC reports themselves could not be made available to the Guild because they contain information with respect to all employees, including those who are not within the Guild's jurisdiction. It is well settled that that fact is an insufficient basis for refusing to furnish the information requested. The yardstick is not whether the persons respecting whom information is sought are in the unit, but whether the information sought is relevant to the duties of the bargaining representative. This is especially so when there is suspicion that the bargaining unit is being eroded.[2]

After an exchange of memoranda on the subject in June 1981, the Guild filed a grievance alleging the existence of an overall pattern of discrimination in the hiring and promotion of women and employees belonging to minority groups.

As formulated in the numerous cases which have considered the problem of the extent and manner in which disclosure ought to be required, the general principles are easily stated: A labor organization representing employees in a bargaining unit is entitled to such information from the employer as may be relevant and reasonably necessary to the proper performance of its duties, whether these involve negotiating a collective-bargaining agreement or administering it in an intelligent fashion. It is sufficient if the desired information is probably or potentially relevant and useful, as judged by a liberal discovery-type standard. The fact that the requested information may relate to employers and employees outside the represented bargaining unit does not, by itself, negate its relevance. Wage and related information pertaining to employees in the bargaining unit is presumptively relevant; with respect to other requested data, relevance must be demonstrated more precisely by reference to the circumstances of the case. In short, a union is entitled to discovery-type disclosure, with relevance being presumed as to unit personnel and required to be demonstrated before disclosure will be directed in other cases.[3] The question to be addressed, in every case in which nonunit personnel are involved, is essentially whether a sufficient showing of relevance has been made. In practical terms, this means that the probable need for the information, in the particular circumstances, will justify the demand.[4]

In the present case the unit chairperson has received complaints from a number of individuals based on their general perception of what they regarded as violations of article XX, section 1 of the collective-bargaining agreement and has testified that she is personally aware of circumstances which she believes may constitute such violation. The existence of a violation can only be verified if the Union has the requested information concerning what minorities are hired, what women are hired, what pay groups they are in, what types of work they are performing, and how many of them are being promoted to higher positions. The information respecting unit employees in these categories is presumptively relevant, and would be deemed so even in the absence of a nondiscrimination clause in the contract.[5] In any event, contrary to Respondent's contention, I find that an excellent showing has been made that the requested data concerning nonunit employees is needed, for without it the existence or nonexistence of a pervasive pattern of discrimination is not likely to be verifiable. Having actually received complaints from a number of sources respecting an overall pattern of discrimination affecting both unit and nonunit employees, and believing that she has observed it herself, the unit chairperson must have this information, respecting both unit and nonunit employees, in order to determine whether a basis exists for filing of grievances, for the purpose of preparing contract language and for the conduct of future negotiations with the object of terminating such discrimination as may be found to exist, for the purpose of proceeding with the correction of violations of the existing agreement, and for the prosecution of any grievances filed. The list furnished by the Respondent setting forth the names of the minority employees at the Post is, by itself, a singularly unhelpful document as it provides no basis for comparison with prior years. The list is not even dated and was assumed by the unit chairperson to be a current list as of the time when it was received.

However, insofar as the actual EEOC reports already filed are concerned, no apparent need for their disclosure has been demonstrated. The statistical data directed to be made available would appear to meet the needs of the Guild. No necessity for the production of the reports themselves has been established.[6]

I am not dissuaded from the conclusion reached herein by the Respondent's arguments. The fact is that on cross-examination the Guild's unit chairperson conceded that she had not received a formal complaint respecting these matters in her official capacity as a Guild official. She had testified convincingly to receipt of numerous informal complaints regarding discrimination in promotion to managerial positions from the unit and the Guild's duty to investigate those circumstances is clearly within its policing function under the contract. In a memorandum to Cook dated February 27, 1981, Arnold asserted that some of the information requested may be extracted from information already provided to the Guild. There is no evidence in the record that the information sought to be elicited can in fact be extracted from the data previously furnished and there is no evidence to indicate how much difficulty such extraction will entail. Nevertheless it may be observed that if the requirement to furnish information exists at all, then it must be furnished in comprehensible and usable form and in such fashion as commits the Employer to a representation that such are indeed the facts of the case. A response to a request for information which consists of a lengthy explanation of the manner in which such information can be extracted from other records does not constitute compliance. The Guild is not required to undertake a burdensome investigation to extract and distill information from a mass of records when the same data is readily at hand to the Employer.[7] The Respondent's argument that the Guild may legally obtain access to the filed EEOC reports is beside the point and places on the Guild the very burden the law says the Guild is not required to assume. The issue is not whether information is available to the Guild from any particular source but whether the Post is obligated to furnish it. The answer is resoundingly in the affirmative to the extent that the data is in the Post's possession and will not, by its disclosure, trample on anyone's right of privacy.[8] The instant request did not involve data capable of easy distillation from the reports already furnished by the Post in other connections. As for the reports themselves, Cook testified that recourse to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission for copies would have entailed delay; the Respondent offered no evidence to the contrary.

Accordingly, I find that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by its failure to furnish a list of minorities in its jurisdiction by name, job classification, and history of promotional record until June 1982, approximately 1 year and 4 months after it had been requested; by failing to furnish the other information requested in the memorandum of February 23, 1981, from Joy Cook to Leonard Arnold; by failure to furnish the information for both unit and nonunit employees; with the exception therefrom of the request for copies of the Post EEOC reports filed since 1978. I find that the Respondent did not violate the Act by refusing to furnish copies of the EEOC reports filed since 1978. An allegation added to the complaint at the hearing alleging violation of the Act by reason of the Respondent's delay in furnishing the reports accordingly also falls.

2. Information respecting sick leave and the absentee control program

On February 23, 1981, the Guild requested information respecting the total number of staffers and the number taking sick leave, and the number of days of sick leave taken in the years 1977, 1979, and 1980;[9] and, with respect to those years, a breakdown showing the number of occurrences of illness, the average length of absences, the number of persons affected by and the number of days docked under the terms of paragraph 2, section 1, article XI of the collective-bargaining agreement. The names of the individuals placed on the absentee control program and their individual absentee records. The Respondent furnished the figures for the number of persons and the number of days docked because of six or more occasions of illness during the period from March 29, 1979, to March 19, 1980, and from March 20, 1980, to February 27, 1981, together with the names of 10 individuals who had been placed on the absentee control program for the year commencing September 1, 1980, and ending August 31, 1981.[10]

The pertinent provision of the collective-bargaining agreement, article XI, section 1, paragraph 2, which was first negotiated at the New York Daily News and then adopted in the New York Post contract of 1978, entails an amendment of the sick leave schedule. Employees who are absent because of illness or accident are not required to make up time lost but receive their regular salary in accordance with the schedule. The modification is as follows:

> Notwithstanding the foregoing schedule, an employee who in any period of 12 months, beginning with the first day of any absence due to illness or accident, is absent on more than five occasions, and who has not exhausted his paid sick leave entitlement, shall not be paid for the first two days of the sixth and any subsequent period of an absence during such twelve months period unless hospitalized during such additional absence. This provision shall be effective March 20, 1979.

[6] In the Bendix Corp., 242 NLRB 1005 (1979), production of charges and complaints involving unit employees was directed because it was expressly found that the union had established the relevance of the charges and complaints. A similar result was reached in General Motors Corp., 243 NLRB 186 (1979), enfd. 648 F.2d 18 (D.C. Cir. 1980).

[8] New York Times Co., 265 NLRB 353 (1982) (the fact that employees may have the information and be willing to divulge it does not relieve the employer of its responsibilities under the Act).

[9] No request was made for this information for the year 1978 because of the existence of an anomalous situation during that year.

[10] An additional request by the Guild for information respecting the reasons for the absences was withdrawn.

In the event of excessive absences during any year an employee is placed on the absentee control program. This means that he must present a medical certificate for each illness or day of absence or alternatively charge the day to vacation entitlement or to optional holiday. If neither option is elected he is not paid for the day. The review period under the absentee control program runs from September 1 to August 31 of each year. An employee's name is removed from the list if he reduces the number of absences during the following year to no more than six occasions of illness. It is to be noted that specific provision is made for the case of recurring illness: if an employee's physician attests that an illness is of a recurring nature, the employee need not furnish a certificate for each day of absence but is obligated to continue course of treatment and furnish a certificate attesting to each visit to his physician.

The Guild claims it sought the information requested for the purpose of negotiating the elimination or modification of the sick leave provisions that had been inserted in the 1978 contracts. The Guild attempted to delete the provision during the collective-bargaining negotiations with the Respondent in 1981. However, bargaining was concluded without obtaining management agreement to such deletion because management took the position that the overall program, consisting of the sick leave entitlement, the absentee control program, and the 1978 provisions for docking employees after excessive absences, was effective in curbing chronic abuse, especially on Friday afternoons and Monday mornings. The Guild representative specifically advised the representatives of management that the sick leave information requests continue to be pending notwithstanding the conclusion of the 1981 negotiations and that the Guild expected to press the issue again in 1984.

The Guild asserts that it needs the information in order to establish that the provision does not protect the Employer from chronic abuse of sick leave and yet actually penalizes employees who work when they are ill in order to complete specific assignments because if they suffer lapses they are docked under these provisions, with the result that they are better off if they do not come into work and have one continuous period of illness even if important work remains unfinished. The Guild contends that the figures for the years requested would provide a comparison which would show the true impact of the provisions; that the individual absentee records would show that the employees were being placed in a position analogous to double jeopardy, being required to present medical certificate in order to obtain sick leave and then being docked thereafter even if they possess a certificate, and that employees who are not abusing the program are penalized unfairly because the data respecting chronic abusers is not excluded from consideration by the Post in assessing the impact of the docking provisions. Whether the Guild is right or wrong in its contentions, the advancement of these points is clearly within the scope of its duties and obligations as the collective-bargaining representative of the unit employees. As its contentions are not frivolous, the Guild is entitled to the information which would tend to support (or undermine) its position. The statistical information requested is precisely what the Guild needed for the purpose of eliminating discrepancies between Guild and Post figures for the size of the unit and the number of staffers and for an analysis of the individual absentee records that it was hoped would support the Guild's contention that major abuses of sick leave by a few persons should not be counted in assessing the impact of the sick leave provisions on the remainder of the unit. To the extent that information related to members of the unit, it was presumptively relevant and to the extent that it related to other employees the relevance was clearly shown.

The information requests, as communicated to Arnold, were phrased only in terms of unit members, but the response was not based on any such limitation. The Post took the position that the requested information was confidential and notified the Guild that its representatives could examine the records but would not be permitted to photocopy them or gather statistical information from them.

The Respondent was only willing to provide information as to the number of persons affected by the docking provision, the number who were docked, the total number of days they were docked during the period from March 1979 to March 1980 and from then until March 1981, and a list of individuals who were on the absentee control program. The Respondent asserted that this information was provided but Cook denied having ever received the list of employees on the absentee control program.

I find it difficult to believe that the Respondent was acting in good faith in this regard, and I believe the Respondent simply determined not to make the requested disclosure. The Respondent imposed restrictions solely on the basis of the purported confidentiality of the information contained in the sick leave records, yet inconsistently authorized the Guild to send representatives to examine the records. It persisted in this contradictory stance even after Cook notified Arnold that she was seeking only aggregate totals and would be content to accept copies of the records with the confidential information blocked out. Thereupon the claim of confidentiality was extended to the aggregate totals and the breakdown by occurrences, matters whose disclosure could not possibly have violated anyone's right to confidential treatment of their records. By refusing permission to photocopy records, the Respondent denied to the Guild what has been referred to as "the now nearly universal use of photocopies in business affairs."[11] Its refusal to allow the Guild representatives to take copies with the confidential information blocked out demonstrates the insincerity of its position. The Respondent's insistence on imposing a hardship on the Guild makes excusable the Guild's failure to accept the invitation to send people to the personnel office to sit making extensive notes of the contents of the records. In situations where confidentiality claims have been upheld, the reasonableness of the concern for secrecy was apparent.[12]

The point is significant, for Cook's protestations of necessity for the data lose some of their effectiveness in light of her failure to avail herself of the opportunity given to her by Arnold to inspect the records; on February 23, 1981, he advised her that the balance of the information sought was available for inspection. Because aggregate totals were sought, the photocopying limitation would not necessarily have created a severe problem. Even the availability of the records for investigation in convenient form was not controverted: an absentee record is maintained for each employee by the personnel department in a three-ring looseleaf binder and the records are available for inspection by both the employee and the Guild. Both Cook and other officials of the Guild have availed themselves of these records on other occasions in the past. Furthermore a copy of the list of employees on the absentee control program is routinely furnished to the Guild annually, when the list is made up in September of each year. Nancy Lambert, one of Respondent's record custodians, testified that anyone with access to the absentee records for all the employees for the years 1977 through 1982 could determine the pattern of absences simply by looking at the absentee sheet for each employee for each of the 5 years. This does not help the Respondent, however, in view of the refusal to permit the gathering of statistical information, and it was conceded that no copying of the absentee records was permitted.

In its brief the Respondent asserts that access to the records having been offered, the burden was on the Union to show the inadequacy of the offer. I find that the Union has done precisely that by testimony, uncontroverted, that it was permitted neither to make copies nor to make statistical abstracts of the information being made available. Under such limitations the information was not really made available.[13]

Accordingly, I find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by refusing to make the requested information available under such circumstances as to allow the Guild to make copies of information or to collate and codify the results of the examination.[14]

At the hearing, the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to allege violation of the Act by reason of the Respondent's delay in furnishing the Guild with the information requested by it. To the extent that information has been furnished, but only after a protracted delay, I find a separate violation of the Act.

3. Independent contractors, freelancers, and stringers

The Guild requested "detailed information regarding the names, contractual status and fees and all compensation for anyone holding independent contractor, freelance or stringer status with the New York Post in 1978, 1979, 1980 and 1981." In response, the Respondent furnished a list of the names of individuals whose work appeared in the Post during a 2-month period. None of the other information was provided, though initially the Respondent agreed to provide the requested information for 1980 and for the month of January 1981 exclusive of the monetary information.

The stated objective of this request by the Guild was the preparation of the contract bargaining positions and preparation for pending arbitrations. The issue of Respondent's use of independent contractors, freelancers, and stringers has been a source of dispute between the Guild and the Post since 1977. There can be little question that the Guild needs the information requested in order to determine the nature of the business relationship between the Respondent and these people or entities. To support its contention that the Respondent violated the collective-bargaining agreement by assigning unit work to nonbargaining unit individuals, the Guild must be able to show that they would be deemed includable in the unit. The Guild is therefore entitled to the information requested with the exception of the amount of the individual compensation.

The Guild argues that the determination of which of the nonunit individuals it would seek to assert jurisdiction over at an arbitration depends on their contractual status and the fees and compensation paid to them. It is contended that these are the guidelines mandated by the rationale employed in the decisions of earlier arbitrations involving the columnist, Murray Kempton, and the cartoonists, Shain and Day. However, it has been held specifically that only information respecting the aggregate amount paid to independent contractors, freelancers, and stringers for editorial products is required to be disclosed and not the individual personal financial arrangements entered into between the publisher and the contributors. The amounts paid to individual nonunit writers are required to be kept confidential out of concern for the right to privacy of those persons who are not represented by the Union.[15] Furthermore, the arbitration awards specifically negate the relevance of the compensation paid to the individual writers. The compensation figures were not supplied at all in the Shain-Day arbitration and were expressly stated to be insignificant, in and of themselves, in the Kempton decision, where they came into play only to prove another point. Both decisions profess to be based on criteria used by the National Labor Relations Board. In the Kempton arbitration decision, it was stated:

[13] In United Aircraft Corp., 192 NLRB 382, 389 (1971), modified on other grounds 543 F.2d 422 (2d Cir. 1975), it was held that an employer fulfilled its obligation by making information available not necessarily in the exact form or on the exact times requested, at a reasonable time, and in a reasonable place with an opportunity to make copies if so desired. In short, there are limitations to the burden which may be placed on the Employer, but there is no doubt about the Union's right to make copies and to take down information to codify the results of the examination of the records, without which right there is no point in examining them at all.

[14] It is apparent from the testimony of both sides and the manner in which they approached the question that it was clearly understood that the Guild wanted the total number of staffers and the number taking sick leave and the number of days for the years 1979, 1980, and 1981 of unit members and nonunion members. The Guild memorandum to Arnold, however, referred only to staffers who are members of the Guild. In her testimony, however, Cook testified that what was asked for was the total number of staffers and the number taking sick leave for the year stated, without limitation to unit members. There is nothing in the record to indicate that Arnold ever understood the request differently.

> The criteria used by the NLRB to determine if an employment relationship exists are the degree of control and direction that the Employer has a right to exercise over the objective of the work to be done and over the means by which that objective is accomplished.

The Shain and Day arbitration award was based entirely on the degree of direction and control exercised by the Post over the work of those two cartoonists. They were both held to be employees. Murray Kempton was held not to be included in the collective-bargaining unit on the basis of considerations such as the lack of control over the contents of his column or the manner in which they were written, his freedom regarding hours and work places (he had an office at the Post), and the uniqueness of the work he contracted to supply. The arbitrator specifically noted that method of payment is not the basic criterion and that there is not necessarily a relationship between the form of payment and status. In Kempton's case the amount of compensation was considered only to the extent that its size was deemed a measure of his independence, insofar as it put him in a position to negotiate a sale of columns. The transaction was in the nature of a business deal, rather than a sale of his time measured by hours. It was only in respect to the manner in which the size of his salary reflected the basic nature of his dealings with the Post that it was considered. The number of dollars in itself was not considered meaningful.[16]

The arbitration awards and earlier rulings of the Board thus make it clear that the amount of compensation paid to the individual contributors is not pertinent. The Post is correct in its contention that lack of information regarding individual compensation does not at all affect the ability of the Guild to process the grievance. The Post was therefore not required to furnish data respecting individual compensation. However, all of the other information should have been provided. The list of individuals whose work appeared during a 2-month period was a patent failure to comply with a legitimate request. The failure to do so violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act.

Respondent's counsel argues in the posthearing brief that because the request involves nonbargaining unit data, the burden is on the Guild to show the specific uses to which the information would be put, it being contended that the Guild had failed to do so by "mere assertion" that the information was sought to arbitrate certain cases. However, I find that this is a sufficiently specific reason and was a proper basis for the informational request.[17]

In addition, the Guild asserted that the data would be used to determine which of the nonunit individuals the Guild would seek to assert jurisdiction over at arbitration. Thus two good reasons have been stated.

4. Lerner-King associates

The Guild requested a list of all promotion jobs assigned to Lerner-King Associates, an advertising firm, and to any other advertising firms since November 1979; the hours spent on each job as reflected by the firm's billing statements, and the amounts billed to the Post; a list from January 1, 1977, to current date of all personnel in the creative services department showing their job classifications, dates of hire, and (if applicable) termination.

The Post made no response to this demand, and in this proceeding defends its failure to do so on the basis of the alleged failure on the part of the Guild to advise the Post of the precise use to which the information would be put. However, it is beyond question that, as the Guild contends, a jurisdictional dispute had existed since 1980 with respect to the entire matter of subcontracting. The use to which the information would be put was obvious from the nature of the information sought. The need for it was unmistakable if the Guild was to make any comparison between the work contracted out and the work performed by the bargaining unit for the purpose of determining if its jurisdiction was being eroded. An inquiry into the amount of compensation being diverted from unit members would be an essential part of such an investigation, as would be the time data and the other information requested. Intelligent assessment of the impact of subcontracting requires knowledge of the number of manhours of work performed by the outside contractor. Because a grievance is now pending for possible violation of article I, section 4 of the collective-bargaining agreement and, in addition, the information will be relevant in a forthcoming arbitration, it is plain that the data is relevant to the policing of the contract and the performance of the Guild's duties under it.

A showing that work is in fact being subcontracted out and that reasonable basis exists for believing that the work of the bargaining unit is being thereby reduced adequately demonstrates a specific purpose in requesting the information. The Guild's objective in requesting supporting data is self-evident[18] and the Respondent's contention that the Post was never advised of the intended use of the information requested must be regarded as specious. The Guild is not obligated to accept the Respondent's assurances that its jurisdiction has not been invaded, but has the right to determine such matters for itself and, indeed, would be derelict in the performance

[16] The arbitrator noted:

> The way a man is paid is not the basic criterion. We have already noted that the NLRB uses control and direction rather than pay or fringe benefits as its criteria, reflecting a recognition that the form of payment bears no necessary relationship to the status. . . .
> The evidence leaves no doubt that Kempton was selling columns rather than hours of work and that his columns are so unique and desirable that he was compensated far above the ordinary. He has reached a level where he must be deemed capable of making a business deal to sell his product as a principal rather than his work as an employee.

[17] Boeing Co., 182 NLRB 421 (1970) (information sought in order to reach decision whether to proceed to arbitration).

[18] Subcontracting information must be furnished when it will aid the Guild either in negotiations or in discharging its responsibilities to the unit, as in this instance. ACF Industries, 234 NLRB 1063 (1978), enfd. in relevant part 596 F.2d 1344, 1353 (8th Cir. 1979). As to the current requirement for furnishing of such information when it is not unduly burdensome to the Respondent, see the statement of the later view of the Board in Safeway Stores, supra, fn. 1.

of its duties if it failed to do so.[19] It is entitled to such information as it needs to ascertain whether there have been breaches of the contract.[20] Thus, an adequate showing has been made that the data is potentially relevant to the policing of the contract and will help determine the scope of the work being subcontracted and compensation due bargaining unit members for work removed from their jurisdiction—all of this in aid of a grievance proceeding now pending. It therefore must be provided. The result would not be different if no grievance were pending.[21]

5. Stat-Tab

The Guild commenced an arbitration proceeding against the Post for violation of its jurisdiction under article I, section 4 of the collective-bargaining agreement. The Post had subcontracted keypunch and other data processing work to a company known as Stat-Tab. On November 28, 1980, the Guild requested information about the terms and conditions of the Post (or News America) contract with Stat-Tab and the volume of work performed by Stat-Tab pursuant to it. In addition, information was requested respecting Stat-Tab's employees (without limitation to those involved in the Post's work): name and address, date of hire, date of termination, classification or job title, duties actually performed, the names of immediate and other supervisors, and data relating to pay raises, starting pay, and changes in rates of pay and fringe benefits, including vacation, holidays, sick leave, overtime, pension, and severance. The Guild also inquired about work schedules, employee manuals, and job classifications and descriptions.

As in the Lerner-King situation and the SSI situation (discussed below), the Guild asserted that it seeks to determine whether work previously performed by unit members has been subcontracted and, if so, whether such subcontracting is an ongoing jurisdictional violation, and that the information is needed for arbitration and to determine which job levels have sustained the most injury.

The Post has refused to comply with this request in any respect. The Post's argument is that it is not obligated to make disclosure because the burden of showing the relevance of the information requested is not met by the Guild's bare assertion that its jurisdiction has been invaded. Cases which I have already cited effectively disposed of this argument.

The Post also asserted that the information requested is already in the possession of the Guild, an argument which is somewhat difficult to understand in view of the fact that the contracts are between Stat-Tab and the Post or News America and the Post disclaims knowledge of most of the information. The fact that the issue has been between the parties is documented in the memoranda which have passed between them and was testified to by Cook. Both parties appear to have tried to make a record.

In a memorandum to Arnold dated November 28, 1980, Cook mentioned that the subcontracting of keypunch work to Stat-Tab had been discussed on numerous occasions and in a formal grievance session on February 5, 1980. In a memorandum to Arnold dated February 8, 1980, Cook mentioned that "we touched on this issue briefly in the grievance meeting." On December 4, 1980, Arnold sent Cook a memorandum denying that he had any record that the matter had ever been discussed at the grievance meeting of February 5, 1980, or at any prior meeting.

In Boeing Co., 182 NLRB 121 (1970), it was held that a union is entitled to information necessary to enable it intelligently to evaluate the grievances filed; providing information which advances the process of arbitration by enabling the Union to evaluate the merits of claims and prove those which are meritorious prevents overburdening of the arbitral system. It is the Union's responsibility to administer the collective-bargaining agreement, detect infractions of its terms, and intelligently counsel the employees whom it represents. Its right to the information which it needs to do so does not depend on the existence of a pending formal grievance. The potential value of the information is what is significant. Board policy favors disclosure of wage and related information even without apparent direct relationship to negotiation or administration of the collective-bargaining agreement.[22] When

> Certainly, it was not unreasonable for the Union to suspect that more work may have been transferred . . . than the Respondent admitted, and the Union had the right to know if, and to what extent, its suspicion might have some foundation." In Doubarn Sheet Metal, 234 NLRB 821, 824 (1979), it was noted that a union "need not accept Respondent's conclusionary statements" on the issue of whether a single-employer relationship existed between the employer and the company to which it was subcontracting work.

NLRB*, 621 F.2d 598 (4th Cir. 1980), or Atlas Metal Parts Co., 252 NLRB 205 (1980), enfd. as modified 660 F.2d 304 (7th Cir. 1981), relied on by the Respondent, impels a different conclusion under the circumstances of the present case. S & W Motor Lines is concerned with a situation in which the court found that the union had asserted no reason why it needed the information demanded relative to nonbargaining unit employees and had made no demonstration to the employer of the need to know, under circumstances involving deep suspicion as to the true purposes for which the union sought the information requested. The request was made at a time when a prior collective-bargaining agreement had expired and negotiations for a new one were not proceeding well. The court found that the union was inquiring about "persons who were not represented by the union and as to whom, absent special circumstances, the union has no business inquiring." In Atlas Metal Parts the court rejected what it characterized as a Board position that information was presumptively relevant and prima facie required to be produced on the ground that information concerning subcontracting "is so intrinsic to the employer and employee core relationship as to make it presumptively relevant in all cases." The Guild in the present case relies on no presumption but demonstrates the relevance and need for the information.

[22] Whitin Machine Works, 108 NLRB 1537, 1541 (1954), enfd. 217 F.2d 593 (4th Cir. 1954), cert. denied 349 U.S. 905 (1955). Where an employer has obligated itself not to subcontract maintenance work when to do so would have the effect of displacing maintenance employees and the union has cause to believe that the employer has in fact subcontracted such work at a time when employees are being displaced from their jobs as surplus labor, the information sought is clearly relevant and reasonably necessary. Boeing Co., 182 NLRB 421, 426 (1970). Though Boeing did not determine the extent to which the Union may be justified in pursuing an examination of the Respondent's apparent subcontracting activities, because it was not necessary for the purposes of that case, it reiterated the general rule that the information which a union may request is subject to a "discovery-type standard."

there are grounds for belief that Respondent is subcontracting work while employees are being displaced as surplus labor, the issues are specific enough to justify the request for information in order to determine whether the Union should file grievance, and thereafter to permit it to evaluate intelligently the grievances filed and to attempt to resolve meritorious claims prior to arbitration. Securing the information will patently facilitate the inquiry and therefore it must be supplied.

Respondent's reliance on NLRB v. A. S. Abell Co., 624 F.2d 506 (4th Cir. 1980), is misplaced inasmuch as that case merely holds that proof that the Union has misused information previously furnished rebuts a presumption of relevance of information requested with respect to members of the Union, requiring the Union thereafter to establish the relevance of the information sought to the performance of its duties as the employees' bargaining representative. In the present case there is, on one hand, no credible evidence that any information furnished to the Guild at any time has been misused and, on the other hand, the Guild has clearly established the relevance of the information requested to its obligations and duties as collective-bargaining representative. It is thus clearly entitled to information respecting the terms and conditions of the Post or News America contract with Stat-Tab, and to the other data requested, except information regarding "all Stat-Tab personnel," as to which the Respondent introduced evidence that it does not have the information. The Guild presented no evidence that the Post has or should have such information respecting Stat-Tab's personnel. Unlike the situation of User Services Systems, Inc., discussed hereinafter, which had personnel directly on the premises, there is no evidence that Stat-Tab personnel worked on the Post premises; on the contrary it appears that the work was done off the premises at Stat-Tab. Under the circumstances, therefore, the information respecting "all Stat-Tab personnel," some of whom obviously may not be involved at all with New York Post work, is excessive.[23]

6. User Services Systems, Inc.

User Services Systems, Inc. (USSI) was an in-house subcontractor which supplied five computer operators who performed computer services at the premises of the Post at 210 South Street, New York City, under the supervision of a USSI operations manager named Barbella. They worked in space assigned to them by the Post. Arnold, in a memorandum to Cook dated December 5, 1980, declared, "Their Function is in relation to computer operations for News America and its subsidiaries based in New York."

On November 28, 1980, the Guild requested the following information for all USSI personnel who had worked at the Post up to that date: name and address, date of hire, date of termination, classification or job title, duties actually performed, names of immediate and other supervisors, pay rate (current), starting pay rates and changes in such rates, fringe benefits (including vacations, sick leave, holidays, overtime pensions and severance), work schedules and copies of employee manuals or job classifications and descriptions. Also requested were the terms and conditions of the Post or News America contract with USSI and the duration of such agreement. The memorandum cited previous requests for such information made over the preceding 2 years including specific formal requests on March 22 and 24, 1978, January 11 and February 5, 1979, January 16 and 21, 1980, and on November 25, 1980, the last-mentioned being an oral request by Joy Cook to Leonard Arnold.

In response, Arnold advised Cook that six USSI employees were working in the Post's premises, five of whom were computer operators and one of whom was an operations manager; they were supervised by the president of USSI and liaison between News America and USSI was the responsibility of Jeff Leist, an employee of News America. The Post has not otherwise responded to the Guild's request for information respecting the transactions with USSI, except that in September 1982 the Guild was furnished with a document which the Respondent contends is a copy of the contract between the Post and USSI. The document is undated and unsigned and the Guild has questioned its authenticity.

In April 1981 the Guild commenced an arbitration proceeding against the Post, which is still pending, on the issue of whether the collective-bargaining agreement had been violated by transfer to USSI of work previously performed only by unit members.

The General Counsel has contended that the information requested is needed by the Guild for the purposes of the arbitration. Unquestionably, the information is relevant to the issues therein and would either support the Guild's position or require that the Guild modify its position in the light of the known facts. Whether a violation of article I, section 4 was committed by the Respondent by subcontracting work to the Guild can be determined with information relating to the terms of the subcontracting agreements, the description of the work being performed by USSI personnel, the job classifications of the personnel performing such work (which would relate to job classifications of the Post's employees from whom the work was removed), the wage rates, and the employees' manuals. This data would enable the Guild to define the scope of the unit work being performed by nonbargaining unit personnel and would to some extent suggest the nature of an appropriate remedy.

The Guild's requests for the names of the specific USSI employees and the dates of their hire and termination would not, however, seem to contribute to that objective.

Accordingly, I conclude that the Post has violated Section 8(a)(5) by failing to furnish to the Guild, with respect to all USSI personnel who worked at the Post, past or present, their classifications or job titles, a description of the duties actually performed by them, their current and past pay rates, the information requested concerning fringe benefits, their work schedules, the contents of the manuals or the job classifications and descriptions, and [23] The situation herein is not the same as that involved in Doubarn Sheet Metal, 243 NLRB 821 (1979), in which the union was held to be entitled to specific information which would help it to determine whether there existed a single-employer relationship between the employer and a company to which work was being subcontracted.

the terms and conditions (including duration) of the Post or News America contract with USSI. The Respondent has not committed a violation by its failure to furnish the names and addresses of such personnel and their dates of hire and termination because the request for such data related to all employees of USSI and was not limited, as it should have been, to those employed at the premises of the New York Post. Only that portion of the data would have been relevant to the needs of the Guild.

At the hearing, the General Counsel moved to amend the complaint to allege violation of the Act by reason of Respondent's failure, since December 5, 1980, to furnish the Union with the information requested and by reason of the fact that with respect to such information as it did furnish Respondent "has delayed in furnishing such information." The motion granted and I find a separate violation by reason of the fact that, even to the minimal extent that information was furnished, and a questionable copy of the contract between the Post and USSI provided, as described above, the delay in furnishing the same since 1978 was unwarranted and constituted a refusal to bargain in violation of the Act.

Some of the Respondent's counterarguments merit discussion.

Notwithstanding the Respondent's assertion that the information sought by the Guild is not in its possession, I find that it is in fact available to the Respondent. The situation herein is not comparable to the request by the Guild for information about the Stat-Tab employees. The information about USSI which was requested, and is herein directed to be furnished, relates to functions being performed right on the Post's own premises. The Post obviously is able to finish the work schedules of these USSI personnel who are walking in and out of the Post premises every day utilizing building passes issued by the Post. The contract provisions by themselves contain much of the information sought and the availability of the rest of it is easily ascertainable by a simple request from the Post to USSI for that information. The burden of proving the Post's ability to get the information is not on the General Counsel; rather, the burden is on the Post to establish that this data, which would appear to be readily available to it, is not in fact available. The Respondent made no serious effort to prove this.

The defense that the Guild did not meet the burden of showing its specific need for information relating to nonunit employees simply does not comport with the evidence adduced at the hearing. An arbitration is pending and pursuant to the Guild's duty of policing the contract it attempted to obtain above-described information which I have held to be relevant.

The contention that the information is sought for a purpose wholly outside the scope of the Guild's bargaining relationship with the Post, to wit, for use in an organizational drive, has merit only to the extent that it is contended that the intended use is altogether outside the scope of the Guild's functions as representative of the unit employees. I have, however, found that argument devoid of merit. Consequently, there is left only the question of whether the fact that the information may have additional uses besides the uses to which the Guild would put it as representative of the unit employee in any way affects the situation. Cool conceded that the Guild was seeking to contact USSI personnel for purposes of a contemplated organizational drive. On February 3, 1981, she had sent a letter to USSI addressed to it at the premises of the Post, notifying it that a committee had been formed to organize its employees working at the Post. Nevertheless, the evidence does not support the Respondent's contention that the organization of USSI personnel was the Guild's sole objective in requesting the information. I have found as a matter of fact that the information was needed by the Guild for purposes relevant to its obligations as representative of employees at the Post. The happenstance that it might be additionally useful in organizing USSI employees generally would not destroy that relevance. Moreover, if the objective were to bring into the Guild the USSI employees performing unit work, then the relevance would be beyond question. The possibility of dual use of information does not extinguish the Guild's right to it for an existing relevant purpose.

It should be noted that the Post did not contend that the Guild, if given the information to which it was lawfully entitled, would abuse any confidence and misuse the information, nor did it contend that any information lawfully obtained by the Guild because it was entitled to it would be used unlawfully if used in an organizational campaign. Unquestionably, such use would be lawful, even if not approved by the Respondent. Accordingly, to the extent that any of the information which the Post is required to turn over to the Union might have been used for an organizational campaign among USSI personnel, that factor would not militate against or affect the obligation to turn over such information. The fact that the requested information may relate to the employers and employees outside the representative bargaining unit, does not, by itself, negate its relevance.[24]

The issue is the relevance of the information to the Guild's performance of its duties as bargaining representative, even to the exclusion of consideration of its purpose in requesting the information.[25]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The New York Post Corporation, the Respondent, is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Respondent cites NLRB v. A. S. Abell Co., 624 F.2d 506 (4th Cir. 1980), in support of its position. See the discussion of this case in connection with Stat-Tab, supra. In that case the court found that the union had not established the relevance of information sought and that it wanted the information solely for an illegal purpose (harassment of employees). In the present case there is no fear of harassment, no proven history of misuse of information by the Guild, and no demonstration that the furnishing of the information that I have directed to be furnished would permit any abuse by the Guild.

2. Newspaper Guild of New York, Local 3 of the Newspaper Guild, AFL–CIO is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All employees in the Editorial, Business, Advertising, Circulation, Publication, Mechanical and Maintenance Departments, excluding exempt employees and employees already covered by a union contract other than that between the Respondent and the Guild, constitute a unit appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. The Guild is the exclusive representative of all the employees in the aforesaid unit for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(a) of the Act.

5. The Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by delaying the delivery to the Guild for a period of approximately 1 year and 4 months a list of minority personnel by name, job classification, and history of promotional record as requested in a memorandum to the Respondent from the Guild dated February 23, 1981, and by failing and refusing on request to supply the following relevant information required by the Guild in order to perform its duties as bargaining representative of the employees in the above described unit:

(a) Information requested by the Guild in a memorandum dated February 23, 1981, consisting of a list of minority personnel by name, job classification, and history of promotional record relating to nonunit employees (the list that was furnished tardily having related only to unit employees).

(b) Information requested by the Guild on February 23, 1981, consisting of the total number of staffers and the number taking sick leave, and the number of days of sick leave taken in the years 1977, 1979, and 1980 and, with respect to those years, a breakdown showing the number of occurrences of illness, the average length of absences, the number of persons affected by and the number of days docked under the terms of article XI, section 1, paragraph 2 of the collective-bargaining agreement, the names of the individuals placed on the absentee control program and their individual absentee records. The Respondent also violated the Act in connection with this request by its refusal to permit photocopying of pertinent records and the making of statistical abstracts therefrom.

(c) Information requested by the Guild consisting of the names and contractual status of anyone holding independent contractor, freelance, or stringer status with the New York Post in 1978, 1979, 1980, and 1981.

(d) A list of all promotion jobs assigned to Lerner-King or any other advertising agency since November 1979; the hours spent on each job as reflected by billing statements and the amounts billed to the Post; a list from January 1, 1977, to the date of the request of all personnel in the creative services department, showing their job classifications, dates of hire, and, if applicable, dates of termination.

(e) Information requested by the Guild on November 28, 1980, consisting of the terms and conditions of the contract under which work was being performed for the Post by Stat-Tab, and the volume of work performed by Stat-Tab pursuant to the contract.

(f) Information requested by the Guild on November 28, 1980, consisting of the terms and conditions of its contract with, and the following data concerning all personnel of, User Services Systems, Inc., past or present who worked on the premises of the New York Post: their classifications or job titles, a description of the duties performed by them, their current and past pay rates and fringe benefits, work schedules, and contents of manuals or job classifications or descriptions.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

7. The Respondent did not violate the Act by failing or refusing to furnish any of the other information requested by the Guild as hereinabove set forth.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in certain unfair labor practices affecting commerce, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

Terpening Trucking Co., Inc. and Terpening Drivers Association and Gene R. Lariviere. Cases 3-CA-11101 and 3-CB-4081

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 16 July 1986 Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions but not to adopt the recommended Order.

We agree with the judge's finding that it is appropriate to calculate the gross backpay due discriminatees Lariviere and Bagley on the basis of employee Tickner's actual earnings during the backpay period. The judge further found that employee Tickner did not have any earnings for the second quarter of 1982, and therefore the judge substituted the earnings of employee Cummings in calculating the gross backpay for that quarter for the discriminatees. It is clear from the record, however, that Tickner had earnings of $388 in the second quarter of 1982 and our Order reflects computations based on those earnings. In addition, because the record shows that both discriminatees used 2 days of sick leave during 1982 prior to their discharges, we have reduced their sick pay entitlement for 1982 by $50 each. In all other respects, we adopt the judge's backpay computations.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that Respondent Terpening Trucking Co., Inc., Syracuse, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, and Respondent Terpening Drivers Association, Syracuse, New York, its officers, agents, and representatives, jointly and severally, shall

1. Pay to Gene R. Lariviere the sum of $38,228 net backpay, plus interest computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws.

2. Pay to Howard Bagley the sum of $42,618 net backpay, plus interest computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), less tax withholdings required by Federal and state laws.

Doren G. Goldstone, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Raymond W. Murray Jr. Esq. (Bond, Schoeneck & King), of Syracuse, New York, for Terpening Drivers Association.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were heard by me on 18, 19, and 20 November 1985 in Syracuse, New York, pursuant to a backpay specification and notice of hearing issued by the Regional Director for Region 3 of the National Labor Relations Board on 27 June 1985. Having considered the entire record in this matter[1] including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after considering the briefs filed, I make the following findings and conclusions.

1. Background

The Board in a decision reported at 271 NLRB 196 (1984), adopted the opinion of the administrative law judge who had concluded, inter alia, that Terpening Trucking Co. had unlawfully discharged its employees Gene Lariviere and Howard Bagley. The judge also concluded that the Union (the Terpening Drivers Association), had failed to represent in good faith these two employees in relation to grievances about their discharges. Accordingly, the Board ordered, among other things, that both Respondents jointly and severally make whole Bagley and Lariviere for any lost earnings they may have suffered by reason of their discharges which occurred on 24 June 1982.

Following the Board's Order, the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, on 31 December 1984, issued an order denying the Company's petiton for review and granting the Board's application for enforcement of its Order. On 14 February 1985 the court denied the Company's petition for a rehearing. Subsequently, there having developed a dispute regarding the amounts of backpay due to the discriminatees, the Regional Director for Region 3 issued a backpay specification and a hearing was held before me.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Chairman Dotson finds that the judge implicitly credited Gene Lariviere's denial of any involvement in the writing or sending of a letter the Respondent alleges as postdischarge misconduct. The Chairman therefore finds it unnecessary to pass on the judge's alternative finding that the letter could not have affected the Respondent.

[1] The General Counsel's unopposed motion to correct the transcript is granted. See Appendix [omitted from publication].

2. The issues

The parties agree that the backpay period for both employees commenced on 24 June 1982 and ended when the Company offered them reinstatement. Thus, for Bagley it is agreed that the backpay period ends on 6 March 1986. For Lariviere, it is agreed that the backpay period ends on 5 April 1985. Also, in Amended Exhibit 3 to the backpay specification, the General Counsel set forth certain amounts of interim earnings which he concedes each had during the backpay period.

In the case of Lariviere, the General Counsel asserts that he first obtained interim employment in the first quarter of 1984. Using a formula for gross backpay based on the weekly gross earnings of all the Company's full-time drivers[2] and including vacation and sick pay (in accordance with the collective-bargaining agreement), the General Counsel contends that Lariviere's net backpay is derived as follows:

Period	Gross Backpay	Interim Earnings	Net Backpay
1982:
Q2	[3]$366	$0	$366
Q3	6,964	0	6,964

Q1	6,766	5,792	974
Q2	520	312	208
Totals	$73,475	$22,525	$50,950

As to Bagley, the General Counsel's contentions, based on the same formula are as follows:

Period	Gross Backpay	Interim Earnings	Net Backpay
1982:
Q3	6,964	0	6,964

1985:
Q1	4,555	3,638	917
Totals	$71,764	$19,015	$52,749

The Respondents make the following contentions:

1. Neither discriminatee made a reasonable search for work after their discharge.

2. Lariviere engaged in misconduct after his discharge which would disqualify him for reinstatement and backpay from the time of the misconduct. Essentially Respondents argue that Lariviere caused a false and libelous letter to be sent to the United States Highway Administration and to a local newspaper.

3. The gross backpay formula used by the General Counsel unduly inflates the discriminatees' backpay. Respondents assert that both employees during the course of their employment consistently had lower earnings than the other drivers, this being due to their absenteeism. Thus, Respondents propose as an alternative formula that I reduce the gross backpay figure for each discriminatee, as calculated by the General Counsel's formula, by the percentage amount that each discriminatees' predischarge earnings deviated from the average earnings of all the other drivers during the same period. Pursuant to this concept, Respondents assert that Lariviere's gross backpay would be $58,267 and that Bagley's gross would be $53,837. As a second alternative formula, the Respondents propose that I simply project each discriminatee's average pay during a representative predischarge period into the backpay period. Using this alternative, the Respondents claim a gross backpay figure of $56,138 for Lariviere and $53,215 for Bagley.

[2] In accordance with standard procedure, the General Counsel did not include in his calculations workweeks of employees when they worked 24 or fewer hours. See NLRB Casehandling Manual, Compliance, Sec. 10564(a)

4. Neither discriminatee is entitled to vacation pay for 1982 as this had already been paid to them at the time of their discharges. (This amounts to $366 for each employee.)

5. Neither discriminatee is entitled to sick pay during the backpay period. (Like the vacation pay item, this is relatively minor. In each person's case it amounts to $225.)

3. Alleged willful loss of earnings

As noted above, the Respondents assert that the two discriminatees did not make a reasonable search for work after their discharges on 24 June 1982. In this regard, however, the Respondents have the burden of proving facts showing a willful loss of earnings. Phelps Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177, 190–200 (1941), NLRB v. Brown & Root, Inc., 311 F.2d 447, 454 (8th Cir. 1963); Rice Lake Creamery Co., 151 NLRB 1113, 1121 (1965). Further, the fact that a discriminatee has not obtained employment for a significant portion of the backpay period does not, of itself, establish his or her failure to seek interim employment. NLRB v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 360 F.2d 569 (5th Cir. 1966); Cornwell Co., 171 NLRB 342, 343 (1968).

Both Lariviere and Bagley testified that subsequent to their discharges they searched for work by registering with the State Employment Service, by visiting and making telephone calls to companies which employed drivers, by talking to friends, and by reviewing want ads in the local newspapers.

The Employer's counsel for his part demonstrated that both Lariviere and Bagley were extremely vague about their recollections concerning where they looked for work and when they did so.

The problem with cases of this sort is that the discriminatees were called on to testify concerning the details of their respective job searches more than 3 years after their discharges. Also they were not requested to make records of their job searches until receiving questionnaires from the Board's Regional Office more than a year after their discharges. In such circumstances it is not surprising that they had a difficult time recalling the details of their searches for interim employment, and I therefore conclude that the Respondents have not met their burden of proof on this issue. Teamsters Local 164, 274 NLRB 909 (1984); Canova Moving & Storage, 261 NLRB 639, 642 (1982); Wayne Trophy Corp., 254 NLRB 881, 882 (1981).

In the case of Bagley, I also conclude that he was justified in rejecting a job offer from Neil Trucking in April 1984. In this regard the evidence shows that unlike his job at Terpening, the job at Neil Trucking would have required him to be on the road overnight for about 5 days per week. Also after accounting for expenses, Bagley's expected weekly earnings from this job would have been about $200 per week, an amount significantly lower than what he earned at Terpening. I therefore find that Bagley's rejection of the Neil Trucking job offer did not affect his entitlement to backpay. Neeley's Car Clinic, 255 NLRB 1420, 1421 (1981).

4. Alleged postdischarge misconduct of Lariviere

The Respondents contend that Lariviere sent a libelous letter to the United States Highway Administration with a copy to a local newspaper. They contend that this constitutes misconduct by which Lariviere forfeited his right to reinstatement and backpay. I do not agree.

The letter to the Government, which was unsigned, reads as follows:

> To Whom it may concern
> I understand your agency will look into cases when a trucking co. makes its employees drive more than the legal amount of time allowed by law. Almost every week I have to drive more than 70 hours. I can not complain to the bosses because I would be fired. Some of our drivers like it for the extra money, but its really dangerous because we haul gasoline. The company makes us fill in the log books so it looks like we only work the legal amount of time. I hope something can be done to make them stop working us so long before there is a bad accident with this gasoline. Our union president will not do anything about it because he is one of the drivers who like to work that many hours. Some drivers were fired last year because they spoke up to the company. Last week I almost went off the road because I started to fall asleep at the wheel, thats what made me decide to write this letter. I hope I am sending this letter to the right place. I read about your agency in a trucking magazine and I am enclosing part of the article so you can see if I have contacted the right place. I do not want to see the company get a fine, but if thats what it takes to straighten things out I think they could handle it because I heard they made 3 million dollars last year but never paid us overtime for all those extra hours. In the event I have contacted the wrong agency, I am also sending a copy of this letter to the newspaper because they sometimes help people to get in touch with the right place. Also I would appreciate it if you could forward it to the right place if I am wrong. The name of the company I work for is > Terpening Trucking Co.
> Charles Ave. Syracuse, N.Y.
> As you can understand, I cannot sign my name.
> A TIRED TERPENING DRIVER

Subsequently on 11 May 1982 an article was written in the Syracuse Herald Journal by Columnist Rick Case, in which he referred to and quoted extensively from the above-described letter. He did not however, name the company.

There are cases in which the Board and/or the courts have terminated a discriminatee's right to reinstatement and backpay on his or her postdischarge misconduct. For example in Alumbaugh Coal Corp. v. NLRB, 635 F.2d 1380 (8th Cir. 1980), the court, although sustaining the Board's findings that an employee had been illegally discharged, concluded that the reinstatement and backpay remedy was improper because of the employer's postdischarge misconduct. In that case the employee had dishonestly failed to report his earnings to a state agency in connection with unemployment benefits and the court stated that the employee's "dishonesty, although not directed at the company, nevertheless adversely affected his employer because the company's unemployment reserve account was initially charged $250 for benefits wrongfully paid." In O. R. Cooper & Sons, 220 NLRB 287 (1975), the Board held that two employees who were illegally discharged were not entitled to backpay after the time that they had engaged in postdischarge misconduct consisting of slashing tires. In Colorado Forge Corp., 260 NLRB 25, 36 (1982), an employee was denied backpay after he forged his employer's signature on a bank loan application.

Even assuming for argument's sake that Lariviere authored the letter and assuming arguendo that some parts of the letter are untrue, I cannot see how either the letter to the Government or the article published in the newspaper adversely affected the Company. Although it is true that the Company was subjected to an audit by the Highway Administration, there was no showing that this was caused by the letter. Indeed it is more probable that the audit came about simply because the Company had, shortly before the audit, been granted authorization to engage in interstate trucking. I also do not see how the newspaper article damaged or in anyway adversely affected the Company. For one thing the Company's name was not mentioned. Further, there was no showing that the Company's business declined as a result of the article.

I also have substantial doubts that Lariviere was in fact the author of the letter. The Company produced an expert witness, Victor McNett, who testified that the letter to the Government (R. Exh. 5) was typed on the same typewriter as a letter concededly sent by Lariviere to the Union. (The second letter is identified in this proceeding as R. Exh. 4.) McNett's testimony to the effect that Respondent's Exhibits 4 and 5 came from the same typewriter was based on the number of similar defects in the typewritten letters on each page. In this regard he testified that in examining the two exhibits (using a magnifying glass), he saw that there were identical defects in each exhibit in the letters g,I,k,r, and w. Given the number of corresponding defects, it was McNett's opinion that the odds were very high that the two letters came from the same typewriter.

McNett did not, however, offer any opinion concerning whether the typist of the two letters was the same, and it appears to me that they were not. Thus, the typing style and the number of typographical errors on Respondent's Exhibit 5 as compared to Respondent's Exhibit 4 leads me to believe that there were two typists, one for each letter.[4]

Respondents would still maintain that even if two typists were involved, the evidence still leads to the conclusion that Lariviere was the author of the disputed letter. In this regard, they assert that Lariviere conceded that his woman friend (with whom he lives), typed the letter which is Respondent's Exhibit 4. They argue that if the two letters were from the same typewriter, then Respondent's Exhibit 4 can only have been typed by Lariviere's friend at his direction or by himself. Although this is possible, the fact that the evidence points to two different typists, the fact that Lariviere denies any involvement in the letter, and the possibility that the letter may have originated elsewhere leads me to conclude that the Respondents have not met their burden of proof on this question.

5. The backpay formula

As noted above, the General Counsel contends that the proper formula for backpay is one which uses the average of all the Company's full-time drivers during the backpay period excluding weeks in which a driver worked less than 24 hours. In this manner, the General Counsel derives an average weekly pay rate during each quarter of the backpay period, which is then assigned as the expected earnings of Bagley and Lariviere. Vacation and sick pay are also added.

The Respondents proposed two alternative formulas which, while conceptially different, nevertheless yield results which are remarkably similar to each other. In the first proposed formula, they propose that I determine the average earnings of all the Company's drivers during the backpay period. They then propose that I reduce the average amounts by about 21 percent in Lariviere's case and reduce it by about 24 percent in Bagley's case. The discounts are, in essence, arrived at by computing the percentage difference between the average weekly earnings of the other drivers during a predischarge period from the respective average weekly earnings of Lariviere and Bagley during the same predischarge period. As a second alternative formula, the Respondents contend that I determine the average weekly earnings of the two discriminatees during a representative period before their discharges and project those averages for each of them into the backpay period. I must say that, to my mind, this second alternative formula is far more preferable than Respondents first alternative formula because (1) it requires far fewer calculations (with a concomitant lower probability of error), and (2) it is one of a number of traditional formulas which has been adopted by the Board in the past.

The General Counsel argues that both of Respondent's proposed formulas should be rejected for a number of reasons which I think have some merit. First, the evidence shows that seniority was taken into account for purposes of job assignment. As there was a significant degree of turnover during the backpay period, the two discriminatees would have improved their relative seniority. This in turn would have permitted both men to get longer runs with a concomitant increase in mileage reimbursements during the backpay period had they continued to be employed. Thus given their relative rise in seniority had they remained employed, it is not at all certain that the two discriminatees would have continued to earn the same percentage difference during the backpay period as they had done during the predischarge period.

[4] I note that in typing the number 1, the typist of R. Exh. 5 used the capital L key, whereas the typist of R. Exh. 4 used the key for the number 1.

The projection formula proposed by the Respondents similarly does not take account of the relative rise in seniority that the discriminatees would have enjoyed had they not been discharged. Additionally it does not take account of the fact that both the load rate and mileage rates were increased after the two men had been discharged.

Frankly, whatever problems I see with the Respondents' formulas, I have an even greater problem with the General Counsel's proposed formula. To my mind, the essential difficulty with his formula is that the evidence shows that there were two categories of drivers, one on a 6-day-per-week schedule and the other on a 5-day-per-week schedule. The record also shows (particularly G.C. Exhs. 3 and 4), that those employees on a 6-day schedule generally had higher earnings than the drivers on a 5-day schedule. Thus, as both Lariviere and Bagley had elected to be on a 5-day schedule, it seems to me that to calculate their backpay based on the average earnings of all drivers, irrespective of what schedule they were on, would be to unduly inflate their backpay. (I am unpersuaded and unmoved by Lariviere's testimony that prior to his discharge he was thinking about the possibility of returning to a 6-day schedule.)

In connection with the above, I suggested during the hearing that perhaps the fairest way of determining gross backpay was to base it on the average earnings, during the backpay period, of those drivers who were on a 5-day schedule. All parties, however, assured me that this was not a good idea because there was insufficient data to do so and because in some instances drivers moved back and forth, at undertermined times, from a 6-day schedule.

In reviewing this record, I realized that prior to the time when all drivers were allowed to choose between a 5- or 6-day schedule there were two drivers who were on a 5-day schedule whereas all the others were on a 6-day schedule. These two were Tickner and Cummings. Moreover both Tickner and Cummings continued to work a 5-day schedule when some of the others, including the two discriminatees, elected to go on the same schedule. Also, the records show that after the discharge of Lariviere and Bagley, Tickner continued to work on a 5-day schedule throughout the entire backpay period although Cummings left the Company about the third quarter of 1982. Finally and most significantly, Cummings, and even more particularly Tickner (both of whom would have similar relative seniority as the discriminatees during the backpay period for purposes of mileage rates and job assignments), had remarkably similar earnings ranking as the two discriminatees. This is evidenced by General Counsel's Exhibits 3 and 4.

It seems to me that as the earning ranking of the two discriminatees were almost identical to Tickner's during the predischarge period (all being on a 5-day schedule)[6] it is highly probable that the discriminatee's earnings would have been almost the same as Tickner's during the backpay period had they not been discharged. Further, the similarity is strengthened because of the similarity in relative seniority among Tickner and the two discriminatees vis-a-vis other drivers for purposes of mileage rates and job assignments.

Based on the above, I conclude that the fairest method of determining gross backpay in this case is to base it on the actual earnings of Tickner during the backpay period except for the second quarter of 1982 when, for some reason unknown to me, he had no earnings. Thus for the second quarter of 1982, I shall substitute the earnings of Cummings. Accordingly, the gross backpay on quarterly basis would be computed as follows:

Q2	$238	x	1/2	=	$119
Q3	[a]422	x	13	=	5,486
Q4	428	x	13	=	5,564
1983:
Q1	414	x	13	=	5,82
Q2	383	x	13	=	4,979
Q3	410	x	13	=	5,330
Q4	368	x	13	=	4,784
1984:
Q1	413	x	13	=	5,369
Q2	387	x	13	=	5,031
Q3	408	x	13	=	5,304
Q4	410	x	13	=	5,330
1985:
Q2	437	x	1	=	437

In addition to the above, the record shows that all drivers were entitled to sick pay in the amount of $75 per year if they did not use their sick leave during the year. Therefore, the discriminatees are entitled to this amount in each year of the backpay period. Also, the record establishes that all drivers were entitled to vacation pay (in the amounts of 1 or 2 weeks depending on seniority), the weekly amounts determined by dividing an employee's annual earnings by 52 weeks.[7] As the evidence establishes to my satisfaction that both discriminatees received their vacation pay for 1982 at the time of their discharges, they each would be entitled to vacation

[6] The evidence strongly suggests that prior to the agreement that allowed drivers to choose a 5- or 6-day schedule, both Lariviere and Bagley had unilaterally adopted a 5-day schedule for themselves by virtue of absenteeism.

[7] Pursuant to the bargaining agreement, drivers employed for more than 1 year but less than 2 years were entitled to 1 week of vacation pay. Drivers employed more than 2 years were entitled to 2 weeks of vacation pay. As both discriminatees, in 1983 and 1984 would have been employed for more than 2 years but for their unlawful discharges, they each would be entitled to 2 weeks vacation pay in 1982 and 1984.

pay for the years 1983 and 1984. (The amounts determined by dividing their gross backpay in each year by 52 weeks and then multiplying by two.) Thus in 1983 each would be entitled to $787.50 and in 1984 each would be entitled to $809.

Summarizing all the above and taking into account interim earnings, it is concluded that the total backpay for Lariviere, exclusive of interest, would be as follows:

Period and Gross Backpay	Interim Earnings	Net Backpay
1982:
Q2 $119	$0	$119
Q3 $5,486	0	5,486
Q4 $5,564 + $75 (sick pay) = $5,639	0	5,639
1983:
Q1 $5,382 + $197 (vacation pay) = $5,579	0	5,579
Q2 $4,979 + $197 (vacation pay) = $5,176	0	5,176
Q3 $5,330 + $197 (vacation pay) = $5,527	0	5,527
Q4 $4,784 + $197 (vacation pay) + $75 (sick pay) = $5,056	2,482	2,574
1984:
Q1 $5,369 + $202 (vacation pay) = $5,571	4,050	1,521
Q2 $5,031 + $202 (vacation pay) = $5,233	2947	2,286
Q3 $5,304 + $202 (vacation pay) = $5,506	3,525	1,981
Q4 $5,330 + $202 (vacation pay) + $75 (sick pay) = $5,607	3,417	2,190
1985:
Q1 $5,681	5,792	0
Q2 $437	312	125
Total		$38,203

Using the same formula for Bagley results in the following:

Period and Gross Backpay	Interim Earnings	Net Backpay
1982:
Q2 $119	$0	$119
Q3 $5,486	0	5,486
Q4 $5,564 + $75 (sick pay) = $5,639	0	5,639
1983:
Q1 $5,382 + $197 (vacation pay) = $5,579	0	5,579
Q2 $4,979 + $197 (vacation pay) = $5,176	0	5,176
Q3 $5,330 + $197 (vacation) = $5,527	0	5,527
Q4 $4,784 + $197 (vacation pay) + $75 (sick pay) = $5,056	0	5,056
1984:
Q1 $5,369 + $202 (vacation pay) = $5,571	0	5,571
Q2 $5,031 + $202 (vacation pay) = $5,233	1,556	3,677
Q3 $5,304 + $202 (vacation pay) = $5,506	6,708	0

	Period and Gross Backpay	Interim Earnings	Net Backpay
1985:	Q4 $5,330 + $202 (vacation pay) + $75 (sick pay) = $5,607	7,114	0
	Total		$42,593

Handleman Company and Teamsters Professional, Public, Medical & Miscellaneous Employees Local 165, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America. Case 20–CA–19388

31 March 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

Upon a charge filed 29 November 1984 the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board by the Regional Director for Region 20 issued a complaint and a notice of hearing 15 January 1985. The complaint alleges[1] that the Respondent, Handleman Company, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by maintaining an employee stock ownership plan that precludes employees covered by a collective-bargaining agreement from participating unless the Respondent agrees to coverage under a negotiated agreement.

On 5 December 1985 all parties including the General Counsel filed a stipulation of facts and a motion to transfer proceedings to the Board. The parties waived a hearing and an administrative law judge's decision and submitted the case directly to the Board for findings of facts, conclusions of law, and a decision and order.

On 7 February 1986 the Board issued an order granting the motion, approving the stipulation, and transferring the proceeding to the Board. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Respondent is a Michigan corporation with headquarters in Detroit, Michigan, and an office and warehouse in Sacramento, California. The Respondent is engaged in the wholesale distribution of records, tapes, and related products. During the 12 months preceding issuance of the complaint, the Respondent purchased and received at its Sacramento, California facility products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers outside the State of California. We find that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

Teamsters Professional, Public, Medical & Miscellaneous Employees Local 165, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

Since 1983 the Respondent has maintained an employee stock ownership plan under which qualified employees are entitled to acquire stock in the Respondent's corporation. The plan defines eligible employees as:

> (1) "Covered Employee" means any Employee who is classified by the Company as full-time and who:
> . . . .
> (ii) Is not covered by a collective bargaining agreement entered into by the Company unless such agreement, by specific reference to the Plan, provides for coverage under the Plan.

B. Parties' Contentions

The General Counsel contends that the Respondent's promulgating, maintaining, and publicizing the stock ownership plan is a per se violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act because it automatically excludes from coverage employees who become represented by a labor organization and covered by a collective-bargaining agreement. The General Counsel argues that the plan's exclusionary language punishes employees who choose a union because they become subject to risking loss of the plan's benefits in negotiations while unrepresented employees would continue to enjoy the benefits. Thus, the General Counsel argues that the exclusionary language interferes with, restrains, and coerces employees because it creates the potential of discrimination or a loss to employees for choosing union representation.

The Respondent contends that the plan merely recognizes that Respondent's duty to bargain with its employees' bargaining representative over mandatory bargaining subjects, including participation in employee benefit plans. Thus, the Respondent argues that an employee benefit plan may lawfully point out that employees covered by a bargaining agreement are not eligible to participate unless the bargaining agreement provides for coverage. The Respondent argues that its plan does not exclude any of its employees from participation but that all employees are eligible to participate, subject to its statutory bargaining obligations. The Respondent argues that the plan's exclusionary language simply points out that participation by employees covered by a bargaining agreement is governed by the bargaining agreement. Accordingly, the Respondent contends that the plan does not interfere with, restrain, or coerce any of the Respondent's employees.

C. Discussion

The Board has held that an employer violates Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by maintaining a benefit plan excluding employees who join a union, choose union representation, are members of a bargaining unit, or are covered by a bargaining agreement. See respectively Toffenetti Restaurant Co., 136 NLRB 1156 (1962), enfd. 311 F.2d 219 (2d Cir. 1962), cert. denied 372 U.S. 977 (1963); Channel Master Corp., 148 NLRB 1343 (1964); Dura Corp., 156 NLRB 285 (1965), enfd. 380 F.2d 970 (6th Cir. 1967); and Niagara Wires, 240 NLRB 1326 (1979). Such plans interfere with, restrain, and coerce currently unrepresented employees because the exclusionary clauses automatically eliminate the benefits on selection of a representative and do not allow for their continuation pending negotiations. What is unlawful is the suggestion inherent in the exclusionary language that unrepresented employees will forfeit the plans' benefits if they choose union representation. In other words, the plans constitute threats to discontinue the benefits or to refuse to bargain over continuation of the benefits. Such threats violate the Act. Como Plastics, 143 NLRB 151 (1963).

The Respondent's employee stock ownership plan defines a covered employee as one who: "Is not covered by a collective bargaining agreement entered into by the Company unless such agreement, by specific reference to the Plan, provides for coverage under the Plan." This exclusionary language, unlike that in the above cases, indicates that coverage for the employees is subject to negotiations. The distinction is a critical one. The Respondent's plan does not cut off the benefit prior to negotiations, but contemplates the continuation of the benefits during the negotiations. Rather than automatically withdrawing or completely foreclosing coverage for represented employees, the Respondent's plan leaves continued coverage to collective bargaining, allowing the parties to agree to continued coverage or not. The Board has found that plans containing similar exclusionary provisions are not unlawful. Thus, in Sarah Neuman Nursing Home, 270 NLRB 663, 680 (1984), the Board found no violation where the employer maintained a profit-sharing plan excluding "any person who is covered under a collective bargaining agreement . . . unless the collective bargaining agreement provides for the inclusion of such person under the plan." Further in Rangaire Corp., 157 NLRB 682, 683–684 (1966), the Board found lawful the employers' maintenance of a pension plan excluding "any person covered by a collective bargaining agreement entered into with the employer, which agreement does not provide for coverage of such person by this plan."

For the foregoing reasons we find that the Respondent's maintenance of an employee stock ownership plan does not violate the Act as alleged.[2]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Handleman Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. Teamsters Professional, Public, Medical & Miscellaneous Employees Local 165, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. Handleman Company has not violated the Act as alleged.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 9 May 1986 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding, reported at 279 NLRB No. 115 (unpublished), granting the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment. On 8 August 1986 the Board informed the parties of its sua sponte determination to reconsider its decision in the above case. The parties were invited to file statements of position with respect to the distinction, if any, between "major" and "minor" supervisors in the context of evaluating the coercive impact of preelection, prounion supervisory conduct. The Respondent filed a statement of position on 25 August 1986.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

As noted in our earlier Decision and Order, a secret-ballot election was held in the petitioned-for unit on 5 August 1983. Out of 28 eligible voters, 12 cast votes for, and 6 cast votes against, the Union; there were 8 challenged ballots, a number sufficient to affect the results of the election. The Company filed objections to the election, alleging, inter alia, that "supervisory taint" was present during the solicitation of authorization cards as well as throughout the course of the Union's organizing drive. On 19 October 1983 the Acting Regional Director issued a Supplemental Decision and Order directing that a hearing be held on the challenged ballots and on the Company's objections. A hearing was held on 26 October 1983, and the hearing officer's report and recommendations issued on 14 March 1984. The hearing officer found, inter alia, that the challenge to the ballot of Craig Kuyper should be sustained on the basis of Kuyper's supervisory status. The hearing officer also recommended overruling the Employer's objections to the election, including the objection alleging that Kuyper's involvement with the union organizing drive created a supervisory taint which invalidated the election, because Kuyper was only a minor supervisor and therefore his involvement in the union campaign was not coercive. The Employer filed exceptions to the hearing officer's report and recommendations. On 31 July 1984 the Regional Director issued a Second Supplemental Decision and Certification of Representative to which the Employer filed a request for review. On 24 January 1985 the Board issued a mailgram denying the Employer's request for review except with respect to the Union's alleged promise to waive initiation fees.[1] With respect to the alleged supervisory taint, the Board, citing Ideal Electric & Mfg. Co., 134 NLRB 1275 (1961), found that because there was no allegation that any of the alleged "taint" occurred during the critical period, the Employer was precluded from raising the issue for the first time in this postelection proceeding.

By letter dated 5 November 1985, the Union made a formal demand for recognition and bargaining. The Employer refused, maintaining that the Board had committed reversible error in its decision certifying the Union. The Union filed an unfair labor practice charge and the Region issued a complaint. On 20 February 1986 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment which we granted in our 9 May 1986 decision. We now, however, wish to address in more detail the issues raised by our classification of individuals as major or minor supervisors.

In his report and recommendations, the hearing officer made a detailed analysis of Kuyper's supervisory authority and prounion conduct, finding that Kuyper was a supervisor and that he had been instrumental in the Union's organizing drive. He then noted that there are two situations in which a supervisor's conduct on behalf of the union can have an objectionable effect sufficient to warrant setting aside the election. The first involves a situation in which the employer takes no stand contrary to the supervisor's prounion conduct, and employees can be led to believe the employer favors the union.[2] The second involves the possibility that a supervisor's prounion conduct could coerce employees into supporting the union out of fear of future retaliation by that supervisor.

In order to determine whether a supervisor's conduct could reasonably tend to coerce employees, the Board has reviewed the degree of supervisory authority possessed by the supervisor and the extent of the supervisor's prounion conduct. The hearing officer, relying on ITT Corp., 265 NLRB 1480 (1982), stated that the initial analysis in determining whether Kuyper's conduct was objectionable centered on his status as a major or a minor

[1] In a Third Supplemental Decision and Certification of Respondent dated 24 April 1985, the Regional Director adopted the hearing officer's recommendations that this objection be overruled. On 21 October 1985 the Board denied the Employer's request for review of this issue.

supervisor. A major supervisor was defined in that case as one who can hire, fire, promote, and issue written warnings to employees, or effectively recommend that such action be taken. Only supervisors who possessed such authority were viewed as possessing sufficient retaliatory potential to make their prounion conduct coercive. Applying this analysis, the hearing officer concluded that since Kuyper did not possess the above-described authority, he was a minor supervisor. Thus, although the hearing officer found that Kuyper was the central figure in the organizing campaign, the hearing officer's classification of Kuyper as a minor supervisor led him to conclude that Kuyper's prounion conduct was not coercive.

The Employer asserts that the Board's distinction between major and minor supervisors is an artificial one without any validity. It further asserts that Kuyper possessed extensive authority to retaliate against and to reward employees. In addition, the Employer maintains that Kuyper's prounion activity was sufficiently extensive to have reasonably tended to affect employees' choice in the election.

We agree with the hearing officer's conclusion that Kuyper's conduct did not interfere with the employees' free choice in the election. In so doing, we rely on all the relevant circumstances in the case. In particular, we evaluate, as we have in the past, all the relevant aspects of Kuyper's supervisory authority in determining whether his prounion conduct would reasonably tend to coerce employees in the exercise of their Section 7 rights.[3] However, we do not rely on the summary characterization of Kuyper as a minor supervisor.

The designation of a supervisor as major or minor has been used as a type of shorthand to indicate the extent of supervisory power exercised by an individual. The designation met with criticism, however, when certain courts of appeals perceived that the labeling of a supervisor's authority as major or minor was taking the place of a thorough analysis by the Board of the potential for coercion by a prounion supervisor of unit employees.[4]

Nowhere is this conflict more evident than in the series of cases involving ITT Corp. A representation election was held on 16 February 1979 in a unit of production and maintenance employees. The employer protested the inclusion of 31 group leaders in the unit, and these individuals voted subject to challenge. The company filed objections to the election, maintaining that the group leaders were supervisors and that their prounion conduct tainted the election. The Board adopted the Regional Director's finding that even assuming that all 31 individuals were supervisors, they were minor, as opposed to major, supervisors without any real authority to affect the working conditions of unit employees. The Board subsequently found that the company's refusal to bargain with the union violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

On review of the Board's bargaining order, the Second Circuit remanded the case to the Board, finding that the Board had not addressed the central issue of whether any of the unit employees' votes had been affected by the group leaders' conduct. In its supplemental decision, the Board interpreted the Second Circuit's opinion as approving its major/minor supervisor distinction, and found that the day-to-day supervisory authority of the group leaders did not afford an opportunity for effective retaliation against antiunion employees.

In its opinion on review of the Board's supplemental decision the court expressly noted that its earlier opinion had "not approve[d] an automatic conclusion that a supervisor's conduct might or might not affect voting based on a distinction between 'major' and 'minor' supervisory authority."[5] What the court was interested in, it stated, and failed to find in the supplemental decision, were the criteria used by the Board for determining whether a supervisor exercised major or minor authority, and whether the exercise of that authority could have an effect on employee voting. The court clearly rejected the Board's determination that an individual was a major supervisor only if possessed of "the authority to hire, fire, promote, or issue written warnings on his own volition, or has the authority effectively to recommend such action." Rather, the court concluded, the criteria to be used in determining the potential of a supervisor to influence unit employees should include not only the power to retaliate, as indicated by the Board, but the power to reward employees as well.[6] Based on these criteria, the court found that the group leaders did possess sufficient authority to influence employee votes by their conduct and set aside the election.[7]

As the Ninth Circuit stated in NLRB v. Hawaiian Flour Mill, 792 F.2d 1459, 1463 (9th Cir. 1986), the characterization of an individual as a minor supervisor "cannot save an election when that supervisor has the power to punish or reward, and acts so that the threat of exercising that power reasonably tends to coerce employees in their voting."

[7] See also NLRB v. Kahala Kai Photo Service, supra, in which the Ninth Circuit also adopted the view that the Board should consider both the potential to reward as well as the potential to retaliate in evaluating the effects of a supervisor's prounion conduct.

We agree that in evaluating whether a supervisor's prounion conduct could reasonably tend to coerce employees' votes in a representation election, it is necessary to evaluate the ability of a supervisor both to reward and to retaliate against employees. In this regard, the indicia of authority which a supervisor possesses are factors to be considered in making this evaluation. That evaluation is not furthered, however, by characterizing supervisors as major or minor based on a summary of those indicia. To the contrary, the use of such characterizations has the tendency, as the Board's own experience has shown, to lead to an incomplete analysis of the degree of a supervisor's authority. Thus, to the extent that our decision in ITT Corp. and subsequent cases can be interpreted as suggesting that a major/minor characterization may be substituted for a complete analysis of the extent of supervisory authority, they are hereby overruled.

In determining that Kuyper's prounion conduct could not reasonably tend to coerce employees here, we rely on his minimal supervisory power to either reward or adversely affect unit employees. Primary among Kuyper's duties as dispatcher are the establishment, assignment, and adjustment of the drivers' pickup and delivery routes. Kuyper testified that those routes were designed by taking into account the milking times of the dairies, the delivery requests by customers, and the amount of milk which could be transported on a given route. Once the routes are established, they remain essentially the same throughout a season, and Kuyper is responsible for assigning them to drivers and establishing starting times. Although the assignment of drivers to routes may be a significant indicia of supervisory power in some situations, the circumstances here indicate that Kuyper exercised only a "degree" of independent judgment in that the routes are designed to accommodate factors outside of Kuyper's control, and thus cannot be easily manipulated in order to punish or reward an employee.

Other aspects of Kuyper's supervisory authority are equally benign with respect to the possibility of using such power for or against specific employees. Kuyper's ability to grant time off and sick leave is fairly routine, because the various routes require no special skills and the drivers frequently fill in for one another. Kuyper testified that when someone asks for time off, he will either take the route himself, call a casual employee, or call a regular employee who is normally scheduled to be off at that time. If no replacement can be found, the request is denied. An employee who is regularly scheduled to be off at that time is not compelled to come into work. Thus, although Kuyper has a degree of independent authority in making decisions about the routes, the extent to which that authority could be used for or against a particular employee is minimal.

Kuyper also reviews drivers' worksheets and paysheets, and has the authority to correct inaccuracies or discrepancies. Such corrections, however, would not be likely to give rise to a situation in which an employee could be rewarded or punished, because there is no evidence that Kuyper has any discretion in refraining from reporting them. Kuyper testified that his power to discipline employees is minimal, consisting of verbal warnings which are not recorded in the employees' personnel files.[8] He has no authority to hire, fire, or promote employees and, although on occasion his recommendations on hiring have been followed, the record indicates that employees have also recommended individuals who have been hired. Kuyper attends supervisory meetings concerning the profitability of routes, driver performance, and cost of supplies and vehicles. He also prepares monthly profit and route analysis reports used by the Employer to check revenue-to-ratios and to evaluate whether route changes can increase profit. Kuyper testified that with respect to employee performance, his role is basically suggesting modifications in the routes, depending on how quickly drivers were making their runs, but he takes no part in employee evaluations. None of these functions lends itself to creating a situation in which Kuyper can significantly reward or punish unit employees. Based on these factors, we find that Kuyper does not possess sufficient authority such that his prounion conduct could reasonably be said to have been coercive.

Moreover, we note that although Kuyper was involved with the initial organizing drive and solicited employees to sign authorization cards, there has been no allegation that Kuyper engaged in objectionable conduct after the representation petition was filed. The Board has, on occasion, considered prepetition actions as evidence of objectionable conduct, particularly when prepetition misconduct occurred in connection with a union's attempt to generate a sufficient showing of interest.[9] Here, however, the Employer is not objecting to the Union's showing of interest, but rather asserting that Kuyper's conduct created a supervisory taint that interfered with the conduct of the election. There is no evidence that Kuyper engaged in any significant prounion conduct after the petition had been filed. Although his conduct may have been influential in starting the union's organizing drive, we believe that this prepetition conduct, without more, and in light of its remoteness in time from the election, was insufficient to affect the results of the election. Ideal Electric & Mfg. Co., 134 NLRB 1275 (1961). In addition, we note that it is not alleged that Kuyper threatened employees in any way or promised any rewards in order to ensure their support for the Union and, significantly, the opinions he expressed about the Union were strictly his own personal views.[10]

[8] Although Kuyper also testified that he was told he has the power to issue written warnings, he has never exercised this power.

Therefore, we find that the objection was properly overruled and that the issuance of the Certification of Representative was appropriate. Accordingly, we reaffirm our earlier finding that the Respondent was obligated to bargain with the Union and that its refusal to do so violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1).

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 11 July 1986 Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached supplemental decision.[1] The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions,[3] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Jenkins Index Corporation, a Division of Universal Paper Goods Company, Inc., Single Employers or, in the alternative Universal Paper Goods Company, Inc., a subsidiary of OPC Holdings, Inc., Successor with liability to Jenkins Index Corporation, Montebello, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

William J. McCauley, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Norman Jones, of San Simeon, California, for the Respondent.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

JAMES M. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried before me at Los Angeles, California, on June 11, 1986, pursuant to a backpay specification and notice of hearing issued by the Acting Regional Director for Region 21 of the National Labor Relations Board, on behalf of the Board, on February 19, 1986. The Board's original order was entered on December 14, 1984, and is reported at 273 NLRB 736. Thereafter, the entities collectively described herein as Respondent entered into a stipulation providing for the issuance of a backpay specification prior to obtaining court enforcement of the original Board Order. That stipulation was approved by the Board on December 19, 1985.

Among other things, the Board's original Order required Respondent to make whole three employees pursuant to its quarterly formula as set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), together with interest thereon. The initial complaint was directed against "Jenkins Index Company" and the Board's original order directed "Jenkins Index Company . . ., its officers, agents, successors, and assigns" to comply with the Order. In the backpay specification, the Acting Regional Director asserted, and Respondent admits, that at the time the unfair labor practices were committed (February 17, 1983), Jenkins Index was a wholly owned division of Universal Paper Goods Company, Inc. The Acting Regional Director further asserted that as a result of a corporate transformation occurring after the commission of the unfair labor practices, Jenkins was completely merged into Universal and ceased operating as a division of Universal; he also asserts that Universal, in turn, is a subsidiary of OPC Holdings, Inc., a holding company. Respondent admits that as of July 1984 Jenkins had been completely merged into Respondent Universal and had ceased operating as one of its divisions. Respondent further admits that Universal is a successor for the purpose of remedying Jenkins' unfair labor practices.

The General Counsel has waived its right to file a brief; Respondent has filed a short brief challenging the credibility of one claimant. It has been carefully considered.

The Evidence

At the outset of the hearing the General Counsel and Respondent entered into a stipulation with respect to two of the three individuals entitled to backpay. After a modification which appears in Appendix A, the parties agreed that Ambrosio Contreras is entitled to net backpay of $19,367.92. In addition, they agreed that Michael Negrete is entitled to net backpay of $16,254.92. Accord-

[2] The Respondent, Jenkins Index Corporation, has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The Respondent has excepted to the judge's awarding Celedon Armenta backpay for the period from 19 July through 1 November 1984. It appears from the record that during this period Armenta may have received vocational rehabilitation disability payments, and it is clear that a permanent disability award was made by the State of California on 2 November 1984, the last day of the backpay period. With regard to this exception, the Respondent's sole contention is its conclusionary claim that the backpay period should end on 19 July 1984 rather than the 2 November 1984 date set forth in the backpay specification and accepted by the judge. We find no basis in the record to establish that the backpay period should end on any date prior to the date of the permanent disability award. Moreover, we note that the Respondent has made no claim, and the record does not indicate, that the vocational rehabilitation disability payments constitute payment for wages lost by a claimant during the backpay period and thus are deductible from the gross backpay amount. See Canova Moving Co., 261 NLRB 639 (1982), enfd. 708 F.2d 1498 (9th Cir. 1983).

ingly, a supplemental order will be entered liquidating backpay in those amounts for those two individuals.

The third individual is Celedon Armenta. The General Counsel has set forth Armenta's backpay period as beginning on February 10, 1983, when he was discharged, and ending on November 2, 1984, the date on which he was granted a disability insurance award.[1] The Respondent seeks to reduce backpay by asserting that Armenta was disabled and unable to return to work as of November 2, 1984. The evidence shows that Armenta actually suffered his industrial injury in 1981, more than a year before his unlawful discharge. It further shows that he had surgery in 1982 and returned to work on full duty in August of that year. Armenta testified he worked continuously from that date until he was unlawfully discharged on February 10, 1983. He says from that time on he was fully capable of performing all aspects of his job, those of a maintenance mechanic, and as late as 1985 when he actually returned to work for a short period he continued to be able to perform those duties. Respondent has offered no contrary evidence.

I conclude that although Armenta suffered an industrial accident in 1981 and although he had surgery in 1982, the injury was corrected and that at all times he was able to perform his job and could have done so from the time he was discharged until the end of the backpay period as alleged.

Respondent also challenges the validity of those figures in Appendix A relating to Armenta which show that he had no interim earnings during the entire year of 1984. Armenta testified he was not employed during that time and his only income was approximately $4200 from some rental property which he and his family own. The parties are in agreement that the rental income would not be considered interim earnings as the property was generating income before the discrimination. Respondent subpoenaed certain of Armenta's bank records in an effort to establish that he had received additional income from employment and from other sources. It is true that during this period Armenta's checking and savings accounts show substantial deposits. Nonetheless, Respondent was unable to show that these deposits came from employment. Armenta stated that some of the moneys deposited were given him by his three adult sons, one of whom works for an aerospace manufacturer and who earns a salary of approximately $45,000; another of whom works for the corporate office of a fast-food chain and who earns between $35,000 and $40,000; and a third who is in the military service. He testified that these three have told him that they did not want him spending his own money or depleting the family estate as they expect it to be part of their inheritance. Accordingly, Armenta says, he had accepted their assistance. Their assistance appears in both savings and checking deposits.

In addition, he says, before his unlawful discharge his wife had approximately $15,000 in cash which she kept in a safety deposit box. He says his wife, who handles the family finances, on various occasions during the backpay period, withdrew certain sums from the safety deposit box. She placed them either in the savings account for short periods or into short-term certificates of deposit which were frequently "rolled over." He says the deposits shown in the savings account appear to be substantial but, in reality, amount only to the same money being deposited several times. Although available, Respondent offered no bank records in evidence. As Respondent was unable to demonstrate any other source of these deposits, I conclude that it has failed to meet its burden of proving that Armenta had interim earnings in 1984.

In conclusion I find that the backpay specification with respect to Celedon Armenta is correct and that he is entitled to net backpay totaling $39,244.02 Accordingly, I issue the following recommended supplemental

ORDER

Based on the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law it is ordered that the Respondent, Jenkins Index Corporation, a Division of Universal Paper Goods Company, Inc., Single Employers; or, in the alternative Universal Paper Goods Company, Inc., a subsidiary of OPC Holdings, Inc., Successor with Liability to Jenkins Index Corporation, Montebello, California, shall pay the following named employees net backpay in the amounts set forth opposite their names, together with interest as required by the Board under Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962):

Celedon Armenta	$39,244.02

DECISION AND CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

The National Labor Relations Board has considered objections to an election held 24 October 1984 and the hearing officer's report recommending disposition of them. The election was conducted pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows no votes for and one against the Petitioner, with no challenged ballots.

The Board has reviewed the record[1] in light of the exceptions and brief, has adopted the hearing officer's findings[2] and recommendations only to the extent consistent with this decision, and finds that a certification of results of election should be issued.

The election in this case was scheduled to take place between 7 and 7:30 a.m. on 24 October 1984. Of approximately eight eligible voters,[3] only one cast a vote. The Petitioner filed objections to the election, claiming, inter alia, that the number of votes cast was not representative of the unit and the election should be rerun. The Regional Director found merit in this objection, and recommended that the election be set aside on this basis. The Employer filed exceptions to the Regional Director's Report on Objections, contending that the vote was representative and that, in any event, the lack of participation in the election was due to the Petitioner's conduct. A hearing was held pursuant to a Board Order issued 8 April 1985.

In his Report and Recommendation on Objections, the hearing officer found that there was no credible evidence to support the Employer's contention that the Petitioner's conduct had interfered with the election. He also found that the low voter turnout was caused by two employee absences, the desire of some employees to wait outside the polling area together in order to vote as a group, and their mistaken belief that the timepiece used for the election would indicate the same time as their own. When this group presented itself to vote, the polls were already closed. Based on the fact that only one vote was cast, the hearing officer then concluded that a substantial and representative complement of employees did not vote, and the election should be set aside. We disagree.

The Board has long held that the "majority" required by Section 9(a) of the Act for purposes of selecting a collective-bargaining representative refers to a majority of those employees voting in an election. R.C.A. Mfg. Co., 2 NLRB 159, 173–178 (1936). In situations where only one vote was cast, the initial Board position was to issue a certification. See Williams Dimond & Co., 2 NLRB 859, 870 (1937) (union certified as the representative in three-person unit where only one vote was cast). Five years later, however, in S.A. Kendall, Jr., 41 NLRB 395, 397 (1942), the Board reversed itself without any reference to Williams Dimond, and held that where only one employee voted in a three-person unit, the election was not representative, and a second election should be held.[4]

Neither Kendall nor the other one-employee-vote cases that followed contain any explanation of the concept of a "representative" election or any analysis of why a single vote cast in an election is not "representative" of employees' sentiment on unionization. It seems apparent, however, that this concept emerged as a counterbalance to the "simple majority" rule in R.C.A. Mfg., supra, because a rigid application of that rule could lead to the certification of a union as the bargaining representative in a unit where only a small fraction of the eligible employees had voted. One way to offset this "inequity" would be to consider an election to be "representative," and hence valid, only if a "substantial" number of eligible employees voted.[5] No

[1] The hearing officer recommended that Objection 5 be overruled, and no exceptions to this finding were filed. We note that in his discussion of Objection 5 the hearing officer mistakenly identified a witness as "Adams" instead of "Lewis."

[2] The Employer has excepted to some of the hearing officer's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule a hearing officer's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Stretch-Tex Co., 118 NLRB 1359, 1361 (1957). We find no basis for reversing the resolution.

The Employer also excepted the hearing officer's ruling that the Employer had the burden to go forward at the hearing. We agree with the Employer that the burden to go forward at a representation hearing lies with the objecting party, which in this case is the Petitioner. However, we find that this erroneous ruling by the hearing officer is not prejudicial to the Employer and does not affect the outcome of this case.

[3] The eligibility list stated that there were 11 employees eligible to vote in the election. Based on evidence provided by the Employer, the hearing officer found that three of these employees were no longer employed by the Employer on the election date and thus were ineligible to vote. No exceptions were filed to this finding, and we adopt the hearing officer's conclusion that there were eight eligible voters.

[4] See also Gold & Baker, 54 NLRB 869 (1944) (election petition dismissed without prejudice where only one out of two eligible voters cast a ballot in the election); Firestone Tire & Rubber Co., 57 NLRB 868 (1944) (one valid ballot cast out of four eligible votes; election petition dismissed without prejudice); Kit Mfg., 198 NLRB 1 (1971) (second election ordered where one out of two eligible employees voted). Compare Gemco Automotive Center #507, 198 NLRB 950 (1972) (election deemed representative where both eligible employees voted but one ballot was void).

numerical standard was established to define "substantial," however, and ad hoc judgments have since been made on a case-by-case basis. In general, as the percentage of employee participation declined, the likelihood of the election being set aside as unrepresentative increased.[6] The exception to this has been the one-voter participation cases which involve two-employee units.[7]

In another series of early cases, the Board did not measure the "representative" character of an election in terms of numbers or percentages alone. Rather, there developed a multifactor analysis concerned with certain elements in the election process. In these cases, the operative factors are: (1) whether there was sufficient notice of the election; (2) whether there was an adequate opportunity for employees to vote; and (3) whether there was evidence of interference with the electoral process by any party.[8] As long as the election was fairly conducted, the failure of a majority of employees to exercise their right to vote was not permitted to invalidate the election, and the reasons for the employees' failure to vote were considered immaterial to the certification of the election results.

We have considered these two lines of case law, and have determined that election results should be certified where all eligible voters have an adequate opportunity to participate in the election, notwithstanding low voter participation. The fundamental purpose of a Board election is to provide employees with a meaningful opportunity to express their sentiments concerning representation for the purpose of collective bargaining. The law does not compel any employee to vote, and the law should not permit that right, to refrain from voting, to defeat an otherwise valid election. As the Board observed in Versail Mfg., 212 NLRB 592, 593 (1974), "[t]here must be some degree of finality to the results of an election, and there are strong policy considerations favoring prompt completion of representation proceedings." In political elections, voters who absent themselves from the polls are presumed to assent to the will of the majority of those voting. Similarly, when a Board election is met with indifference, it must be assumed that the majority of the eligible employees did not wish to participate in the selection of a bargaining representative and are content to be bound by the results obtained without their participation. Only if it can be shown by objective evidence that eligible employees were not afforded an "adequate opportunity to participate in the balloting"[9] will the Board decline to issue a certification and direct a second election.

Based on these considerations, we have decided to abandon any analysis dependent on a numerical test to determine the validity of a representation election. Rather, we will issue certifications where there is adequate notice and opportunity to vote and employees are not prevented from voting by the conduct of a party or by unfairness in the scheduling or mechanics of the election.[10] Precedent such as Kit Mfg. and Gold & Baker are inconsistent with this approach and are, accordingly, overruled.

In the present case, out of a unit of approximately eight eligible voters, only one employee, the Employer's election observer, cast a vote. Five of the other unit employees were present on the Employer's premises during the time of the election, and some had even indicated their desire to participate in the election. These employees failed to vote, not because they lacked an adequate opportunity to participate in the balloting, but because they chose to wait until the final minutes before the polls closed to vote together as a group, and then found that the timepiece on which they relied differed from the official timepiece used in the election. In the absence of a showing that any of the concerns articulated above have not been met or other unusual circumstances exist,[11] the reasons that an employee fails to exercise an opportunity to vote are not material to the certification of the election. As no such irregularities exist in the present case, the results of the election will be certified.

[11] This case is distinguishable from V.I.P. Limousine, 274 NLRB 641 (1985), relied on by the hearing officer, where a 20-inch snowstorm of blizzard proportions occurred during the polling period and a substantial number of employees did not vote. There, unlike here, the election process was disrupted by circumstances so severe that the Board had no alternative but to set the election aside. In reaching that result, the Board focused on "whether the election was conducted properly and in such a manner as to assure that all employees were given a sufficient opportunity to vote," a test essentially identical to the one we have used in this case. Id. at 642. In the present case, the circumstances leading to the employees' failure to vote, although unfortunate, were within their control, and do not constitute "unusual circumstances."

CERTIFICATION OF RESULTS OF ELECTION

IT IS CERTIFIED that a majority of the valid ballots have not been cast for the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 613, and that it is not the exclusive bargaining representative of these bargaining unit employees.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 31 March 1986 Administrative Law Judge Karl H. Buschmann issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Parties and the General Counsel filed briefs in response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record[1] in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions as modified, in accordance with the following analysis.

At the hearing the Respondent moved to dismiss the complaint insofar as it alleges that the Respondent unlawfully bargained with the three Charging Parties that represent its production employees (Local Union 159, United Paperworkers International Union; Local No. 50, International Union of Operating Engineers; and Local No. 49, United Paperworkers International Union), based on its assertion that there is no evidence linking those Unions to any alleged unlawful bargaining by the Respondent. The judge denied the Respondent's motion. He concluded that during the parties' 1985 negotiations the Respondent unlawfully insisted to impasse on its maintenance modernization proposal with not only the five Charging Parties who represent its maintenance employees, but also the three production Unions. Although we agree with the judge that the Respondent's proposal is a nonmandatory subject of bargaining because it would change unit scope, and that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by insisting to impasse on the proposal with the five maintenance Unions, we find that the Respondent's motion should be granted as to the three production Unions.

The General Counsel conceded that the maintenance modernization proposal (that would consolidate the maintenance employee units, thereby effectively requiring shared representation by the maintenance Unions) "pertained primarily, if not exclusively," to the maintenance Unions. The judge reasoned that the proposal "significantly affected" the production Unions, and therefore that the Respondent and these Unions were at impasse on the proposal, because the proposal would permit the Respondent to assign production employees to maintenance work. However, the uncontradicted evidence shows that the Respondent actually was at an impasse with the production Unions on vacation pay, health insurance coverage, premium pay on holidays, and lines of progression, rather than the maintenance modernization proposal.

Moreover, although the maintenance modernization proposal was set forth in a memorandum of agreement presented to the Joint Union Council composed of all the Unions, there is no evidence that the Respondent insisted that the production Unions agree to the proposal. The uncontradicted testimony of the Respondent's chief negotiator, Fred Delaney, was that the production Unions were free to sign the memorandum of agreement without agreeing to the maintenance modernization proposal. Delaney in fact informed the Unions that the Respondent's intention was to sign separate contracts, which was consistent with the parties' past practice. The parties' past practice is also that each Union is not required to agree to all provisions of the Respondent's proposed memorandum of agreement and that provisions that do not apply to individual units have not been included in their respective individual bargaining agreements. During one set of past contract negotiations, several Unions signed final agreements with the Respondent even though one Union had rejected the memorandum of agreement presented to the Joint Union Council and called a strike. That the Unions also intended to have separately signed contracts during the 1985 negotiations is shown by the fact that they changed the wording of the Joint Union Council's counterproposal so that it would clearly require the Respondent to recognize "each of the signatory Unions as the sole bargaining representative," instead of the Joint Union Council. Further, the Respondent's 28 May 1985 final offer specifically refers to individual acceptances in two places.

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and briefs adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

Thus, the evidence does not establish that the Respondent insisted to impasse on the maintenance modernization proposal with the production Unions. Accordingly, we shall grant the Respondent's motion to dismiss the complaint insofar as it relates to the production Unions.[2]

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 4.

"4. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by (a) refusing to incorporate the prior recognized unit descriptions for the five maintenance Unions at its facility in a new agreement, (b) by insisting to impasse on, and by unilaterally implementing, a proposal which modified the bargaining units and the jurisdictions of the five maintenance Unions, and (c) by unilaterally imposing wages and other conditions of employment on its employees represented by those Unions."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Boise Cascade Corporation, International Falls, Minnesota, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to bargain with Unions which represent its maintenance employees and refusing to incorporate in collective-bargaining agreements the recognized unit descriptions of these employees' respective bargaining representative.

(b) Insisting to impasse on, and unilaterally implementing, a proposal which modified the recognized bargaining units and the established jurisdictions of the Unions representing its maintenance employees.

(c) Unilaterally imposing on its employees represented by maintenance Unions wages and other conditions of employment.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, meet and confer with the Unions which represent its maintenance employees at reasonable times and places with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

(b) At the Union's or Unions' request, rescind any or all unilateral changes in representation or in terms and conditions of employment made on or after 1 July 1985 affecting its employees represented by the maintenance Unions and make those employees whole, with interest, as set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its International Falls, Minnesota location copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 18, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

[2] The judge inadvertently omitted from his Conclusions of Law his implicit finding that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by unilaterally implementing the terms of its 28 May 1985 final offer, as well as its maintenance modernization proposal, without first bargaining in good faith to impasse. We adopt this finding only to the extent that it applies to the final offer's implementation with respect to the maintenance Unions, and shall modify the Conclusions of Law accordingly.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to bargain with the Unions representing our maintenance employees by insisting to impasse on changes in the recognized bargaining units and jurisdiction of these Unions as a condition for new collective-bargaining agreements.

WE WILL NOT refuse to incorporate the recognized collective-bargaining units of the Unions representing our maintenance employees in new collective-bargaining agreements.

WE WILL NOT unilaterally impose on our employees represented by maintenance Unions wages and other conditions of employment.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, meet and confer with the Unions representing our maintenance employees at reasonable times and places with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment.

WE WILL, at the Union's or Unions' request, rescind any or all unilateral changes made on or after 1 July 1985 affecting our employees represented by maintenance Unions and make them whole for any losses they may have suffered, plus interest.

BOISE CASCADE CORPORATION

James L. Fox, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Emery W. Bartle and Mark B. Rotenberg, Esqs. (Dorsey & Whitney), of Minneapolis, Minnesota, for the Respondent.
William D. Watters, Esq., of Duluth, Minnesota, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

KARL H. BUSCHMANN, Administrative Law Judge. These consolidated cases were tried at International Falls, Minnesota, on 29 and 30 October 1985. The charges in Cases 18–CA–9290–1, –2, –3, –5, –6, –7, and –8 were filed on 15 July 1985; the charge in Case 18–CA–9290–9 was filed on 26 July 1985. The consolidated complaint was filed 29 August 1985. The primary issue is whether the Respondent, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, when it unilaterally implemented its final proposal which, in substance, did not include the preexisting bargaining unit descriptions, eliminated work assignment restrictions, modified the recognized bargaining unit classifications for maintenance jobs, and combined them into three broad categories.

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel, the Company, and the Union, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

The Company, Boise Cascade Corporation, is a Delaware corporation with an office and place of business in International Falls, Minnesota, where it is engaged in the manufacture of paper products. Boise Cascade Corporation, the Respondent, is admittedly, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. Since 1965, when Boise Cascade acquired the facility in International Falls, Minnesota, consisting of a paper mill and an insulite plant, it had separate collective-bargaining agreements with eight union locals, not counting the union for its railroad operation. They are: (1) Local 4–33, International Woodworkers of America, (2) Chauffeurs, Teamsters & Helpers Local 346, (3) Local 771, United Association of Journeymen & Apprentices of the Plumbing & Pipefitting Industry of the United States & Canada, (4) Local 731, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, (5) International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 760, (6) Local Union 159, United Paperworkers International Union, (7) Local No. 50, International Union of Operating Engineers, and (8) Local No. 49, United Paperworkers International Union.[1] These eight Unions that are also the Charging Parties in this case represent between 600 and 700 "maintenance" and "production" employees. The Unions had conducted their negotiations with the Employer by forming a "Joint Union Council" that was a committee of representatives of the eight Unions. The president of the Joint Union Council served as the spokesman during the bargaining sessions. According to established practice, the Joint Union Council and the Employer would agree to a "memorandum of agreement," which contained the provisions applicable to all Unions. Local issues were negotiated separately, and, on ratification of the memorandum of agreement and the resolution of local issues, each of the Unions would have a separate collective-bargaining agreement with the Respondent.

Negotiations for new contracts between Boise Cascade and the Unions commenced in 1984, since the parties' latest collective-bargaining agreements dated, 1 May 1981 and effective for 3 years, expired on 30 April 1984 (G.C. Exhs. 2(a)–(h)). These eight separate agreements had provided for a "Recognition" article that defined the collective-bargaining unit of employees that each of the Unions represented. Of particular importance were the unit description of the "maintenance" employees, because during the negotiations for new contracts, the Respondent expressed its goal to remove jurisdictional barriers for its maintenance employees and to "[i]ncrease employee working efficiency by removing any jurisdictional restraints" (G.C. Exh. 3). In an attempt to demonstrate to the Unions the obsolete nature of the jurisdictional restraints, Respondent compiled a listing of the 28 job descriptions for maintenance employees ranging from "blacksmith" to "Oiler" as they existed in the contracts (R. Exh. 10) and compared them to 19 job descriptions that were still in use in 1984. Moreover, the Company saw the division of labor as grossly inefficient and bargained for greater flexibility in work assignments of its maintenance workers to remain competitive in its markets. Boise Cascade listed numerous examples of what it considered inefficient work assignments accompanied by proposed changes and proposed that (1) "Simple routine maintenance . . . be performed by operators," (2) "maintenance employees perform simple routine tasks normally performed by operators," and (3) "any work connected with an employee's primary craft assignment [be made] non-jurisdictional" (G.C. Exh. 4).

[1] The first listed six Unions represent "maintenance" employees that were directly affected by Respondent's "maintenance modernization programs."

Unable to agree to these proposals, the parties negotiated a 1-year extension of the old contracts and agreed to discuss the issues during the interval. The parties met repeatedly beginning in August 1984. In December 1984, Boise-Cascade closed its insulite plant. However, the parties continued to meet and to discuss "contract modernization" for the remaining operation, the paper mill. The Company proposed 11 items believed "necessary to allow the paper Manufacturing Operation to continue in the face of the rapidly changing competitive environment" (G.C. Exh. 6). Item 3 of the 11 points stated: "Achieve employee work efficiency by removing any union/departmental jurisdictional restraints throughout the mill." This issue was the most difficult for the Union, and the parties remained unable to agree on a new contract.

The negotiations carried over into 1985. During 1985, there were 31 bargaining sessions, beginning 27 March and ending 24 June. The Company's initial proposal, intended for each of the eight Unions, was offered with the following explanation on its face (G.C. Exh. 9):

> The following is a draft Labor Agreement to replace existing Labor Agreements. Nothing proposed is meant to change the member Union's right to represent those job classifications they presently represent. We do mean to remove Union jurisdictions as an obstacle to employees performing work efficiently and economically . . . .

The Company's proposed unit description and recognition clause, in lieu of describing each of the eight units, as in the past, provided as follows:

> The Company recognizes one of the identified Unions as the sole collective bargaining agency for its employees on those occupations listed in the wage schedule attached as Exhibits A-1 through A-9 as a part of this Agreement for the purpose of collective bargaining with respect to wages, hours of work, and working conditions for the period of this agreement . . . .
> This Article—Recognition —shall not restrict the right of the Company to assign work to employees or limit the Company's use of contractors as the Company deems appropriate.

The Company proposed a union-security clause that, as a condition of employment, required an employee "to become and remain a member of one of the Union's party to this Agreement." The appropriate Union that an employee was expected to join, according to the proposal, was "the one whose occupation the employee works in the majority of time." No employee was expected to belong "to more than one union in any calendar month, but [he] may be required to transfer to the appropriate Union."

Respondent's proposal was in line with its stated 12 February 1985 "Overall Objectives" to totally modernize the work rules, remove all jurisdictional restraints, modify the wage and benefit structure, and reduce actual labor cost per ton. More specifically, these objectives were stated as follows (G.C. Exh. 17):

> MAINTENANCE REORGANIZATION
> All current trades and crafts will be consolidated into three maintenance categories:
> Pipefitter
> Millwright
> Electrical/Instrumentation
> * There will be no union craft or departmental jurisdictional restraints to work assignment whatsoever.
> * All maintenance employees will be placed in one of the three categories.
> * Employees will first be required to acquire all the basic skills necessary to assist in any job assignment.
> * Next, employees will be required to acquire all functional skills of the other two categories.
> * Finally, employees must become proficient in the highly-skilled areas of their primary category.
> * Extensive training, both classroom and on-the-job, will be necessary for at least two years.
> * Basic, functional and proficient skills and qualification parameters are to be determined unilaterally by management and are not arbitrable.

Respondent specifically included among the items to be modified item 17, "Union Recognition Jurisdiction."

Negotiations between the parties indicated a preoccupation with Respondent's proposal to change the jurisdictional restraints for its maintenance employees and to reorganize the 28 existing job categories for maintenance employees into the 3 broad categories: pipefitters, millwrights, and electrical/instrumentation. A perusal of the transcripts of the bargaining sessions indicates that Respondent's chief negotiator, Fred Delaney, repeatedly expressed the notion that the Company intended to erase jurisdiction to get work done or to get around the jurisdictional issue to achieve greater efficiency. Although the Unions were expected to retain the same number of employees by proportionally sharing the maintenance employees in the three categories, the Employer would be able to assign the employees without restrictions to their union affiliation (Jt. Exhs. 1–24).

The union negotiator, Robert Walls, resisted Respondent's proposal as it related to Respondent's attempt to modify the Unions' respective jurisdictions and questioned not only the practical impossibility of the scheme but also its legality. For example, at one point during the discussions, on 4 April 1985, the following exchange occurred (Jt. Exh. 3, p. 5):

> Union: This whole thing is then to get us to cross over jurisdiction!
> Company: Absolutely. We have said that from day one. The jurisdiction is in-efficient. And we want to correct that.

At another point during the discussions on that day, the Unions stated the issue as follows (Jt. Exh. 3(b)):

> What, I guess what gives you the right to come in here and say that you're going to take jurisdiction away from one union and give it to the other union, or whatever? . . . I believe there is some laws that protect us in our jurisdiction and I'm sure every international is going to fight your jurisdiction . . .

The Company's negotiator Delaney replied:

> Well, first of all, we're not talking about jurisdiction for one and giving it to another. What we are talking about is sharing jurisdiction.

On 29 April, after lengthy discussions had already occurred, the exchange continues to show that the predominant issue was the Company's proposal to modify the Unions' jurisdiction. At one point the Unions' representative commented (Jt. Exh. 8b, pp. 1–2):

> Union: It just seems to me it's on the fringes of legal question and it's a jurisdictional.
> Delaney: I'm sure it is, and depending on which lawyer depends on maybe which answer you get, I don't know.

On 22 May, Delaney conceded that removing all the rights of jurisdiction previously held by the Unions was the central issue (Jt. Exh. 18(a), p. 1).

In one of the last sessions, Delaney has this to say (Jt. Exh. 22b, p. 1):

> We knew we cannot erode the maintenance unit. That is still a protection. We don't see anything in the agreement that would cause that. If we were to try to get that right, it would have to be directly stated to you very clear, unambiguous. We haven't done that so we know that there's protection there against erosion of the unit. In the recognition, there's no way that we see that we could use your recognition, your jurisdiction language and do what we want to do and that is a firm and final position of ours. We have to have the right to think, to get this work done effectively and efficiently. We will continue to present to you the proportion because we think that preserves the unit and we aren't trying to get rid of units. We aren't trying to reduce them.

On 28 May 1985 the Company distributed its final "settlement memorandum" to the Unions. It was Respondent's final offer (G.C. Exh. 10). The parties held their last meeting on 24 June, when the Company stated that there was no need for further meetings, because the parties had reached an impasse. By letter of 25 June 1985, Respondent informed the Unions, inter alia, as follows (G.C. Exh. 12):

> Over three weeks have passed since our Company made its final contract proposal to your Union. This final proposal was preceded by 36 negotiating meetings and contract modernization meetings with your Union since our initial discussions during the 1984 negotiations of the areas which needed to be addressed for a modern labor contract. Yesterday we met again with your Union representatives and a Federal Mediator. A counter-proposal was presented by the Unions. The terms of this counter-proposal and our final proposal are far apart. Our final contract offer has not been accepted, and the spokesman for your Joint Union Council stated that it contains features which are completely unacceptable.
> We clearly are at an impasse in these contract negotiations. Given the impasse which now exists in these contract talks, the period of negotiations has expired for purposes of ending any prior contract commitments with your Union.
> We hereby notify you that effective July 1, 1985, the Company will be implementing the terms and conditions of employment reflected in the Company's final contract proposal dated May 24, 1985, including the five pages of modifications/Addendums thereto dated May 31, 1985, and June 3, 1985.

On 1 July 1985 Boise Cascade implemented the final proposal that regrouped and reclassified its more than 203 maintenance employees as demonstrated by the following chart (G.C. Exh. 14):

The proposal, as implemented, omitted the unit description that was formerly contained in collective-bargaining agreements for each of the Unions. Instead, Respondent's present description of the units is simply a statement under "Recognition" (art. II):

> The Company recognizes one of those identified Unions as the sole collective bargaining agency for its employees on those occupations listed in the wage schedules attached as Exhibits A-1 through A-9 . . . .

Exhibits A-1 through A-9 consist of detailed tables of wage rates and seniority lists for the eight Unions. Also shown are the classifications of individual employees as well as the percentage of the employees' membership in the respective Unions. The job classifications contained in the prior agreement for maintenance jobs have been substituted by the three broad categories.

On 3 June 1985, the Company added page A-9 to its final proposal. This proviso was drafted by Respondent's counsel and states:

> While this modernized Labor Agreement modifies and redefines substantially various job classifications and attendant duties thereto and removes previous contractual work assignment restrictions, the bargaining units described in paragraphs .1 and .2 above are the same at the time of execution of this Agreement as those represented by the identified Unions in previous Labor Agreements.
> Any unresolved disputes as to which bargaining unit a particular job classification belongs will be resolved through the National Labor Relations Board processes.

On its face, the addendum seemed to continue the expired unit descriptions, but the record shows otherwise. Respondent's negotiator, William Smerika, unequivocally stated that the Unions proposed and the Company rejected the proposal to retain the unit descriptions (Tr. 354). Similarly, Company Chief Spokesman Delaney clearly testified that the recognition clauses of the expired contracts were not carried forward in the final proposal that the Respondent had adopted unilaterally (Tr. 255–256). Moreover, a retention of the unit and recognition descriptions of the expired contracts would have prevented the flexibility and assignment changes that the Company had sought. This is clear from an analysis of the proposals as well as Respondent's own testimony.

Respondent's testimony about the negotiations and the implementation of its proposal clearly established that the Respondent considered the modification of the recognition clause as crucial to its efforts to increase the flexibility and to improve the efficiency of its maintenance employees. The testimony further shows that the Unions had proposed the continuation of the unit descriptions as they existed in the expired bargaining agreements. The Respondent refused to accept the Unions' proposal and declared an impasse on the issue (Tr. 268–270, 354). As explained by Delaney, the Company's negotiator in his testimony (Tr. 269): "Well, we wanted to change the definition of the trades or occupations, classifications, whatever, to reflect the broader skills that were needed by the employees." In order to accomplish that, Delaney admitted, that the recognition clauses of the old contracts had to be changed.

Analysis

Generally, changes in work assignments are considered to be a mandatory subject of bargaining; however, the definition of a bargaining unit is not. Although a unit may be altered by agreement of the parties, one party may not insist to the point of impasse to change the scope of the bargaining unit. Bozzuto's, Inc., 277 NLRB 977 (1985); Douds v. Longshoremen, 241 F.2d 278 (2d Cir. 1957); Young & Hay Transportation Co., 214 NLRB 252 (1974), enfd. sub nom. General Drivers Local 554 v. NLRB, 522 F.2d 562 (8th Cir. 1975).

The General Counsel has taken the position that Respondent refused to incorporate the Unions' prior unit descriptions in a new collective-bargaining agreement in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Moreover, Respondent unlawfully insisted to impasse on, and unilaterally implemented, a nonmandatory subject of bargaining, namely, the proposal to reclassify maintenance employees into three broad categories. The General Counsel submits that Respondent's "recognition" proposal could not be interpreted as preserving the Unions' prior unit descriptions, and that a proper interpretation of the proposal and its practical effects as well as the testimony clearly indicate that the changes were not merely semantic or solely directed at assignment changes.

The Unions' brief illustrates how the unit description in the unilaterally implemented proposal differ in practical effects with the units of the expired contracts. The Unions' brief points out, as an example, that the modified unit description of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers consists of 22 percent of the employees in the new classification "General Mechanic—Electrical Instruments." As a consequence, the Union is no longer the exclusive bargaining representative for a described group, but the bargaining representative of some, but not all, the employees in that classification. This example is also illustrative for all other Unions that represent members who are in one of the three new categories for maintenance employees.

The Respondent, on the other hand, argues that its "Maintenance Modernization Proposal" was directed at revising only the anachronistic work assignment limitations and job categories and not the scope of any bargaining units. The Respondent argues in its brief that "the Company repeatedly emphasized [during the negotiations] that its proposed changes in 'jurisdiction' meant only that the restrictions giving particular unions (jurisdiction) over particular work would be abolished in the interest of greater efficiency" and that "[e]ach union would continue to represent or have 'jurisdiction' over, precisely the same employees as it had under the old contracts" (R. Br. 21). Respondent points to Delaney's testimony where he explained (Tr. 259), "we meant to maintain the recognition of the employees that—or numbers of employees, or presence of the unions that they had formerly represented, while at the same time removing—used in the context of work assignment—jurisdictional restraints, or work assignment restraints, to those employees performing work within their capabilities." Accordingly, so argues the Respondent, Boise Cascade had the right to insist to the point of impasse to make the changes in the work assignments for its maintenance employees.

There is no dispute between the parties that the Respondent unilaterally implemented its final offer, effective 1 July 1985, after notifying the Unions that the parties were at an impasse. The significance of Respondent's actions requires an examination of Respondent's final offer in relation to the prior contracts and an analysis of the effects of Respondent's "maintenance modernization program."

Initially, the inquiry is simply whether the collective-bargaining units contained in the expired agreements of the eight Unions were retained in the final offer. As already stated, Respondent has consistently refused to incorporate the unit descriptions of the prior contracts in its final offer and a comparison between the prior contracts and the final offer obviously shows that the unit descriptions are different.

Any suggestion that the proviso subsequently added by Respondent's counsel to the final offer on 3 June 1985 had the effect of incorporating the unit descriptions by reference is not persuasive. First, the unit description was not simply omitted due to an oversight or because of semantic reasons; neither is there any evidence that the proviso was an attempt to simplify the wording of the unit descriptions in the expired contracts. To the contrary, the record shows that the Respondent intentionally and unequivocally refused the Unions' demands to incorporate the prior unit descriptions. Indeed the proviso was not a part of Respondent's final offer. Because the Unions had a right to have their unit descriptions continued in any new agreement, and because Respondent refused the Unions' demands, Respondent's conduct amounted to a refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. Moreover, the Respondent insisted to the point of impasse and unilaterally implemented its final offer without the established unit descriptions but with different descriptions. "[T]he description or size of the bargaining unit is not a mandatory subject . . . it is equally well established that insistence to impasse upon a non-mandatory subject of bargaining violates Section 8(a)(5)." Newspaper Printing Corp. v. NLRB, 625 F.2d 956 (10th Cir. 1980), cert. denied 450 U.S. 911 (1981). "Unit scope is not a mandatory bargaining subject, and consequently a party may not insist to impasse an alteration of the unit. Bozzuto's, Inc., 277 NLRB 977 (1985); Douds v. Longshoremen, 241 F.2d 278 (2d Cir. 1957). Columbia Tribune Publishing Co., 201 NLRB 538 (1973), enfd. 495 F.2d 1384 (8th Cir. 1974); Newport News Shipbuilding v. NLRB, 602 F.2d 73 (4th Cir. 1979).

An examination of the new unit description of Respondent's final offer shows that it did not perpetuate the established units of the various Unions. For example, the Respondent argues that "the Company's proposal was neither intended to cause, nor did it result in, any modification of the scope of any bargaining unit" (R. Br. 26). The maintenance modernization proposal, according to the Respondent, consisted of the following: "Abolish the multitude of narrow, obsolete job categories and the work assignment restrictions . . . and create three broad maintenance classifications . . . of maintenance employees of the mill." Respondent, however, conceded that "some revisions would be necessary in the terms of each of the contracts' recognition and jurisdiction clauses if the Company were to achieve its objective." Respondent further argues "that the Company suggested a proportional representation guarantee . . . the unions, however, failed to offer any counter-proposal . . . that would satisfy the Company's basic maintenance modernization needs . . . . Instead the unions' final proposal demanded retention of the exact language contained in all previous recognition, jurisdiction and work restriction clauses." In sum, so argues the Respondent, "the Company's maintenance modernization proposal in no way constituted a proposal to modify the scope of any bargaining unit . . . each of the five maintenance unions continued as the exclusive representative of those same employees it had represented prior to July, 1985."

The General Counsel and the Unions disagree. Their position is that the revised jurisdictional and unit descriptions were not semantic changes, but changes that deprived each of the Unions of exclusive representation rights and that transformed established units "into overlapping bargaining units with more than one union representing employees in the same job classification." According to the Unions, the "Employer did not limit its negotiation objectives to bargaining only on the assignment of work tasks"; the Unions were willing to negotiate the issues relating to the assignments of work tasks and the training for broader skills, but they were unwilling to accept any modification in the composition and description of the recognized and certified bargaining units, including the concept of shared jurisdiction and the loss of exclusive representation. Indeed, Respondent's version of the proportionate representation or shared jurisdiction by the Unions is, according to the Charging Party and the General Counsel, a unit inappropriate for certification by the Board, because the Employer, and not the employee, may dictate union affiliation and because of the absence of exclusive representation by the Unions.

The record is clear that Respondent's final offer indeed did not preserve the composition of the prior units, and that Respondent's maintenance modernization program was not limited to jurisdictional clauses relating to work assignments, as contended by the Respondent. The unit descriptions as unilaterally implemented differ from the established units not only in description but also in composition. By definition, each Union now represents some or a percentage of employees, but not all employees in one of the three maintenance categories. The consequences are shared or overlapping jurisdiction and a loss of exclusive representation. In addition, Boise Cascade had the right to assign maintenance employees to one of the three classifications. In certain instances, this would interfere with an employee's right to select his bargaining representative and would empower the Company to determine an employee's union affiliation. Respondent's new version of unit descriptions would therefore have the effect of interfering with an employee's Section 7 rights and be contrary to Section 9(a) of the Act. Such a unit would be inappropriate for certification by the Board.

Respondent's contentions that the Unions could have bargained for another approach to the shared jurisdiction or proportionate jurisdiction concept, and that the Company could lawfully bargain to impasse on new work assignment clauses may at first blush appear significant. However, the record is clear that the Respondent's recognition proposal lead to the impasse. The Unions would have been willing to bargain on the broad issues relating to work assignments and training if they had been assured that their exclusive jurisdictions were to remain intact without the qualifying factors of shared jurisdiction or any other forms of modified unit descriptions. For the record shows that Respondent insisted during the negotiations on retaining its right to assign the maintenance employees to one of the three maintenance classifications, and further insisted on the revision of the Unions' respective recognition clauses. For the Respondent to suggest repeatedly that each Union would continue to represent "precisely the same employees as it had under the old contracts" and that each Union would continue "as the exclusive representative of the same employees" and further that the Company had not insisted "that the relationship of any particular employees with their chosen union be served or altered" ignores the possibilities of future changes in the functions or the number of employees in one of the three categories. For example, should certain employees assigned to one of the three classifications and belonging to a particular union leave their employment or be laid off, it would change the proportional position of one or more Unions and require the Company to assign other employees to that Union to maintain the proportional balance.

Respondent's efforts to achieve efficiency and flexibility in its new contract could perhaps have been achieved had the Respondent directed its efforts solely at work assignment issues or work flexibility without the simultaneous attempt to redefine the established bargaining units. Respondent could certainly have proceeded by initiating a petition for unit clarification under Section 102.60(b) of the Board's Rules and Regulations. But the Respondent did not exhaust these remedies and, instead, took an inflexible approach from the outset of the negotiations by its intentions to modify the composition and the scope of the Unions' bargaining units and to implement its recognition proposal. It has no right to insist to impasse on the alteration in the bargaining units. Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Respondent's motion. Because the Respondent proceeded with its negotiations with all Unions, not just those representing maintenance employees, Respondent's motion to exempt the three Unions is without merit.

During the trial of this case, the Respondent moved to dismiss those portions of the complaint that related to the production units, as opposed to the maintenance units, because the recognition proposal affected only the maintenance employees and because the General Counsel had failed to sustain the allegations with regard to the production units. The General Counsel argues that the Respondent, contrary to past practice, negotiated with the representatives of all Unions in an effort to arrive at a "master contract" or a single agreement to be applicable to all Unions. The Respondent, on the other hand, argues that the individual Unions were free to make changes in the memorandum of agreement and "that the three non-maintenance unions, UPIU Local #159, UPIU Local #49 and Operating Engineers Local #50, were free to sign an agreement without agreeing to the Company's maintenance modernization proposal."

Obviously, it would be reasonable to assume that the Respondent would exclude those units that would be uneffected by the maintenance proposal. But the question is whether the record supports Respondent's intentions in this regard. To be sure, past practice indicates that the individual Unions were able to agree to certain provisos that had not been part of the memorandum of agreement negotiated by the Joint Union Council. However, the record indicates that the provisions would be related to local issues. Here, the Company presented a single memorandum of agreement listing all nine Unions and occasionally referred to it as a master contract. Obviously, it must have occurred to the Respondent before, prior to the hearing in this case, that at least three of the Unions would be unaffected by its maintenance modernization proposal that was the key stumbling block in arriving at an agreement. The suggestion to exempt the unaffected Unions could have been made to those units during any stage of the negotiations. It might have lead to a bargaining agreement with those Unions. It is difficult to conclude at this stage of the proceeding that the Respondent had intended to exempt these three Unions when their representatives were part of the Joint Union Council and in regular attendance at the negotiations. There is simply no evidence that these Unions were exempt from the consideration of the much debated jurisdiction issues. Delaney's testimony that these Unions could have signed a separate agreement does not show that the Respondent or the Unions ever considered that possibility. In any case, according to the terms of the implemented final offer, the Respondent has the right to assign its production employees to perform maintenance work and to assign production employees to the three maintenance categories on a permament basis. In that eventuality, it is perfectly clear the production units as well as the production employees were significantly affected by Respondent's maintenance modernization proposal. In sum, the evidence shows that the nonmaintenance units were affected, albeit on a lesser scale, and that they were not explicitly exempted from the negotiations. Respondent's motion should therefore be denied.

best copy available

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Boise Cascade Corporation is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The following Unions are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act: (a) Local Union 159, United Paperworkers International Union; (b) Local 771, United Association of Journeymen & Apprentices of the Plumbing & Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada; (c) Local 4–33, International Woodworkers of America; (d) Local No. 50, International Union of Operating Engineers; (e) Chauffeurs, Teamsters & Helpers Local 346; (f) Local No. 731, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; (g) Local No. 49 United Paperworkers International Union; and (h) International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 760.

3. The following employees of Respondent constitute appropriate units for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> (a) All employees employed by Respondent at its International Falls, Minnesota facility, in the unit described in the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Local Union 159, United Paperworkers International Union, for the period from 1 May 1981 through 30 April 1984.

Their exclusive collective-bargaining representative is Local 159, United Paperworkers International Union.

> (b) All full-time and regular part-time employees engaged in welding and in the installation and maintenance of all piping and plumbing equipment at Respondent's International Falls, Minnesota facility; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees; manager, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.

Local 771, United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry of the United States and Canada has been designated as their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

> (c) All employees employed by Respondent at its International Falls, Minnesota facility, in the unit described in the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Local 4–33, International Woodworkers of America, for ther period from 1 May 1981 through 30 April 1984.

Their exclusive collective-bargaining representative is Local 4–33, International Woodworkers of America.

> (d) All full and regular part-time employees engaged in the operation of the old and new turbine rooms, oxygen plant and filter plant, including air compressors located in the turbine room and demineralizers located in the filter plant (and such repairs to this equipment which are customarily made) and engaged in the operation of any new electrical generating steam turbines similar in nature to existing equipment in the turbine room; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, manager, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.

Local No. 50, International Union of Operating Engineers is their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

> (e) All employees employed by Respondent at its International Falls, Minnesota facility, in the unit described in the collective bargaining agreement between Respondent and Chauffeurs, Teamsters & Helpers Local 346, for the period from 1 May 1981 through 30 April 1984.

Chauffeurs, Teamsters & Helpers Local 346 has been designated as their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

> (f) All full and regular part-time employees engaged in the installation and maintenance of electrical (including electronic, refrigerating, radio, high frequency, radioactive radiation and television) equipment, and pump house and power house operators; excluding all other employees, office clerical employees, managers, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act, as amended.

Local No. 731, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has been designated their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

> (g) All employees employed by Respondent at its International Falls, Minnesota facility, in the unit described in the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and Local No. 49, United Paperworkers International Union, for the period from 1 May 1981 through 30 April 1984.

Local No. 49, United Paperworkers International Union has been designated their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

(h) All employees employed by Respondent at its International Falls, Minnesota facility, in the unit described in the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 760, for the period from 1 May 1981 through 30 April 1984.

International Association of Machinists, Lodge No. 760 has been designated their exclusive collective-bargaining representative.

4. The Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by (a) refusing to incorporate the prior recognized unit descriptions for the eight Unions at its facility in a new agreement and (b) by insisting to impasse on, and by unilaterally implementing, a nonmandatory subject of bargaining in the form of a proposal that modified the bargaining units and the jurisdictions of the eight Unions.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in certain unfair labor practices. I shall order that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Specifically, I shall order that, on request, the Respondent meet and bargain collectively with the Unions with respect to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment. I further order that the Respondent rescind, if requested by the Unions, the unilateral implementation of its final offer and that the Respondent restore the status quo of its employees that were affected by its unilateral action, including backpay.

If the Unions select to have previous conditions restored, calculations of the sums and payments necessary to make employees whole, with interest, shall be computed in accordance with normal Board policy. DECISION ON REVIEW AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, a hearing was held before Hearing Officer Leonard Grumbach of the National Labor Relations Board. On 12 June 1986 the Regional Director for Region 2 issued a Decision and Direction of Election in which he found, inter alia, that a group of laboratory technologists were not professional employees and thus could not vote with other professional employees in a decertification election.

Thereafter, in accordance with Section 102.67 of the National Labor Relations Board Rules and Regulations, the Union filed a request for review of the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election. The Union contended, inter alia, that the Regional Director erred (1) in finding that the laboratory technologists were not professional employees, thereby barring them from voting with the rest of the professional employees in the decertification election; (2) by finding that the technologists did not exercise discretion in their work; and (3) by placing too much significance on the Employer's assertion that a college degree is not required.

By Order dated 24 July 1986, the Board granted the Union's request for review in Case 2–RD–1147 and stayed the election pending review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case with respect to the issues under review and makes the following findings.

The Employer, St. Barnabas, operates a 415-bed acute care hospital in New York, New York. It employees approximately 1150 full-time and regular part-time employees. Local 1199 currently represents a unit consisting of approximately 561 professional and nonprofessional employees.

The Regional Director directed an election for all professional employees in the mixed unit.[1] The parties' only disagreement and the only issue before the Board is whether laboratory technologists I and II are professional employees. The Employer and the Petitioner argue that the 26 technologists are not professionals. The Union, however, contends that they are professionals within the meaning of Section 2(12) of the Act and should therefore be permitted to vote in the decertification election.

The Regional Director, relying on Middlesex General Hospital, 239 NLRB 837 (1978), found that the technologists were not professionals because their duties are not intellectual and varied and a college degree is not required. He determined that their analyses of test results are technical rather than medical and that any discretion they have is circumscribed by established procedures. We disagree.

Our review of the record reveals that the technologists[2] are assigned to four laboratory sections: hematology, chemistry, blood bank, and microbiology. Each technologist has a license in one of these specific areas and, unless the technologist has more than one license, there is very little interchange between the sections.

At the hearing the Employer presented a two-page job description for laboratory technologists. According to this document, a technologist must be licensed by the New York City Board of Health,[3] have attended 3 years of college with courses relevant to medical technology, and have at least 3 years' medical laboratory experience. The Employer characterized these requirements as "optimal" and that it actually only requires technologists to have a New York City license. However, 20 of the 26 technologists do have college degrees, 6 have master of arts degrees, and one has a doctorate.

Technologists perform various tests on patient specimens such as blood, urine, stool, sputum, and other body fluids and tissues. Generally the tests are done on complex machinery, although some may be done by hand. If the tests are done on the machines, the technologist must first calibrate the machine. Calibration is done by testing a control specimen with known values. If the machine does not report the values correctly, the technologist must determine why it did not and then make the proper corrections.

[1] The parties stipulated that the pharmacists, dieticians, social workers-MSW's, an occupational therapist, and an activity therapist are professional employees within the meaning of Sec. 2(12) of the Act.

[2] The designations "I" and "II" refer only to the technologist's tenure with St. Barnabas and do not reflect any difference in job duties or responsibilities.

[3] To obtain a technologist's license, New York City's Board of Health requires: (1) a B.S. or B.A. degree with a major in biology, chemistry, or physical science and 1 year of laboratory experience, or (2) registry with a national professional society, or (3) passing an exam, if one holds a high school diploma, and 4 years' experience or 2 years of college and 2 years' experience or a college degree and 6 months' experience, or (4) a waiver.

The technologist must also prepare the specimen before testing. Among other things, the technologists visually examine the specimen and determine if it is usable. If they determine it is inadequate, they will call the doctor or the floor nurse and request another specimen. If the specimen is usable the technologists place it in the machine and start the machine. The machine will test the specimen and print out the results. The technologists read and analyze the printout and decide if the results should be accepted. If the results are outside the test range, the technologists must determine the reason. In making such a decision the technologists may consider the patient's condition, including any drugs the patient may be taking. If they determine that the problem is specimen related, they must choose which option to take to get acceptable results. The technologists may rerun the test with a diluted specimen, request a new specimen, or perhaps do the test manually. Although there are published guidelines, technologists generally rely on their own experience in making judgments when performing the various tests. Once the technologists obtain the results, they will call the doctor or floor nurse and report their findings. They also prepare a written report of their findings.

The technologists' duties are not limited to running tests. Technologists maintain and repair the complex machines they operate. They also supervise the work of less senior technologists, technicians, and trainees, while they themselves generally work with little or no supervision.

The Board has previously found technologists with virtually identical duties to be professional employees. Thus, in Barnert Memorial Hospital Center, 217 NLRB 775 (1975), technologists ran various tests on patient specimens using sophisticated machinery and prepared reports on the results. They also instructed students and repaired the laboratory equipment. Although there were, as here, procedural manuals, the Board found that the technologists relied heavily on their own judgment in analyzing the results. In finding professional status, the Board also relied on evidence that the technologists alone were responsible for the outcome of their work, gave instruction to students in their specialization, and used and repaired complicated laboratory equipment. Similar results on similar facts have been reached in a number of other cases.[4]

Despite the presence of all the above factors in the instant case, the Regional Director determined that the technologists were not professional employees. In so doing, he relied on Middlesex General Hospital, supra, where the Board concluded that technologists with duties similar to those in the instant case were not professional employees. The Regional Director pointed to the Board's statement in Middlesex that that case was distinguishable from Barnert and others, finding professional status because of the absence of the requirement for a college degree as a prerequisite for continued employment.[5] Noting that a college degree was not required here, he concluded that Middlesex controlled. We disagree with this analysis.

As stated, the vast majority of factors relied on by the Board to find professional status in Barnert and similar cases are present here. The St. Barnabas technologists in examining specimens, calibrating and repairing the machinery, analyzing results, and performing tests manually, constantly exercise discretion and independent judgment. Their duties are predominately intellectual and varied and their output cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time. In these circumstances, we do not find the absence of a requirement for a college degree is so significant to warrant a finding that the technologists are not professional. We note in Middlesex the Board stressed that less than half the technologists had degrees. The Board specifically concluded that Mason Clinic, supra at fn. 4, which found professional status, was in accord with the result in Middlesex becaue in Mason Clinic only 2 of 54 medical technologists did not possess degrees.[6] We find that the instant case is closer to Mason Clinic than to Middlesex. Here 20 of the 26 technologists have college degrees. Of these 20, 7 hold graduate degrees. It is, therefore, clear that the possession of a college degree is highly valued, if not absolutely required. Accordingly, considering all factors in this case, we conclude that the technologists are professional employees.

Conclusion

Accordingly, on the entire record and for the aforementioned reason, we shall direct an election among the following professional employees currently represented by the Union in the mixed unit to ascertain the desires of the professional employees concerning their inclusion in a unit with nonprofessional employees:

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 20 December 1985 the Regional Director for Region 7 issued the attached Decision and Direction of Election in this proceeding, in which he found appropriate for collective bargaining the Petitioner's requested unit of engineering department employees. In accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Employer filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's decision, contending that the only appropriate unit was an overall unit of all hotel employees. By mailgram dated 15 January 1986 the Board granted the Employer's request for review. The Employer's request for a stay of the election was denied; accordingly, the election was conducted as scheduled on 16 January 1986 and the ballots were impounded pending the Board's decision on review.

The Board has considered the entire record in this case and concludes, for the reasons stated by the Regional Director in his decision, that the petitioned-for unit of engineering department employees is an appropriate unit for bargaining. In so concluding, we specifically find that the record contains no compelling facts which would mandate a finding that the smallest appropriate unit must include all employees of the hotel.

It is beyond peradventure that the Act allows a union to petition for an appropriate unit, and does not require it to seek the most appropriate unit, even when a different unit than that petitioned-for might be more appropriate than the one it seeks. In the hotel and motel industry, the Board at one time applied a rigid rule that only an overall unit consisting of all hotel/motel employees would be found appropriate for bargaining. See Arlington Hotel Co., 126 NLRB 400 (1960). Six years after deciding Arlington, the Board reversed that decision, finding that the inflexible rule of that case was based on the false premise that all employees in the various facilities of hotels and motels shared such a high degree of integration of function and mutuality of interests that only an overall unit could be appropriate, and announced that henceforth it would consider each case on its facts. 77 Operating Co., 160 NLRB 927 (1966), enfd. 387 F.2d 646 (4th Cir. 1967). Since that decision, the Board has made unit determinations in the hotel/motel industry on a case-by-case basis, utilizing the same traditional community-of-interest criteria used in other industries. Westin Hotel, 277 NLRB 1506 (1986); Atlanta Hilton & Towers, 273 NLRB 87, 90 (1984); Sheraton Motor Inn, 210 NLRB 790 (1974); Regency Hyatt House, 171 NLRB 1347 (1968).

In the instant case, the dissent represents essentially a desire to return to the rigid rule of Arlington which, as indicated above, is not required by the statute. Here, the engineering department employees are separately supervised by the chief engineer, who interviews all engineering department applicants and makes the final hiring decisions for his department;[1] they employ skills unique to their classification, as indicated by the fact that the Employer requires them to have a minimum of 1 year of prior experience in their classification (the painter/carpenter is required to have 3 years); and they earn the highest hourly wage among the hotel's nonsupervisory employees (at least $1 per hour more than the next highest rate).[2] In addition, there have been no instances of transfer of employees into or out of the engineering department, whether on a permanent or temporary basis. Although the dissent correctly notes that on several occasions engineering department employees have assisted employees from other departments with various tasks such as construction of shelving and construction of a kitchen bulletin board, the record reveals that these incidents are sporadic and do not reflect an actual overlap of job functions, but are more in the nature of showing a spirit of cooperation or civility (such as a cook having handed an engineering department employee a shelf to be installed in the kitchen).[3]

[1] Our dissenting colleagues concede the existence of separate immediate supervision, but point to the existence of common procedures for interviewing and hiring new employees. To the extent that our colleagues may suggest that hiring procedures are of equal weight with the identity of day-to-day supervision, we believe they have lost sight of the question before us—determining employees' community of interest as to the terms and conditions of their employment. Surely the fact that the engineering department employees work under the direction of, and would likely address their immediate grievances to, someone different from those under whom other employees immediately work has greater bearing on collective-bargaining interests than the procedures by which the employees were interviewed for entry into the work force in the first place.

[2] Our dissenting colleagues seek to minimize the significance of the wage disparity by pointing to the fact that some of the employees outside the engineering department have their wages supplemented by tips from guests. If anything, however, this differentiating factor provides additional support for our conclusion that the engineering department employees have a separate community of interest. In making this observation, we do not, contrary to our colleagues' implication, intend to make this factor determinative.

[3] Chairman Dotson suggests that our resolution of this issue should turn, among other things, on the potential "vulnerability" of the majority of the hotel's employees to a work stoppage by the petitioned-for unit. We are aware of no authority outside of the health care industry to support this novel view.

The remaining facts cited in the dissent, such as that all employees receive the same fringe benefits, punch the same timeclock, and share common overall supervision, in our opinion fail to establish that the requested unit is not an appropriate unit for bargaining—though such facts undoubtedly would show that an overall unit, if sought, also would be an appropriate unit. Further, in view of the above evidence supporting the petitioned-for unit, we reject the Chairman's contention in the dissent that the extent of organization is the "only logical explanation" for the result reached herein.

Westin Hotel, cited in the dissent, is distinguishable. That case, which was before the Board on remand from the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit,[4] involved circumstances which substantially differed from those of the instant case. Although both cases involve petitioned-for units of hotel maintenance and engineering employees otherwise similar to the engineering department unit found appropriate in Sheraton-Anaheim Hotel, 252 NLRB 959 (1980), the Board in Westin concluded that the unit sought was not appropriate because, unlike Sheraton-Anaheim, the prevailing areawide pattern of bargaining favored overall hotel units and a competing labor organization was seeking to represent an overall unit of hotel employees, including the petitioned-for maintenance workers. Neither of these factors is present in the instant case; indeed, the Regional Director specifically found, and the Employer does not dispute, that there are separate engineering department bargaining units at "virtually all" major Detroit metropolitan area hotels.

Based on all the foregoing, we conclude, in agreement with the Regional Director, that the petitioned-for unit of engineering department employees is an appropriate unit for bargaining. Accordingly, the Regional Director's Decision and Direction of Election is affirmed, and the case is remanded to the Regional Director for further appropriate action, including the opening and counting of the impounded ballots.

ORDER

This proceeding is remanded to the Regional Director for further appropriate action.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBER JOHANSEN, dissenting.

Contrary to our colleagues, we would find that the petitioned-for unit of maintenance employees does not constitute a separate appropriate bargaining unit, and we would dismiss the petition. The Employer operates a luxury hotel in Detroit, Michigan. The Union requested, and the Regional Director found appropriate, a unit limited to the maintenance employees at the hotel. The Employer requested review of this finding, contending that the only appropriate unit would include all the hotel employees. We agree with the Employer.

All the hotel employees are paid on an hourly basis, enjoy the same fringe benefits, use the same employee entrance, punch the same timeclock, are required to wear uniforms, share common cafeteria facilities, and are subject to the same work rules and personnel policies. Although the maintenance employees have separate immediate supervision, they are jointly supervised at a higher level with employees in six other job classifications by Denise Barker, rooms division head and resident manager. Management for the entire hotel is centralized in General Manager Andrew Swinney, who has the final authority over all personnel matters.

In addition, there is frequent day-to-day contact between maintenance employees and employees in other departments. Maintenance employees spend a significant amount of their time in areas of the hotel where other employees work. They usually receive their work orders from employees in housekeeping or at the front desk, and have assisted nonmaintenance employees in performing their job duties on several occasions. This is particularly true during occasions such as the hotel's opening, when the distinctions between job classifications all but disappear. Significantly, there are at least six more of these functions planned throughout the next year.

Further, it is clear that these employees do not constitute a craft unit. No engineering or craft license is required of them by the Employer, and no maintenance employee currently holds one. Although the Employer does require at least 1 year's prior maintenance experience for general maintenance employees and 3 years' prior experience for the carpenter/painter position, there are at least five other job classifications at the hotel which also require prior experience.

In reaching the conclusion that the petitioned-for unit is appropriate, the majority notes that the maintenance employees are separately supervised by the chief engineer, who interviews and hires new employees. The majority neglects to mention, however, that the interviewing and hiring procedures are the same for each department at the hotel. As mentioned above, although the maintenance employees have separate immediate supervision, they share higher supervision with six other departments, and authority for personnel matters affecting all employees rests with the general manager.

The majority also relies on the fact that maintenance employees possess unique job skills, as evidenced by the requirement that they have prior job-related experience when hired and that they are paid the highest hourly wage. We note, however, that several other job classifications require prior experience, including those of the seamstress/tailor, fitness center attendant, servers, cooks, and cash manager. In addition, although maintenance employees receive the highest hourly wage, they are not necessarily the highest paid job classification because they do not receive tips from guests, as do employees in some other classifications. With respect to the majority's reliance on the lack of transfers or overlap of job functions between departments, we note that the record is replete with evidence of the constant contact among the employees and the assistance rendered by one classification to another whenever necessary. We further note that all employees, including those in the maintenance department, are specifically instructed to perform whatever tasks are necessary to accommodate the guests, even if those tasks are outside their job descriptions.

The majority avers that we have lost sight of our task of determining the extent of the employees' community of interest by equating hiring procedures with the identity of day-to-day supervision. Nowhere in our dissent have we made such a statement. Clearly, separate immediate supervision is an element that tends to support distinct bargaining units, just as a common hiring procedure, common overall supervision, and common labor relations policies support a finding of a single appropriate unit. None of these factors exist in a vacuum, however, and each must be evaluated in the context of all the relevant facts. Rather that attempting to equate one factor with any other factor, or identifying one fact as the decisive element in the case, we have weighed all the evidence which establishes a significant community of interest among the employees against all the evidence which supports a finding of separate units. On balance, we have determined that a single unit is appropriate.

Our colleagues also dispute the significance of our reliance on the fact that the maintenance employees are not necessarily the highest paid employees in the hotel because certain of the other employees receive tips from the hotel guests. The majority asserts that this is actually evidence of a disparity of interest. What our colleagues fail to realize is that the maintenance employees' receipt of the highest hourly wage is not particularly significant when other employees in the hotel are also paid in a manner which differs from their fellow employees. Not all nonmaintenance employees receive tips, just as not all are paid the same hourly wage. Surely the majority does not mean to suggest that we should establish separate units for all employees receiving tips and for each classification of employee that receives a different hourly wage any more than they are suggesting that every employee classification with separate supervision be granted a separate unit. These factors are merely elements to be evaluated when assessing all the evidence establishing a community of interest or lack thereof. No one factor should be elevated to the position of a determinative element. It is our understanding that this is still the test by which the question of whether a community of interest exists is resolved.

Thus, in light of the entire record, we cannot agree that the facts relied on by the majority support a finding that the petitioned-for unit is appropriate. Westin Hotel, 277 NLRB 1506 (1986).[1] Accordingly, we would dismiss the petition.

[1] Chairman Dotson notes that although it is true, as the majority states, that the Act allows a union to petition for an appropriate unit and does not require it to seek the unit which would be most appropriate, the Act, in Sec. 9(c)(5), also requires that the extent of union organization shall not be controlling in determining unit appropriateness. Yet given the sparsity of evidence supporting a separate unit herein, that very factor appears to the Chairman to be the only logical explanation for the conclusion reached by the majority. The Chairman also finds it significant that, given the nature of the maintenance employees' jobs and the extent of their involvement in all aspects of the hotel, finding that a separate unit is appropriate here could result in making the majority of the Employer's employees vulnerable to a shutdown of the entire hotel if this small group of employees engaged in a work stoppage or slowdown. Where, as here, the work of all the employees is so closely related and interdependent, it is inappropriate to give such a small, critically placed unit of 6 employees the power to potentially take work away from the other approximately 174 employees working at the hotel. In the Chairman's view, this factor, along with the strong community of interest the maintenance employees share with the other hotel employees, and the explicit statutory mandate against allowing the extent of organization to be controlling, requires the conclusion that a separate unit for the Employer's maintenance employees is inappropriate.

DECISION AND DIRECTION OF ELECTION

Upon a petition duly filed under Section 9(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a hearing was held before a hearing officer of the National Labor Relations Board, hereinafter referred to as the Board.[1]

Pursuant to the provisions of Section 3(b) of the Act, the Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to the undersigned.

Upon the entire record in this proceeding, I find:[2]

1. The hearing officer's rulings made at the hearing are free from prejudicial error and are hereby affirmed.

2. The Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act and it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein.[3]

3. The labor organization involved claims to represent certain employees of the Employer.

4. A question affecting commerce exists concerning the representation of certain employees of the Employer within the meaning of Section 9(c)(1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

The Petitioner seeks an election among all maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its Detroit, Michigan hotel, but would exclude all other employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act. The Employer contends that the only appropriate unit is hotel-wide. There is no history of collective bargaining and no evidence that any other labor organization is currently attempting to represent the Employer's employees in a broader unit.

The Employer had its "soft" opening on August 28, 1985. At that time, it opened its dining room, bar, and ballroom facilities and 50 of its 240 guest rooms. On October 20, 1985, the Employer had its grand opening, by which time all except three to five of its guest rooms and suites had become available. On November 1, 1985, the Employer opened its fitness center.

The hotel's structure consists of 20 stories. On the first floor are the lobby, front dest, lobby bar, restaurant, kitchen, and a ballroom area that can be sub-divided into two to four rooms, and various offices. On the next level, designated as 2.5, are the housekeeping and laundry departments, employee cafeteria and locker room and extensive retail space. The next level, designated as four, houses the executive offices, reservationists, and the catering, food, and beverage, sales and engineering departments. Floors five through seven are a parking garage, and the guest rooms are to be found on floors eight through twenty. The Employer employs approximately 180 employees in various classifications. All but two work at least 20 hours per week and are thereby classified as full-time by the Employer.

The engineering department consists of Donald Ruzyski, the chief engineer, and six employees. Five are classified as general maintenance and the sixth is classified as painter/carpenter. There is a third departmental classification, heat, light, power maintenance, but this position has not as yet been filled. The parties stipulated, and I find, that Ruzyski is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. Thus, he interviews all engineering department applicants and, as with all department heads, makes the final decisions on hiring in his department. The engineering employees report to Ruzyski and he assigns the department's work to them. Under the Employer's yearly wage review policy, Ruzyski will also make recommendations on their merit increases.

[3] The Employer is a New Hampshire corporation engaged in the operation of a hotel at 333 E. Jefferson Avenue, Detroit, Michigan. The Employer opened for business on August 28, 1985. Based on business projections, during the 12 month period ending November 30, 1986, the Employer will have gross revenues in excess of $500,000 and will purchase goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 which will be shipped to its facility directly from outside the State of Michigan.

The engineering department is primarily engaged in the maintenance and repair of the Employer's equipment. Departmental personnel are on duty 24 hours per day, seven days a week. The chief engineer and three employees work day shifts, one employee works afternoons, another works midnights and the sixth works a "floating" schedule, two afternoon shifts and three midnight shifts. The only other of the hotel's employee classifications who are on duty round-the-clock are room service, front desk and lobby, telephone operators and utility workers who clean the kitchen. Unlike the schedules of most other employee classifications, the schedules of, and number of hours worked by, engineering employees are not dependent on the Employer's occupancy rate.

Departmental tools and supplies for engineering are kept in that department. Those tools include a tilting arbor saw, electric drill, band saw, drill press, hammer drill, Hilti gun, various testing equipment, and diverse hand tools, such as pipe wrenches, pliers, channel locks, screw drivers, hammers, hand saws, and hammer punch. The engineering employees carry tools and a beeper with them during working hours. Each engineering employee has a locker in the department area. All other employees' lockers are in the locker room on the 2.5 level.

Most work assignments for the engineering department are generated by work orders, called maintenance request forms, submitted by the various other departments, mostly housekeeping and the front desk. There is no evidence that any other employees receive their assignments through work orders. These assignments include the maintenance of all equipment in the hotel except for the elevators. That equipment includes the emergency generator, fire pump, turbine pump, hot water heaters, refrigeration equipment, and all kitchen equipment. At present, because of the recent commencement of operations, all of this equipment is still under a one year warranty. Thus, major repairs are performed by the manufacturers. The department also maintains the hotel's swimming pool. It is also responsible for routine preventive maintenance functions, such as checking belt tensions, oil levels, operating temperatures, and general wear and tear, as well as checking for leaks or broken parts. The department also performs a wide variety of repair and maintenance work throughout the hotel, such as repairing radios, television sets, tape players, microphones, lamps, faucets, tub stoppers, dead bolts, doors, and ice machines, unplugging toilets and garbage disposals, installing shower curtain rods, changing light bulbs and nitrogen tanks in the bar, moving furniture, and performing various carpentry tasks. While the record discloses that certain other employee occasionally perform minor maintenance tasks, such as unplugging a garbage disposal, no other employees regularly perform maintenance work. In addition, no other employee has substituted for an engineering employee. Absences of engineering employees have been covered by other engineering employees. Likewise, while engineering employees have occasionally assisted other departments, such as setting up a meeting room for the banquet department in an emergency, none has been assigned to any other departments. Further, there have been no employee transfers into or out of the engineering department. The one engineering employee hired since the grand opening was hired from the outside.

The Employer's position descriptions for the painter/carpenter and general maintenance classifications require that those employees have three years and one year of prior experience in their respective classifications. The painter/carpenter had well in excess of the required experience. All but one of the current general maintenance employees had at least one year prior experience and the one who did not had some general maintenance background and had attended a vocational school in heating, ventilation and air conditioning. The only other of the 40 employee classifications of the hotel that require any prior experience ar seamtress/tailor, fitness center attendant, cash manager, servers, and cooks.

All employees are hourly rated and receive the same fringe benefits and privileges. The engineering employees, however, earn the highest hourly rate, at least $1 per hour more than the next highest rate, although certain employees' wages are augmented by tips. All employees have a common employee entrance, time clock and cafeteria, and are subject to the same rules and policies. All employees, except reservationists and secretaries, wear a uniform and name tag. The uniforms differ among most of the departments, however, and the engineering employees' uniforms, while similar to housekeeping, are unique and their shirts have "Engineer" written on them.

As to the pattern of area bargaining, the record shows that the engineering employees at virtually all of the major Detroit metropolitan area hotels are separately represented. Thus, the Petitioner represents engineering or maintenance employees at seven major Detroit metropolitan area hotels and another labor organization represents those classifications of employees at two other major hotels. While this Region did in the past direct an election at one area hotel in a facility-wide unit, the petitioning union sought such a unit and no other union was seeking a smaller unit.

In the hotel industry, the Board determines appropriate units on the facts of each case in order to determine wherein lies the true community of interest among particular employees. Holiday Inn Restaurant, 160 NLRB 927 (1966), enfd. 387 F.2d 648 (4th Cir. 1967). In doing so, the Board applies the general criteria used for determining units in other industries, weighing all factors present, such as the distinctiveness or lack of discreteness in the skills and functions of the particular employee groupings, their supervision, whether separate or common, the employer's organizational structure, and differences or lack of differences in wages and hours. Sheraton Motor Inn, 210 NLRB 790, 792 (1974).

Based upon the foregoing and the record as a whole, I conclude that the engineering department employees enjoy a sufficiently distinct community of interest, apart from any broader interests they may share with other hotel employees, to warrant separate representation. I thus find that a unit limited to those employees is appropriate. In making this finding, I note in particular the unique experience and skills required by the engineering employees, the distinctiveness in function between the engineering department and other departments,[4] the separate immediate supervision of the engineering department, the lack of interchange with other employees, the pattern of area bargaining of separate maintenance units, and that no other labor organization seeks a broader unit.[5] Sheraton-Anaheim Hotel, 252 NLRB 959 (1980); Compare NLRB v. Westin Hotel, 738 F.2d 765 (6th Cir. 1984), denying enforcement of Western Hotel, 261 NLRB 1005 (1982), where there was no predominant area practice of separate engineering department units, and where another labor organization sought an overall unit. Atlanta Hilton and Towers, 273 NLRB 87 (1984), differs substantially from this case because of the much greater functional integration and interchange found there. Also, in that case, unlike herein, a large number of employees in the housekeeping unit performed tasks similar to those of employees in the food service unit, or outside both units, or vice-versa.

5. In view of the foregoing, I find the following employees constitute an appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time maintenance employees employed by the Employer at its facility located at 333 E. Jefferson Avenue, Detroit, Michigan, but excluding all other employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

Those eligible to vote shall vote as set forth in the attached Direction of Election.

[4] The record does not support the Employer's contention that there is close and functional integration of the duties performed by the engineering department and those duties performed by other employees; the minimal overlapping of some minor duties does not negate the engineering employees' distinct community of interest. Sheraton-Anaheim Hotel, 252 NLRB 959, 961 (1980).

[5] Based upon this finding, I need not decide whether the hotel-wide unit contended for by the Employer is also appropriate, or whether such a unit is more appropriate. The sole issue before me is whether the unit petitioned for is appropriate.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 8 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge William N. Cates issued the attached decision. Respondents Vulcan Trailer Manufacturing Company, Inc., Vulcan Solid Waste, Inc., and Preferred Solid Waste Systems filed exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified and set forth in full below.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondents, Vulcan Trailer Manufacturing Co., Inc., and its alter-ego Vulcan Solid Waste, Inc., and its alter-ego Preferred Solid Waste Systems, and its alter-ego The Vulcan Company, Bessemer and Montevallo, Alabama, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to grant the April 1986 wage increases called for in its 15 April 1985 to 14 April 1988 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(b) Failing and refusing to abide by the terms and conditions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

(c) Threatening to refuse to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the appropriate unit set forth below, and threatening employees with unspecified reprisals if they participate in any National Labor Relations Board proceedings.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the following unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining and abide by the terms of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

> All production and maintenance employees employed by the Company at its Montevallo, Alabama facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Pay the April 1986 wage increases called for in the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union retroactive to the effective date set forth in the agreement. Such monetary amounts are to be computed in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the judge's decision.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its facility in Montevallo, Alabama, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Company's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Company immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Company to ensure

[1] The Respondents, in filing exceptions, did so without admitting they were proper parties and without waiving proper service of the charge, complaint, process, or jurisdiction.

[2] The judge erroneously reported the case name of Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), and the citation to Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Subsequent to the issuance of the judge's decision, Preferred filed a petition for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the United States Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. § 1101 et seq. We note that the Board's proceedings fall within the exceptions to the Bankruptcy Code's automatic stay provisions. See 11 U.S.C. § 362 (b)(4), (b)(5); J&B Smith Co., 280 NLRB 539 fn. 2 (1986).

[3] The judge included in his recommended Order a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing the Board's Order. In the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. We shall modify the judge's recommended Order accordingly.

Additionally, we shall modify the recommended Order and issue a new notice to conform more closely to the violations found.

[4] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondents have taken to comply.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights:

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT fail to grant the April 1986 wage increases called for in our 15 April 1985 to 14 April 1988 collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT fail and refuse to abide by the terms and conditions of our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

WE WILL NOT threaten and refuse to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of our employees in the unit described below.

WE WILL NOT threaten our employees with unspecified reprisals if they participate in any National Labor Relations Board proceedings.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of our employees in the following unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining:

All production and maintenance employees employed by the Company at its Montevallo, Alabama facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL abide by the terms of our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and WE WILL grant the wage increases called for in our collective-bargaining agreement with the Union retroactive to the date called for in that agreement.

VULCAN TRAILER MANUFACTURING CO., INC. AND ITS ALTER-EGO VULCAN SOLID WASTE, INC. AND ITS ALTER-EGO PREFERRED SOLID WASTE SYSTEMS AND ITS ALTER-EGO THE VULCAN COMPANY

Virginia L. Jordan, Esq., for the General Counsel.
C. V. Stelzenmuller, Esq. (Burr & Forman), of Birmingham, Alabama, for Respondent.
George C. Longshore, Esq., of Birmingham, Alabama, for the Union.

DECISION

WILLIAM N. CATES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Birmingham, Alabama, on 17 September 1986.[1] The charge in this case was filed by International Brotherhood of Boilermakers Local Lodge 583 (the Union) on 25 April and amended on 6 June. The complaint, which issued on 9 June, was amended at trial. The complaint, as amended, alleges that Vulcan Trailer Manufacturing Co., Inc.[2] (Trailer) and its alter-ego Vulcan Solid Waste, Inc. (Solid Waste) and its alter-ego Preferred Solid Waste Systems (Preferred Waste) and its alter-ego The Vulcan Company[3] (Vulcan) are affiliated businesses with common ownership, common officers, common directors, common management, interrelated operations, and common control of labor relations, and are by virtue of that relationship alter egos of each other and responsible for the unfair labor practices. I shall hereinafter refer to all the alter egos jointly as the Company. The complaint alleges that all production and maintenance employees employed by the Company at its Bessemer, Alabama facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act constitutes a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act. It is alleged that the Union was certified on 12 February 1973 as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of all the employees in the above-described unit and that the Union has been and is the representative of a majority of the employees in that unit. It is further alleged that since about 1973 the Company and the Union have been parties to successive collective-bargaining agreements with the most recent agreement being effective from 15 April 1985 until 14 April 1988. It is alleged that pursuant to the most recent collective-bargaining agreement the employees in labor grades 1, 2, and 3 were on 5 April to have received a 25-cent-an-hour wage increase. It is alleged that the Company failed and refused to grant the wage increases. It is also alleged that the Company has since about 15 April refused to abide by the terms and conditions of its most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. The complaint alleges that such failures on the part of the Company violate Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. It is also alleged that the Company about 9 March, through its supervisor and agent, Stanley Gaines, threatened employees it would refuse to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the above-described unit. It is further alleged that the Company, through its supervisor and agent, Michael Skeya, about 28 April threatened employees it would take unspecified reprisals against them if they participated in any Board proceedings.

[3] Counsel indicates in his posttrial brief that no appearance is made on behalf of "The Vulcan Company" inasmuch as it is not a corporation or legal entity separate from the other companies but is a fictitious name. Counsel filed an answer (without waiving proper service of the charges or complaint and without consenting to jurisdiction), participated in a pretrial conference, and filed a posttrial brief; however, neither he nor any representative of the companies appeared at the trial herein. Counsel asserts in his posttrial brief that Vulcan Trailer Manufacturing Co., Inc. and Vulcan Solid Waste, Inc. "elected" not to participate in the trial, and that Preferred Solid Waste Systems had no notice of the hearing.

The Company denies that Trailer, Solid Waste, and Preferred Waste are alter egos of each other and denies that any such entity as Vulcan exists. The Company raised other affirmative defenses and denied the commission of any unfair labor practices. All parties were afforded full opportunity to appear, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, and to argue orally. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Company (specifically Trailer, Solid Waste, and Preferred Waste).

On the entire record, including my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following[4]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

It is admitted that Trailer is[5] an Alabama corporation, with an office and place of business located at Bessemer, Alabama, where it is engaged in the manufacture of flat trailers, low-bed trailers, and log trailers. It is admitted that Trailer, during the past calendar year, purchased and received at its Bessemer, Alabama location supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Alabama. Accordingly, I find Trailer is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

[4] The only witnesses to testify here, Jerry Chamblee and Hoover Wilson, were both called by the General Counsel. No witnesses were called by the Union and as is earlier indicated the Company did not appear at the trial. I carefully observed Chamblee and Wilson as they testified, and they appeared to be attempting to describe the events about which they testified as honestly as possible. Their testimony is supported by other record evidence. Accordingly, I credit the uncontradicated testimony of Chamblee and Wilson.

[5] The Company in its answer and posttrial brief contends Trailer has been out of business since 6 March, but admits it was subject to the Board's jurisdiction at least until that date. The Company in its posttrial brief describes Trailer as a corporation undergoing reorganization in Chapter 11 bankruptcy proceedings. A decision on the alter ego status of the related companies will resolve all questions of jurisdiction. I note the Company in its answer admitted that Solid Waste is, and has been for a number of years, an Alabama corporation.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleges, the evidence establishes, and it is admitted that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. BACKGROUND AND OPERATIVE FACTS

Trailer was founded in 1953 as a trailer repair/service company operated by and for the benefit of Deaton, Inc., a Birmingham, Alabama based trucking company.[6] As a result of Trailer's repair expertise, it soon thereafter became an original manufacturer of specialty type trailers. In 1968 Deaton, Inc. moved its operations to Ensley, Alabama, and Trailer moved as well. In 1969 Deaton, Inc. and Trailer were acquired by Expeditor Systems, Inc.

On 2 February 1973 the Board conducted a secret-ballot election among the production and maintenance employees of Trailer, and on 12 February 1973 the Board certified the Union as the collective-bargaining representative of those employees. Since approximately 1973 the parties have been parties to successive collective-bargaining agreements.[7]

In 1978 Expeditor Systems, Inc. was acquired by Old Dominion Freight Lines, a common carrier trucking company. In 1978 Trailer built a new plant at Bessemer, Alabama, and moved into its new facility in December 1979. Trailer was purchased by and became a wholly owned subsidiary of Interstate Transportation Products and Sales Co. Inc. in 1963. Interstate Transportation Production and Sales Co., Inc. is in turn a wholly owned subsidiary of Meansco, Inc. Meansco, Inc. is owned by Walter Jurek (25-percent shareholder), Andrew Jurek (50-percent shareholder), and Owens (25-percent shareholder). Andrew Jurek (A. Jurek) and Owens are the only directors of Trailer and they share responsibility for the management and operation of Trailer. A. Jurek is responsible for Trailer's operations and production, while Owens is responsible for the financial and accounting aspects of the Company. Preferred Waste was purchased by and is a part of Meansco's corporate structure. Preferred Waste was purchased from the Heil Company in the early part of 1984 so Trailer could and thereafter did manufacture solid waste disposal equipment. Preferred Waste was utilized as the selling company for the solid waste containers that Trailer manufactured. Employee and Grievance Committee Chairman Jerry Chamblee (Chamblee) testified Trailer sold the solid waste disposal equipment under the name Preferred Waste or Solid

[6] The background for Trailer as well as the information on the corporate structure of the various companies herein has been taken not only from the record testimony, but from the Modified Disclosure Statement and related documents filed by Trailer on 11 March in the United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Alabama, Southern Division in the matter of Vulcan Trailer Manufacturing Company, Inc., BK No. 85-3205. The Modified Disclosure Statement was signed by Trailer Treasurer John B. Owens (Owens). The court-filed documents may be used as evidence regarding the corporate structure of certain of the companies herein inasmuch as the documents constitute admissions by a party opponent within the meaning of Federal Rules of Evidence 801(d)(2)(A) and/or (D).

[7] The most recent collective-bargaining agreement was effective from 15 April 1985 until 14 April 1988, inclusive.

Waste, but labeled it with the Trailer logo. For approximately the past 2-1/2 years all the speciality trailers and solid waste disposal equipment manufactured by the companies has been manufactured by the production and maintenance employees that are represented by the Union.

During the April 1985 negotiations for the most recent collective-bargaining agreement, the Union asked Trailer if any new job classifications were needed as the production and maintenance employees manufactured the solid waste disposal equipment. Chamblee, who was one of the Union's 1985 negotiating committee members, credibly testified:

> [W]e were talking about adding some language that would cover these [solid waste disposal] products and all by name. And . . . manager David Sullivan [who represented] the company at [the] negotiations . . . told us the Preferred and Solid Waste, all those load loaders and compactors employees would be covered under the current contract.
> He said there was not need for any new language. He said all it is it's just a different product. He says it's not really a different company, just a different product. They're one in the same.
> And we at that point agreed not to add any other language.[8]

On 23 May 1985 Trailer filed for bankruptcy under Chapter 11, Title 11, of the United States Code "Bankruptcy Code." Trailer's original plan of reorganization was rejected. On 5 March Trailer filed a modified plan of reorganization with the Bankruptcy Court. The modified plan of reorganization contained no provision concerning the collective-bargaining agreement between Trailer and the Union.[9] The modified plan of reorganization, a liquidation plan, called for the transfer of all assets to Solid Waste after disbursement was made to administrative creditors, secured creditors, and unsecured creditors.[10] Under the plan Solid Waste was to pay Trailer the fair market value for the property transferred to it. Additionally, the plan called for Solid Waste to move (with the Trailer assets) to a smaller location, merge with Preferred Waste, and produce solid waste disposal equipment as well as specialty trailers. On 21 May Bankruptcy Judge Fulford confirmed Trailer's modified plan of reorganization as summarized.

Chamblee credibly testified that on 9 March (4 days after Trailer filed its modified plan of reorganization) Supervisor Stanley Gaines[11] (Gaines or Supervisor Gaines) called the fabrication department employees around his desk and told them he had just come from a meeting with Plant Manager Michael Skeya and added: "[T]he company was planning on moving. And . . . the union would not be welcomed to go . . . that they didn't intend to put up with union problems." Chamblee asked why the Union was not going and Gaines told him he would have to ask Plant Manager Skeya that question. Gaines told the employees he did not know when the move would be accomplished.

Chamblee testified he and Wilson met with Plant Manager Skeya on 13 March to discuss a third step grievance.[12] After the grievance matter was discussed, Wilson asked Skeya if it was true that Trailer was planning on moving and if there was such a plan, would all the employees be going, would the Union be welcome, and would there still be a pension plan for the employees. Plant Manager Skeya said they were moving but they had no intention whatsoever of taking the Union with them to the new location. Skeya said the Company was having problems and had to take care of itself. Skeya told Chamblee and Wilson that Trailer "had gone out of business . . . [that] . . . there would be a new company" that "they were moving to Montevallo [Alabama] and the best qualified employees would be allowed to go with him but they would not take any union to Montevallo."

Thereafter, on 9 April Wilson learned from Chamblee that Trailer's management was having "one-on-one" meetings at the plant with unit employees. Wilson telephoned Plant Manager Skeya and asked about the meetings and asked Skeya if the Company was going to pay the contractually called for 5 April wage increases.[13] Skeya acknowledged meeting with the employees and indicated the Company was not going to pay the wage increases called for in the collective-bargaining agreement. Skeya agreed to meet with Wilson on 15 April to discuss matters.

Plant Manager Skeya met with Wilson and Chamblee on 15 April in the conference room at the plant. Skeya again stated they would be taking the best qualified employees with them to Montevallo, but added there would be no contract and no union there. Skeya also said they would not pay the wage increases called for in the collective-bargaining agreement. Wilson testified:

> I questioned [Plant Manager Skeya] about continuing to represent the people, I told him I thought he was in violation and he said, no, there would be no union there; that they would have some sort of in-house union that he would talk with his employees

[8] International Union Representative Hoover Wilson (Wilson) corroborated Chamblee's testimony as outlined above.

[9] Later, on 9 July Trailer applied to the Bankruptcy Court for an order approving the rejection of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. United States Bankruptcy Judge Clifford Fulford (Bankruptcy Judge Fulford) denied Trailer's application in an order dated 19 August. In re Vulcan Trailer Mfg. Co., Case 85-3205, United States Bankruptcy Court for the Northern District of Alabama, Southern Division.

[11] According to the undisputed and credited testimony of Chamblee, Gaines directed the work force in the fabrication department to include signing the employees' work forms and initialing their timecards. Gaines could grant employees time off and had the authority to discipline them up to and including discharge. Other supervisors at the Bessemer location were Gary Marsh and Timmy Parker.

[12] Skeya was not the highest level management representative at the Bessemer location. Owners Owens and A. Jurek had their offices there, with A. Jurek having overall responsibility for plant operations and Owens overseeing the financial and accounting aspects of the Company.

[13] The parties' most recent collective-bargaining agreement (effective 15 April 1985 to 14 April 1988 inclusive), Exh. B, p. 30, calls for certain specifically set forth wage increases to be implemented by the Company on 5 April.

about [it] once he got there . . . I told him . . . I thought he was wrong and I intended to file charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

Wilson testified that ended the conversation. He indicated he had not had any further discussions with Plant Manager Skeya since that time.

Wilson testified that union dues have not been checked off by the Company since March and he added the wage increases called for in the collective-bargaining agreement were never paid.

Within a day or two of the above-described 15 April meeting between Skeya, Wilson, and Chamblee, Trailer employees were given a letter from A. Jurek and Owens dated 15 April and written on "Vulcan Solid Waste Systems" stationery,[14] that read in part as follows:

> Almost everyone has questions about who we are, who do I work for, the move from Bessemer, wages, vacations and the like. This will attempt to answer the most frequently asked questions.

As is reflected elsewhere in this decision, the Union filed the charge giving rise to the instant case on 25 April. Chamblee testified that when Trailer received its copy of the charge[15] Plant Manager Skeya came out in the plant area with the charge and asked him what he knew about it. Chamblee told Skeya that Skeya knew as much about the charge as Chamblee did. Skeya asked what the charge was based on. Chamblee told him it was based on the things that he, Skeya, and Wilson had discussed in their meeting on 15 April. Plant Manager Skeya told Chamblee he felt it would be in Chamblee's best interest if he did not get involved in the case. Chamblee told Skeya it was "a sticky situation" for him, but he intended to testify because he had been asked to, and he intended to tell the truth to the National Labor Relations Board. Skeya told Chamblee he understood the situation and ended the conversation.

Chamblee testified that during April and May specialty trailer sales were "a little slack," but unit employees continued to make solid waste disposal equipment. Chamblee stated they started moving to the new facility in Montevallo, Alabama, during the next few months. In that regard Chamblee testified: "I believe it was the fitting and welding area that started to move first. They started breaking down their equipment and loading it on trucks to be shipped to Montevallo." Chamblee asserts production continued all during this transition time, but that it was at "a very light flow." Chamblee stated one section would keep working while other sections were broken down for the move to the new facility. Chamblee credibly testified the move to the new facility was complete around 1 August. Chamblee stated that 18 of the 20 production and maintenance employees, and 11 of the 12 clerical employees employed at the new facility had been employed at the old Bessemer, Alabama location and had simply transferred to the new facility. Chamblee testified the same supervision that had been utilized at the Bessemer location was utilized at the new facility, namely, Plant Manager Skeya and Supervisors Gaines, Parker, and Morris. Chamblee also stated that A. Jurek and Owens performed the same functions at the new facility that they had at the old Bessemer location. Chamblee testified that all the equipment utilized at the new Montevallo facility came from the old Bessemer location. Chamblee testified that some of the raw materials and supplies utilized at the new facility came from the old Bessemer location while others were delivered to the new location by the same suppliers that had supplied items at the old location. Chamblee stated the same products—solid waste disposal equipment and specialty trailers—were, and still are, being built at the new facility that had been built at the Bessemer location.[16]

[14] The address on the stationery was 300 Industrial Parkway, Bessemer, Alabama. The stationery reflects in trademark style that it was formerly Heil Preferred Systems.

IV. GOVERNING PRINCIPLES, ANALYSIS, AND CONCLUSIONS

In considering whether an alter ego relationship exists, the Board stated in O. Voorhees Painting Co., 275 NLRB 779 fn. 3 (1985), that the standards set forth in Fugazy Continental Corp., 265 NLRB 1301 (1982), enfd. 725 F.2d 1416 (D.C. Cir. 1984), were the proper ones to apply. In Fugazy Continental Corp. the Board held at 1301:

> In determining whether [one employer] is the alter ego of [another employer], we must consider a number of factors, no one of which, taken alone, is the sine qua non of alter ego status. Among these factors are: common management and ownership; common business purposes, nature of operations, and supervision; common premises and equipment; common customers, i.e., whether the employers constitute "the same business in the same market;" as well as the nature and extent of the negotiations and formalities surrounding the transaction. We must also consider whether the purpose behind the creation of the alleged alter ego was legitimate or whether, instead, its purpose was to evade responsibilities under the Act. [Footnotes omitted.]

The Fugazy Continental Corp., supra, standards appear to have been adopted from an array of earlier Board and court decisions, particularly Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976). Not all of these indicia listed above need be present to find that an alter ego relationship exists. See, e.g., Blake Construction Co., 245 NLRB 630, 634 (1979), enf. granted in part and denied in part on other grounds 663 F.2d 272 (D.C. Cir. 1981). In examining the question of common ownership in alter ego situations, the Board only looks for "substantially identical ownership." See, e.g., Advance Electric, 268 NLRB 1001, 1004 (1984). The Board in All Kind Quilting, Inc., 266 NLRB 1187 fn. 4 (1983), noted that an alter ego relationship could exist even with no evidence of common ownership being present at all. Any employer that is found to be an alter ego of another is bound by any collective-bargaining agreement executed by the other. E. G. Sprinkler Corp., 268 NLRB 1241 (1984), and NLRB v. Tricor Products, 636 F.2d 266, 269–270 (10th Cir. 1980).

Applying the above standards and principles to the facts herein, I conclude that a preponderance of the evidence shows that each of the four companies named in the complaint, as amended, are alter egos of each other.

Common ownership of these companies has been demonstrated. Meansco, Inc., which is owned by Walter Jurek and A. Jurek; and Trailer as well as Preferred Waste are owned by Owens. At certain relevant times Trailer manufactured and Preferred Waste sold the items produced by the companies. After the liquidation of Trailer was accomplished under the guidance of the Bankruptcy Court, Solid Waste became the companies' manufacturing arm and it merged with Preferred Waste to continue to produce specialty trailers and solid waste disposal equipment. The employees that had previously worked for Trailer began to be paid by Solid Waste and those same employees were informed by A. Jurek and Owens in writing that they, as of mid-April, worked for Solid Waste. Although the exact status of Vulcan is not clear in this record, it is being utilized as the company that pays the employees their wages.[17] Simply stated, the three owners of Meansco, Inc. own Trailer, Solid Waste, Preferred Waste, and Vulcan, if Vulcan exists as a separate corporate entity. The evidence is conclusive that A. Jurek was and/or is responsible for Trailer's, Solid Waste's, Preferred Waste's, and Vulcan's operations and production; and Owens was and/or is responsible for the financial and accounting aspects of those entities. Those two individuals' responsibilities are the same at the Montevallo facility as they had been at the Bessemer location. Simply stated, the management structure of these entities has not changed from the beginning to the present. It is quite clear the same business purpose has existed throughout, at Bessemer as well as at Montevallo. The nature of the operations, although smaller in size at Montevallo, is identical to that which had been at the Bessemer location. Supervision for the various companies has been the same at both locations (namely, Plant Manager Skeya and Supervisors Gaines, Marsh, and Parker). All the equipment used at the Montevallo facility was brought there from the Bessemer location. The customers, throughout the history of the companies, have remained the same. Some of the raw materials and supplies used at the Montevallo facility were brought from the Bessemer location. Additional supplies and raw materials have been supplied by the same suppliers that previously serviced the Company at its Bessemer location. The employees at the Montevallo facility—production and maintenance as well as clerical—came almost exclusively from the work force at the Bessemer location.

[16] Additionally, Chamblee testified that from April until the date of the trial herein he had received various paychecks from the Company some, for example, with the name Trailer crossed out and the name Solid Waste typed in and others from "The Vulcan Company."

[17] If Vulcan is not a corporation or legal entity separate from Trailer, Solid Waste, and Preferred Waste but is a "fictitious name" as contended by company counsel, then that matter can be resolved with the Board, administratively, or at the compliance stage herein.

Although there is some evidence that tends to suggest the owners of Trailer had legitimate reasons for establishing certain of the alter egos, the evidence is overwhelming that they created the alter egos in order to evade their responsibilities under the Act. A number of factors persuade me that the owners of Trailer took the actions they did because of antiunion sentiments and in order to avoid their obligations under the collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. For example, Supervisor Gaines[18] told the fabrication department employees that Trailer was moving from Bessemer to Montevallo and the Union would not be welcome to go with it because they did not intend to put up with union problems.[19] Plant Manager Skeya told Wilson that Trailer was going to move to its new location, and the Union would not be welcome or recognized at the new location because the Company had problems and had to take care of itself. Skeya told Wilson there would be no contract, no union, and no called-for wage increases at the new location. Plant Manager Skeya also told Wilson the Company would form its own in-house union at its new location. That Trailer took the actions it did in order to escape its obligations under the Act is also demonstrated by the fact it discontinued payment of union dues-checkoff and refused to pay the contractually called-for wage increases even before the bankruptcy court approved its modified plan of reorganization. Instead of granting the contractually called for wage increases, Trailer transferred its employees to the payroll of Solid Waste and then stated it had no obligation to pay the increased wages or deduct union dues. The bankruptcy court never granted Trailer's belated request to reject its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

Based on all the above factors, I am persuaded that Trailer, Solid Waste, Preferred Waste, and Vulcan are all alter egos of each other and are all liable for all unfair labor practice violations found herein.[20] Inasmuch as the Company (Trailer, Solid Waste, Preferred Waste, and Vulcan jointly) failed and refused about 5 April to grant the contractually called for wage increases, it violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act. Likewise, when the Company about 15 April failed and refused to abide by the terms of its most recent collective-bargaining agreement with the Union it also violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act.

Finally, I find Plant Manager Skeya threatened employee Chamblee with unspecified reprisals when he told Chamblee in late April after the Union had filed a charge with the Board that it would be in Chamblee's best interest not to get involved in the case. The remark was made by a high level member of management and occurred at a time when the Company was committing other unfair labor practices. No valid or justifiable reason was advanced or suggested for Skeya's conduct. Accordingly, I find Skeya's comments violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. See S & R Sundries, 272 NLRB 1352 fn. 2 (1984).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Vulcan Trailer Manufacturing Co., Inc., Vulcan Solid Waste, Inc., Preferred Solid Waste Systems, and the Vulcan Company (jointly the Company) are alter egos of each other and constitute an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Local Lodge 583 is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. All production and maintenance employees employed by the Company at its Montevallo, Alabama facility, but excluding all office clerical employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act.

4. Since 12 February 1973 and at all times material, the Union has been the duly designated collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the above-described unit.

5. The Company violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act by failing and refusing since about 5 April to grant the wage increases called for in its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, and by failing and refusing since about 15 April to abide by the terms and conditions of its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.

6. The Company violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act when about 9 March it threatened its employees that it would refuse to recognize the Union as the exclusive representative of its employees in the unit described above, and when about 28 April it threatened its employees with unspecified reprisals if they participated in any Board proceedings.

7. The unfair labor practices described above affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

It having been found that the Company has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I recommend that it be required to cease and desist therefrom and take certain af-

[18] The evidence clearly establishes that Gaines is a supervisor within the meaning of the Act. He had and exercised certain indicia of supervisory status. For example, he directed the fabrication work force, granted time off, and disciplined employees up to and including discharge.

[19] I find, as alleged in the complaint, that Gaines' remarks constituted a threat that the Company would refuse to recognize the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its production and maintenance employees.

[20] Trailer's, Solid Waste's, and Preferred Waste's contention that due process was not afforded them because they were not all served with the charge and/or complaint herein is without merit. The record reflects service was perfected on Trailer. The Board has held that where a complaint and charge have been served on one alter ego it constitutes service on all entities found to be alter egos of the company receiving proper service of the relevant documents. See Sturdevant Roofing Co., 238 NLRB 186, 188 (1978), enfd. in pertinent part 636 F.2d 271 (10th Cir. 1980).

firmative actions necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Inasmuch as I have found the Company violated the Act by failing and refusing to abide by the terms of collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, I shall recommend that it be required to recognize and, on request, bargain collectively with the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative of its employees in the appropriate unit described in this decision and that it abide by the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement it has with the Union. Likewise, inasmuch as the Company violated the Act by failing and refusing to grant the April wage increases called for in its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, I shall recommend the Company be ordered to grant such wage increases retroactive to the effective date set forth in the collective-bargaining agreement. Such monetary amounts are to be computed in accordance with the Board's decision in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest thereon as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1971). It is also recommended that the Company be ordered to post the notice to employees attached hereto as "Appendix" for a period of 60 consecutive days in order that employees may be apprised of their rights under the Act and the Company's obligation to remedy its unfair labor practices.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND CRACRAFT

On 2 February 1982 Administrative Law Judge Burton Litvack issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision[1] and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

We agree with the judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by making several coercive and threatening statements. We also agree that the Respondent unlawfully discharged three employees.[4] We find merit, however, in the Respondent's exceptions to the judge's findings with respect to certain statements of Project Manager Jim Joy.

1. On 7 May 1980[5] following the discharge of employee Randal Fansler, Joy met with two union agents and an employee steward. During their meeting, one of the union agents mentioned a threat by union members to picket the jobsite in protest of the discharge. According to one union agent, Joy replied that if "things didn't work out and the men didn't get back to work, the basic thing that would happen is that [the Respondent] would lose [its] contract," with the contract probably being awarded to Brown and Root, a nonunion firm also engaged at the jobsite. Also in early May at a safety meeting with the employees, Joy announced that employees from the nonunion firm would be sharing camp space with the Respondent's employees. According to the credited testimony, Joy stated that "if there were any union problems, either there or on the job, that the whole job could go to Brown and Root, that they are waiting to take it over." We do not agree with the judge that Joy's remarks are unlawful threats of business closure in retaliation for union activities. Joy's statements do not intimate that the Respondent would forfeit its contract as punishment for its employees' union activities. Rather, these statements suggest no more than the possibility that the Respondent could lose its contract due to the activity of parties beyond its control. Such statements concerning possible third-party action are statements of opinion, not threats of reprisal, and are protected by Section 8(c) of the Act. Accordingly, we dismiss that aspect of the complaint and shall modify the Order accordingly.

2. We disagree with our dissenting colleague's assertion that the General Counsel has not shown a prima facie case of unlawful discharge of Kelly. The General Counsel established that Kelly engaged in protected activity and that his supervisor who discharged him had knowledge of the activity and expressed union animus. The nexus which our colleague finds lacking is supplied by credited testimony that Davis had told Union Steward Herndon, when he presented a job-related complaint, that "we can't be starting all this union shit," Davis' anger when Kelly threatened to take a work-break grievance to Herndon, and Davis' caustic remark when he gave Kelly his final paycheck that he had a "present" for Kelly. This is sufficient in our view to support an inference that Kelly's protected conduct was the basis for his discharge. As the Respondent has failed to show that

[1] The last sentence of sec. IV,D,2, par. 2, of the judge's decision should read "Further, while there is no record evidence that Easter was aware that Bridges actually spoke to Lively . . . ." The first sentence of sec. IV,D,2, par. 4, should read "Having established that Bridges engaged in protected concerted activities, however limited, and that Respondent, through Easter, was aware of, or suspected, such conduct . . . ." We correct the inadvertent errors.

[2] Both the Respondent and the General Counsel have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

We also find no merit in the Respondent's allegation of bias and prejudice on the part of the judge. On our full consideration of the record and the judge's decision, we perceive no evidence that he prejudged the case, made prejudicial rulings, or demonstrated a bias against the Respondent in his analysis or discussion of the evidence.

[3] The judge inadvertently omitted from the cease-and-desist portion of his recommended Order a provision enjoining the Respondent from in any like or related manner interfering with the employees' Sec. 7 rights. We shall amend the Order to so provide.

We shall also modify the Order by adding the affirmative requirement that the Respondent expunge from its records any references to the unlawful discharges and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that evidence of the unlawful discharges will not be used against them.

[4] In affirming the judge's finding that Robert Kelly and Randal Fansler engaged in protected concerted activity when they sought the Respondent's compliance with the terms of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, we rely on NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984). Because we affirm the judge's findings in this regard, we find it unnecessary to decide whether Kelly's complaints regarding noncontractual matters were protected concerted activity.

Kelly would have been discharged even in the absence of his protected activity, we affirm the judge's conclusion that the discharge was unlawful. See Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980).

On 14 May Kelly informed Wendell Bridges that Kelly had just been discharged. Bridges approached Foreman James Easter and asked if Easter would hire Kelly for the night crew. Easter refused, stating, "I got a new crew . . . I don't want any problems." Bridges told Easter that he would speak to General Foreman Joe Lively, and Easter advised Bridges not to go over his head. Later, after Easter again refused Bridges' request to hire Kelly, Bridges advised Kelly to speak to Lively. Easter again became upset and asked if Bridges was trying to go over his head. Easter corroborated this version of his encounter with Bridges, and the judge also credited Easter's testimony that Bridges responded by threatening that "they were going to wobble" (strike) the job. That evening, Bridges told Easter that he was driving Kelly home to Las Vegas and would return for work the next day. Easter asked whether Kelly was supporting Bridges, and, when Bridges said they were just friends, Easter replied, "Look, son . . . you want to work on my crew . . . you stay out of other people's business." The judge found, and we affirm, that this statement was a threat of discharge in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

When Bridges returned for work the next day, Easter informed him that he was laid off, stating, "I don't want no problems on my job." Bridges responded that such actions could lead to a wildcat strike, and Easter replied, "To hell with your wildcat strike. Get the hell off my job." Later, Bridges encountered Superintendent Sam Aiton III and asked, "Wasn't my work satisfactory?" Aiton replied, "That's not the point. . . . Anyone that creates any problems from now on is going down the road." The judge found, and we affirm, that Aiton's remark was an unlawful threat of discharge.

We agree with the judge's finding that Bridges' attempt to assist Kelly in procuring employment with the Respondent was protected concerted activity, and base our conclusion that the Respondent unlawfully discharged Bridges on the judge's finding that this assistance was one reason for Bridges' discharge.[6]

We do not agree with the judge's finding that Bridges was engaged in protected conduct when he threatened a wildcat strike in protest of Kelly's discharge.[7] We nevertheless conclude that the Respondent has not met its burden under Wright Line, supra, of proving that Bridges would have been discharged even in the absence of his protected conduct of attempting to secure employment for Kelly after Kelly was unlawfully discharged. The Respondent has never asserted that Bridges' threat was the reason for his discharge. In fact, in its exceptions, the Respondent argues, based on credibility, that Bridges never even threatened a strike before he was terminated. Its asserted reason for the discharge, Bridges' allegedly poor work performance on 13 May, had nothing to do with his threat of an unauthorized strike. The judge found, based on credibility resolutions, that this asserted reason was a sham and a pretext. Further, Bridges again mentioned the possibility of a wildcat strike after he was discharged, and Easter admitted that he discounted this threat. Accordingly, we conclude that the Respondent has not met its burden of proving that it discharged Bridges because he threatened a wildcat strike and not because of his protected concerted activity of attempting to obtain employment for Kelly.

4. We also agree with the judge, rather than with our dissenting colleague, that the Respondent unlawfully attempted to interfere with the steward's duties. The Respondent's threat to put the steward "up on a hill" suggests isolation from the rank-and-file employees which would preclude a steward's effectiveness.

We further agree with the judge that the Respondent unlawfully interrogated employee Fansler regarding why he contacted his steward about a pay dispute.

The judge found that 2 hours after Fansler last spoke to the steward about the dispute, General Foreman Lively approached Fansler and asked him why he had contacted the steward. Fansler replied that whenever anyone tried to "screw him" out of pay, he was entitled to try to resolve the matter by speaking to the steward. Lively responded by calling Fansler and the other carpenters a "bunch of crybabies." Fansler then attempted to defend the reputation of the Union, and Lively walked away. Lively apologized to Fansler later that afternoon.

[6] We disagree with our dissenting colleague's assertion that Bridges' assistance to Kelly was unprotected. Bridges' attempt to secure employment for Kelly is not the type of dissident activity that could undermine the statutory system of bargaining through an exclusive representative. Cf. Energy Coal Partnership, 269 NLRB 770 (1984) (unauthorized strike). Bridges was not engaged in collective bargaining; rather, he was involved in classic concerted activity—joining with another to seek employment.

Because we conclude that the Respondent unlawfully discharged Bridges because of his assistance to Kelly, we find it unnecessary to determine whether complaints Bridges made about the night crew's work hours also constituted protected concerted activity.

[7] It is well established that an unauthorized, or "wildcat," strike is not activity protected by Sec. 7 of the Act. See Harnischfeger Corp. v. NLRB, 207 F.2d 575, 578–580 (7th Cir. 1953).

After officials of the Union intervened, Lively agreed to make up Fansler's lost wages, and Fansler testified that by his termination date he had received all the payment he believed was due him.

The Respondent's general antipathy toward the steward's role is clear from the above unlawful comments made to the steward. The Respondent's further questioning of an employee as to why he contacted his steward is coercive in these circumstances. We note that, despite Fansler's honest response and the supervisor's apology, the interrogation was followed by an unlawful discharge based on the matter questioned. Accordingly, we affirm the judge's conclusion.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified and set out in full below and orders that the Respondent, Buck Brown Contracting Co., Inc. and A.S.C. Constructors, a Joint Venture, Tonopah, Nevada, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging employees because they engaged in union or other protected concerted activities.

(b) Threatening to terminate employees because they engaged in union or other protected concerted activities.

(c) Threatening to affect adversely the job steward's ability to perform the duties and responsibilities of his office because of his activities on behalf of the Union.

(e) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Randal Fansler, Robert Kelly, and Wendell Bridges immediate and full reinstatement to their former jobs or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful discharges of Randal Fansler on 6 May 1980, Robert Kelly on 14 May 1980, and Wendell Bridges on 15 May 1980, and notify these individuals in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) If its work assignment at the Anaconda Mining project jobsite in Tonopah, Nevada, has not yet been completed, post at its office there copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] If its work on that jobsite has been completed, copies of the attached notice should be sent to the last known addresses of Randal Fansler, Robert Kelly, and Wendell Bridges and all union member/employees employed by the Respondent between 1 March and 31 May 1980, and to the Union so that the latter may, if it desires, post the notice at its dispatch hall or wherever notices are customarily posted. Copies of the attached notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 31, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the consolidated amended complaint is dismissed insofar as it alleges that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act by refusing to reinstate Robert Kelly, Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by terminating Wendell Bridges, and Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating David Mark Doran and John Angle.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, concurring in part and dissenting in part.

I agree with my colleagues that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Randal Fansler and, through its supervisor Joseph Lively, by threatening to discharge employees who complained about Lively's violations of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement.[1] I also agree with the reversal of the judge's conclusion that certain statements made by Project Manager Joy violated Section 8(a)(1). I disagree, however, with the majority's conclusion that the Respondent unlawfully discharged Robert Kelly and Wendell Bridges or made other statements that violated Section 8(a)(1).

I. THE DISCHARGES

A. Robert Kelly

The judge and my colleagues find that Robert Kelly was discharged for raising complaints about perceived contract violations and working conditions in general. The judge found that Kelly complained to his supervisor Don Davis about the unavailability of cold drinking water and sanitary facilities and about Davis' performing unit work. Noting that Kelly alone on Davis' crew raised such complaints, the judge inferred that Davis took Kelly's complaining personally and was motivated by it to discharge him.

On this evidence, I find that the General Counsel has failed to make a prima facie case of unlawful discrimination. The record does not demonstrate any nexus between Kelly's protected conduct and his discharge. According to Kelly's own testimony, Davis did not respond in a hostile manner to Kelly when he raised his complaints, and the General Counsel has not alleged that Davis otherwise has violated the Act. I do not find Davis' general statements that the employees were, for example, crybabies, which were never directly addressed to or made about Kelly, are sufficient to warrant drawing an inference of personal antagonism against Kelly to support finding an unfair labor practice. Accordingly, I would dismiss this aspect of the complaint.

B. Wendell Bridges

The majority adopts the judge's conclusion that the Respondent unlawfully discharged employee Bridges. The judge found that Bridges engaged in three types of protected conduct: he complained about the number of hours scheduled for his shift; he attempted to secure employment for a discharged coworker; and he threatened to strike in protest of that discharge. In my opinion, none of these actions is protected by the Act and, accordingly, the General Counsel has failed to present a prima facie case of unlawful discharge.

Bridges' individual complaint that his scheduled number of hours of work on the night shift was 1 hour less than that scheduled for the day-shift employees is not protected concerted activity. As found by the judge, this was not a matter covered by the collective-bargaining agreement. Cf. NLRB v. City Disposal Systems, 465 U.S. 822 (1984). Further, the record does not support a finding that Bridges acted on the authority of other employees when he made this individual complaint. The conclusion that Bridges' complaint was solely personal is manifest by his proposed solution that he simply be allowed to work on another crew, i.e., on the day shift. Cf. Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984).

Second, I do not agree that Bridges' threat to strike the project, made when Foreman Easter refused to hire Kelly, is protected activity. There is no contention or evidence that Bridges' threat was supported by the Union or that he sought such support. Rather, his threatened action was a spontaneous and self-initiated "wildcat" strike, and not the product of majority action through the Union.[2] I do not believe that employees have a protected right to so circumvent their collective-bargaining representative. Therefore, I would not find the threat of a "wildcat" strike protected activity.

Similarly, I do not agree that Bridges' attempt to secure the reinstatement of Kelly is protected activity. Employees who are represented by a collective-bargaining agent and are aggrieved have at their disposal union representatives through whom the employees can seek redress. In my view, when employees have a duly elected and recognized union, efforts to assist colleagues by self-designated representatives undermine the exclusive statutory representative. I do not find such self-help attempts protected by the Act.[3] Accordingly, I would dismiss this aspect of the complaint.

II. THE ALLEGED 8(A)(1) VIOLATIONS

I disagree with my colleagues with regard to their adoption of two 8(a)(1) violations found by the judge. The first alleged violation occurred in early May when Project Manager Jim Joy and Superintendent Sam Aiton III approached Union Steward Mike Herndon as Herndon was returning to his work area after speaking with employees. Joy and Aiton asked Herndon what he was doing, and Joy said that he did not think Herndon should be walking around the project so much. According to Herndon, Joy also said that "he was going to put me up on a hill where I could see the whole job area, with an umbrella and a watering can, and that's where I would stay and sit for the whole 10 hours of the day." The judge characterized this incident as involving interrogation and harassment, and found Supervisor Joy's remark to be an unlawful threat to affect adversely the steward's ability to perform his duties in violation of Section 8(a)(1). I find nothing in this incident that can be characterized as coercive or destructive of employee rights. The inquiry to Herndon regarding what he was doing during his shift hours on the project is clearly permissible. I further find the cavalier remark about what they might do to Herndon does not rise to the level of an unfair labor practice. I would dismiss this aspect of the complaint.

[1] In light of this finding, I find it unnecessary to decide if the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by the two additional incidents found by the judge to constitute unlawful threats of discharge. See sec. IV,F of the judge's decision. Such a finding would be cumulative and would add nothing to the remedy.

[2] The conclusion that Bridges intended an unauthorized strike is bolstered by the frequent characterization of job actions as "wildcat." For instance, Bridges testified that, when he and Kelly returned to the day camp following Easter's refusal to hire Kelly, Kelly stated that he was "going to throw a wildcat," and Bridges responded that he would not cross a picket line. In addition, the judge dismissed the allegation that Bridges' discharge violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act because there was no evidence that Bridges was involved in any union activity.

The second incident occurred on 23 April. Employee Randal Fansler spoke to his steward Herndon concerning a pay dispute with the Respondent. A few hours later, Supervisor Joe Lively approached Fansler in the reclaim tunnel area and asked Fansler why he had come in contact with Herndon. Fansler replied that he was entitled to speak to a steward when someone tried "to screw" him out of pay. Lively replied that Fansler and the other carpenters were "crybabies" and walked away. Later that afternoon, Lively apologized to Fansler, stating that the pay dispute was a result of a misunderstanding and that he hoped Fansler would not quit. The judge and my colleagues find this was unlawful interrogation in violation of Section 8(a)(1). I disagree. Considering the brevity of the encounter, the informal setting in which it occurred, Fansler's honest and clearly unintimidated response, and the supervisor's subsequent apology, I cannot characterize this single question as coercive. See Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984). Therefore, I would dismiss this portion of the complaint.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge you because you engaged in union or other protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten to terminate you because you engaged in union or other protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten to affect adversely the job steward's ability to perform the duties and responsibilities of his office because of his activities on behalf of United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, Local No. 1780.

WE WILL NOT interrogate you with regard to your union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Randal Fansler, Robert Kelly, or Wendell Bridges immediate and full reinstatement to their former positions or, if those positions no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and WE WILL make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits they may have suffered as a result of our discrimination against them with interest.

WE WILL remove from our personnel records all references to the unlawful discharges of these employees and WE WILL notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of the discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

BUCK BROWN CONTRACTING CO., INC. AND A.S.C. CONSTRUCTORS, A JOINT VENTURE

Douglas Gallop, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Michael W. Foster, Esq., and Phillip M. Prince, Esq. (Shimmel, Hill, Bishop & Gruender), of Phoenix, Arizona, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

BURTON LITVACK, Administrative Law Judge. This consolidated proceeding was heard before me in both Las Vegas, Nevada, and Phoenix, Arizona, on December 4 and 5, 1980,[1] and January 5–8 and 26–28, February 2 and 3, and March 2–4, 1981. On August 16, 1980, the Regional Director for Region 31 of the National Labor Relations Board (the Board) issued an order consolidating cases, consolidated amended complaint, and notice of hearing, based on unfair labor practice charges filed by

Randal F. Fansler, an individual, in Case 31–CA–10035 on May 15, 1980; by Robert J. Kelly, an individual, in Case 31–CA–10043 on May 16, 1980; by Wendell Bridges, an individual, in Case 31–CA–10047 on May 19, 1980; by David Mark Doran, an individual, in Case 31–CA–10141 on June 27, 1980; and by John Angle, an individual, in Case 31–CA–10155 on July 2, 1980, alleging that Buck Brown Contracting Co., Inc. and A.S.C. Constructors, a Joint Venture (Respondent), engaged in acts and conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). During the aforementioned hearing, the General Counsel was permitted to further amend the instant consolidated amended complaint, alleging that Respondent also engaged in acts and conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act. Both in an answer and at the hearing, Respondent denied the commission of any unfair labor practices. All parties have been afforded full opportunity to appear, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue their respective positions, and to file briefs. Based on the entire record, on the briefs filed on behalf of the parties, and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a joint venture partnership, consisting of Buck Brown Contracting Co., Inc. (Buck Brown, Inc. and A.S.C. Constructors) and maintains an office and place of business at the Anaconda Mining molybdenum mine construction project near Tonopah, Nevada, where it is engaged in the construction of production facilities for the operation of the mine. Respondent, in the course and conduct of its business operations, annually purchases and receives goods and services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Nevada. The consolidated amended complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce and in a business affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The consolidated amended complaint alleges, Respondent admits, and I find that United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, Local No. 1780 (the Union) is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. ISSUES

1. About May 6, did Respondent discharge employee Randal F. Fansler in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act?

2. About May 14, did Respondent discharge employee Robert J. Kelly in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act?

3. About May 15, did Respondent discharge employee Wendell Bridges in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act?

4. About May 30, did Respondent discharge employees David Mark Doran and John Angle in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act?

5. Whether in late May or early June, Respondent refused to reinstate employee Kelly to his former position in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act?

6. Did Respondent violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by the following acts and conduct?

(b) In late April, threatening employees with discharge for complaining about perceived violations of a collective-bargaining agreement.

(c) About May 7, threatening to cease doing business because of employees' union activities.

(d) In early May, threatening to cease doing business because of employees' union activities.

(e) In early May, reprimanding employees due to their union activities.

(f) About May 15, threatening to terminate employees who cause union problems.

IV. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

1. The setting

Respondent is a joint venture, comprising Buck Brown, Inc. and A.S.C. Constructors, with the former acting as the managing partner. Since March 1980, and at all times material, Respondent, pursuant to a contract with the general engineering contractor Bechtel, has been engaged in the construction of certain portions of a molybdenum mine for Anaconda Mining. The construction project is located in an arid and remote section of the State of Nevada, near the town of Tonopah that is located approximately 200 miles from Las Vegas. With other contractors, including Brown and Root, responsible for other sections of the facility, Respondent contracted to construct the core portions of the mine facility: the crusher building, two reclaim tunnels, a radial arm stacker, and a concentrator building.[2] Each of these structures is constructed of steel-reinforced concrete. The record discloses that, in connection with the performance of its work, as of the commencement of the hearing, Respondent had employed approximately 370 employees, representing the various construction crafts at the project, and that over half of the workers have been carpenters, whose work consisted primarily of constructing the wooden wall forms of the building walls into which the concrete is poured. The record further discloses that Respondent's employees, as well as those of other contractors, lived and worked under what charitably may be termed as difficult conditions. As to the latter, besides the oftentimes hazardous nature[3] of the work, there were continuing problems caused by the lack of cold drinking water and insufficient toilet facilities and the less than sanitary nature of the latter. As to the former, given the distance of the project from Las Vegas and the apparent lack of facilities in Tonopah, all workers were forced to live as close as possible to the jobsite. The area where project workers chose to park their trailers and/or campers or otherwise set up temporary living facilities became known as the dry camp and is located 3–4 miles from the mine. Respondent's Exhibit 31 shows this area to be flat and open, and Buck Brown, the president of Buck Brown, Inc., described the site as follows: "[I]t was pretty dry. There was no water, no electricity, no sanitary facilities at all." According to Brown, Respondent had no role in selecting the site as a living area; the workers leased the area from the State of Nevada. However, he did agree to provide the employees with drinking water for the camp, $9000 worth of electrical equipment, and toilets that were taken from the jobsite to the dry camp.[4]

The record establishes that neither Buck Brown, Inc. nor A.S.C. Constructors is a Nevada corporation and that the former is based in Arizona. Accordingly, as Buck Brown, Inc. operated as the managing partner of the joint venture, all Respondent's senior management at the jobsite came from Arizona and worked there with the cooperation of the Union. Among these individuals were Jim Joy, the project manager. In this capacity, Joy was responsible for overseeing Respondent's operations at the jobsite, acting as the management spokesman at safety meetings and at grievance meetings with union officials, approving the hiring of individuals, and acting as the ultimate management authority in discharge cases.[5] Directly beneath Joy in Respondent's managerial hierarchy at the jobsite and also from Arizona were General Foremen Joe Lively and Sam Aiton Jr. (Aiton Jr.) and Superintendent Sam Aiton III (Aiton III). These three individuals, who, Respondent stipulated, were supervisors within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act, were responsible for work at designated areas of the project and directly supervised the foremen in each respective area, assisting the latter with their job duties. Beneath Lively, Aiton Jr., and Aiton III were the crew foremen, each of whom was assigned a crew of workers. Those carpenter crew foremen with, at least, five carpenter employees on their respective crews normally performed no production work, responsibly directed the work of their crewmembers, were authorized to arrange transfers of employees between crews, and, most significantly, seemingly possessed unfettered authority to terminate employees. In this regard, the record further establishes that it was the practice of Jim Joy not to overrule or otherwise undermine the authority of the crew foremen in discharge cases. Among Respondent's carpenter crew foremen at relevant times were "Obie" Bodiroga, Dennis Jensen, James D. Easter, Donald R. Davis, Bruce Alford, and John P. Hendershot Jr.[6]

2. Respondent's relationship with the Union and attitude toward employee-members thereof

The record reveals that a prejob conference was held in Phoenix, Arizona, in late February; that such was attended by managerial representatives of Buck Brown, Inc. and A.S.C. Constructors; and that all aspects of the forthcoming Anaconda Mining Tonopah project were discussed. Buck Brown candidly admitted that Jack Carney, the president of A.S.C. Constructors, demanded that the project be done on a nonunion basis. Asserting that he was a former union member and that his company has never worked on an open shop basis and alluding to Buck Brown, Inc.'s membership in the Arizona Associated General Contractors and its status through the membership as a signatory to collective-bargaining agreements with several labor organizations, Buck Brown testified that he "felt pretty adamant about not doing that . . . . [and] prevailed over Mr. Carney's strenuous objections" that the project should be on a union shop basis. However, the testimony of another witness suggests that self-interest rather than any pristine prounion sentiments were involved in Brown's decision. Thus, according to Robert Flinchum, after Carney set forth his demand, Buck Brown replied that inasmuch as the project was a great distance from "home," he wanted to utilize union personnel as they would be the most qualified.

In any event, Brown subsequently had a meeting in Las Vegas with Elmer Laub, the business manager of the Union, Cliff Kahle, an assistant business agent of the Union, and representatives of the Teamsters Union and the Operating Engineers Union. Brown told the union representatives that although he personally wanted union personnel doing the work on the project, he "was under a lot of pressure from Anaconda and Bechtel and [A.S.C.] to do the job open shop." During the ensuing discussion, Brown learned that despite the aforementioned, his company might not be free from labor problems on the job. Thus, Laub warned that "we could probably expect a worse labor market situation in Las Vegas than we were accustomed to working with Phoenix," explaining that the Union's membership included "rebels" and "radicals." As to this, Brown requested that

[3] For example, the work of the carpenters required the employees to sometimes work at heights of, at least, 15 to 30 feet off the ground—either standing on wooden scaffolding or dangling freely while supported only by a safety belt. In view of this, safety appears to have been a major concern of Respondent, with weekly meetings held for this reason attended by all supervisors and employees. Other matters concerning employee working conditions were raised and discussed during the meetings.

[4] Robert Flinchum, Respondent's business and office manager at the jobsite, testified that there has been an unusually high degree of employee turnover on the project. He opined that such was "probably due to the remote area of the job, and working conditions . . . . Living accommodations were nonexistent or very primitive at best."

[5] Based on the record as a whole, I find Joy to be a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act. Further, I shall draw no adverse inference from Joy's failure to testify at the hearing. It appears that, at the time of the hearing, Joy was working in Saudi Arabia and that Respondent was unable to contact him regarding testifying in its behalf. Accordingly, when testimony was offered as to Joy's conduct, I have particularly relied on the demeanor of the witnesses and the nature of the evidence in determining whether to credit such.

[6] The parties stipulated that Easter and Davis were supervisors within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act. The same appears true as to the others named, and I so find.

"anybody that would cause us any great . . . amount of problems" not be dispatched to the job by the Union. Subsequent to this meeting, Brown executed collective-bargaining agreements with all the construction craft unions, that between the Union and Respondent incorporated all the terms of the existing collective-bargaining agreement between several Nevada Carpenters union locals, including the Union, and the Nevada Associated General Contractors (R. Exh. 3) with the exception of the grievance and arbitration procedure (art. XV).[7]

The record further reveals that Respondent's project manager, Jim Joy, capitalized on Buck Brown's comments, regarding the pressure on Brown to perform the job on a nonunion basis, utilizing this as a "sword of Damocles" whenever union-related problems arose.[8] Thus, on May 7, Joy met with Laub and Kahle and employee-job steward Mike Herndon with regard to the discharge of employee Randal Fansler. During their meeting, Laub mentioned a threat by union members to picket the jobsite in protest of the discharge. According to Mike Herndon, after discussion concerning the legality of such action, Joy leaned back in his chair and said, "Ah, well, we're just going to give it all to Brown and Root.'" Cliffe Kahle testified that after being told of the possibility of a strike, Joy replied "that if things didn't work out and the men didn't get back to work, the basic thing that would happen was that Buck Brown would lose his contract . . . ." Joy added that the contract would probably be awarded to, and he thereupon gestured over his shoulder toward a window behind his chair, through which the Brown and Root yard was plainly visible.[9] I found Herndon and Kahle to be particularly credible and forthright witnesses and shall credit them as to the occurrence of this incident, noting that whether Joy mentioned Brown and Root or merely gestured toward its yard is a distinction without a difference.[10] In any event, the record also reveals that Joy repeated the identical threat at an early May safety meeting. According to the credible testimony of Herdon, while Joy was discussing the dry camp area, he said that he had given permission for its use by the Brown and Root employees "and that he didn't want any union problems . . . in the dry camp; and if there is any union problems, either there or in the job, that the whole job could go to Brown and Root, that they're waiting to take it all over."

Although Buck Brown denied repeating for his managerial staff at the jobsite Elmer Laub's warning that among the Union's membership were "rebels" and "radicals," the record discloses that Respondent's supervisors did little to disguise their anger and contempt and utilized blatantly coercive tactics to suppress such whenever carpenter-employees mentioned union involvement in job-related disputes, complained about their working conditions, or questioned supervisors about perceived contract violations and that most often manifestations of the foregoing were directed toward Job Steward Herndon, among whose duties was to present his membership's complaints to management. Herndon testified with regard to several instances of such harassment. He recalled an occasion in early May at which time while returning to his work area after speaking to employees at the reclaim tunnels, he was approached by Jim Joy and Aiton Jr. Each asked what he was doing there, and Joy said that he did not think Herndon should be walking around the projects so much and that "he was going to put me up on a hill where I could see the whole job area, with an umbrella and a water can, and that's where I would stay and sit for the whole 10 hours of the day." Aiton Jr. did not deny this comment, and I credit the forthright testimony of Herndon. On another occasion, a concrete pour was under way at the crusher building. Herndon approached the crew foreman, "Obie" Bodiroga, and asked the foreman if he wanted the men to take a lunch break. Bodiroga replied that he did and that he would oversee the pour in his crews' absence. Herndon replied that a crew foreman was not permitted to take possible overtime pay from a carpenter. Bodiroga thereupon said that an employee would be assigned to watch the remainder of the pour and also said, "We don't want to start a bunch of union problems out here." Bodiroga did not testify at the hearing, and I credit Herndon as to this conversation.

Don Davis, on whose crew Herndon worked, appears to have been the most vociferous of Respondent's supervisors in reacting to Herndon's job-related complaints. According to Herndon, his complaints to Davis usually concerned working conditions[11] or the latter's habit of

> 4. The provisions of Section XV of the above described labor agreement are excluded in their entirety from this memorandum agreement and the terms and conditions of such Section XV shall not apply in any manner to the union and the contractor signatory to this memorandum agreement. In the event a dispute should arise over terms of the agreement, the union and the contractor shall make an effort to resolve such dispute. However, failing such resolution, the union shall have the right to take any legal or economic action including, but not limited to, the right to withhold services of carpenters, refuse to dispatch carpenters, or strike an employer regarding the interpretation or application of any term or condition of the carpenters labor agreement or this memorandum agreement. This paragraph shall not be applicable to the enforcement of Section III of the labor agreement.

[8] The Union was well aware of the position of Buck Brown. Thus, Assistant Business Agent Kahle testified that Brown's comments were viewed as a "basic, open-shop threat . . . . And when I'm talking about the threat, that was the reason anytime anything happened up there that was critical to our position . . . we would hotfoot it up there . . . to straighten the problem out before it did blow out of context."

[9] Kahle testified that he was well aware that Brown and Root was the largest nonunion construction contractor in the United States and that the meaning of Joy's gesture was not lost on the participants: "that was a hammer that was used over the men's heads also."

[10] Honest men may differ as to their memory of the same event. Moreover, although I draw no inference from Joy's failure to testify in general and specifically about this incident, both Kahle and Herndon testified that Joy Lively was present at this meeting; he failed to deny the foregoing testimony.

[11] The record establishes that Herndon's complaints to working conditions normally were directed to the lack of cold drinking water and the unsanitary nature of the toilet facilities on the jobsite. The record further establishes that both concerns were based on the collective-bargaining agreement. Thus, sec. XVII(a) provides that both "iced drinking water" and "sanitary toilets" must be furnished by the employer on a jobsite at all times.

working with his tools.[12] Thus, one day, after he had been on the jobsite for approximately 1 month, Herndon spoke to Davis regarding the latter's use of his tools and the lack of decent working conditions on the project. Davis replied, "'You crybaby, you complain all the time about this. We're trying to get it worked out.'" Thereafter, according to Herndon, on "a couple of dozen times maybe" Davis repeated this comment after Herndon reported employee job-related complaints. The latter recalled one other particular conversation with Davis. Herndon was in the midst of complaining to another foreman about laborer-employees performing carpenter work when Davis approached. Davis asked about the nature of the complaint, and Herndon told him. Davis replied, "Yeah, that will be carpenters work. But we can't be starting all this union shit.'"

Davis admitted that Herndon complained to him several times regarding that lack of cold drinking water and the unsanitary condition of the toilet facilities and that Herndon also complained on occasion when Davis performed work with his tools.[13] Although he specifically denied calling Herndon a "crybaby" for expressing these admitted complaints, Davis' answers to the following questions cast doubt on his denial and, most significantly, illustrate Respondent's callous attitude toward its union member-employees:

BY JUDGE LITVACK:

Q. Well, did you ever call anybody cry baby on that project?

A. Yes.

Q. Who?

A. Yes, to the Nevada carpenters.

Q. Well you—

A. As a group.

Q. All right. Who did you make that statement to?

A. Old Sam, young Sam, to Joe Lively, to lots of people.

Q. Well to who?

A. I don't recall every person.

Q. Well, how many people did you tell that to? Did you tell that to other carpenters?

A. I don't recall.

. . . .

Q. Did you only make the statement to management officials of Buck Brown?

A. I don't recall.

Q. But you do—all right, who were you referring to when you made those statements? To anyone in particular?

A. No.

Q. All right. Now to what were you referring when you called the Nevada carpenters cry babies?

A. Their union contract is a lot different than Arizona's union contract and the circumstances that were up there where we were in a remote area,—and they expected to have when they came on the job the exact same things they had in Las Vegas, and when we were trying to suit that the best that we could, all being out of state and starting to familiarize ourselves, Mike Herndon was a great help in that he told us, you know, he brought things to our attention, but I mean, a lot of the stuff that they were crying about we were trying to work on and they just kept harping and crying about. And the—

Q. Who is they?

A. The carpenters from the State of Nevada.

Q. Yeah, but were these complaints directed to you personally?

A. No they weren't.

Q. So why were you using the term cry baby?

A. Because that is what I thought they were, and that is what I think they are still.

Q. Were you referring to Herndon when you used that terminology? Was he being a cry baby for bringing those complaints to you?

A. No.

Q. Then who was the cry baby?

. . . .

A. The Nevada carpenters.

Q. Okay, but not Mr. Herndon for bringing the complaints to you?

A. Not Mr. Herndon for bringing the complaints.

Q. All right. So the people who brought the complaints to Mr. Herndon were the cry babies?

A. Yeah.

Q. Did you have anyone in particular in mind when you did that?

A. No.

Q. Did you have any particular incidents in mind?

A. No.

Q. Did you have any particular complaints in mind?

A. No.

Q. Then why did you say cry babies? What were they crying about? Particularly, if you know?

A. I don't recall.

Q. But surely you had something in mind when you were calling everyone—all these Nevada carpenters cry babies. You must have had something in mind.

. . . .

MR. FOSTER: The witness is naturally trying to assist Your Honor in getting to the facts, I am not sure that he really knows what questions he is being asked.

BY JUDGE LITVACK:

Q. Do you understand the questions I am asking you?

A. Not really. I—I mean—

. . . .

Q. You did call those people cry babies?

A. Yes.

[12] The record establishes that Davis never had less than five carpenters on his crew. Sec. XXI of the collective-bargaining agreement, in part, states that a foreman, with five or more journeymen on his crew, may not work as a journeyman, except in assisting a journeyman or for the purpose of instruction.

[13] As to working with his tools, Davis asserted that such was limited to "when I felt it was appropriate or needed to assist in the work or in a teaching . . . opportunity or when I had to show somebody how I wanted the work done."

Q. All right. To management people and maybe to others?

A. I can't—

Q. Well, you either did or you didn't.

A. Yes, I called them cry babies.

Q. What I am asking you is what you were getting at when you made those statements. What were you referring to?

A. Is not a person entitled to his own opinion? Is not a person entitled to free conversation with somebody else?

Q. Whether you—

A. That was a—

Q. Go ahead.

A. That was a passing comment that they were a bunch of cry babies, that—

Q. Excuse me, was that a common held opinion by other management personnel of Buck Brown?

MR. FOSTER: Objection, Your Honor. How can he answer that?

JUDGE LITVACK:

Q. Was it?

A. Yeah, we agreed on it.[14]

As between Herndon and Davis, I credit the testimony of Herndon. As will be more closely examined and fully developed in regard to the discharge of employee Robert Kelly, I was not, at all, impressed with the demeanor of Davis as a witness.

The record reveals that other supervisors also reacted angrily and vituperatively to carpenter-employee complaints regarding perceived contract violations. Thus, Don Jackson and David Doran testified to a series of conversations with Joe Lively regarding the latter's alleged proclivity for performing carpenter work.[15] In early March, according to Jackson, 2 days after starting to work at the jobsite, he observed Lively loading materials and suggested to the latter that Lively have a carpenter do such work. Lively replied that he was the boss and could do what he wanted. Nothing more was said between them; however, Jackson subsequently was present on approximately four occasions during which Doran commented to Lively about the latter doing carpenter work. Jackson specifically recalled one such confrontation in mid-April when after both observed Lively doing rank-and-file work, Jackson and Doran approached Lively. Jackson stated that he had observed Lively doing carpenter work again and "I pleaded with him, asking to let us do the work for him . . . and that he should do his job as a general foreman and it could really help things get along." Doran then repeated what Jackson had stated, saying "that we believed things would go much smoother." After "indicating he didn't feel as though we had any legitimate complaint," Lively walked away. Fifteen minutes later, he returned and "said he'd like to have a heart-to-heart with us, man to man. He said that we were his two best workers, he appreciated the job we were doing, but that if we did not stop our complaining, that he was going to get our checks."[16] To this, both Doran and Jackson said that they wanted to do as much work as they could and would not complain as much about Lively's activities; Lively, in turn, responded that he would attempt to perform less employee work.

David Doran testified that he observed Joe Lively on four occasions during April performing carpenter work, normally either signaling to crane operators or hauling materials. On the initial three instances, Doran told Lively that if he needed more carpenters, Lively should hire them rather than perform the carpenter work himself. After Doran's initial complaint, Lively replied that he could do whatever he wanted but then said nothing after the next two complaints. Doran testified that the fourth incident occurred in late April. That morning, Doran observed Lively performing facets of carpenter work, and he and Jackson approached Lively, repeating that he should hire more carpenters rather than do their work. Lively apparently ignored them; however, that afternoon, Lively spoke to Doran and Jackson in the yard area. "He told us that if we continued to complain about him doing our work, he was going to have to get our checks." Also, "he had told us that we were the best carpenters he had on the job and he would hate to . . . get our checks for us but if we continued to complain . . . ."

Lively, who testified that he had been a union carpenter for 18 years, does not dispute that such a confrontation occurred and stated that he had two conversations with Jackson and Doran in March with regard to performing union work. On the first occasion, he was rigging panels when Doran and Jackson approached, and both said that he was required to stop doing the work. Lively responded that he did not have to stop as he had the right to do such work in Arizona and that he would continue until a business agent ordered him to stop. Doran replied that they would inform a business agent.[17]

[14] That Davis' admission was, in fact, Respondent's managerial response to and opinion regarding carpenter employee complaints is clear from the record. Thus, employee David Doran and Crew Foreman Don Jackson, who is a member of the Union, testified about a conversation between Jackson and General Foreman Joe Lively in late April. According to Jackson, who I found to be a particularly honest and candid witness, he was informed by another employee that Lively had labeled a carpenter crew, of which Randal Fansler was a member, "a bunch of crybabies because of their demands . . . ." Annoyed by Lively's suspected slur, after lunch that day, accompanied by Doran, Jackson confronted Lively and "asked him if he had called all the carpenters . . . crybabies, because of our demands . . . . He looked me straight in the eye . . . and said, 'No. No, I wasn't talking about you. It's the men down there,' point to the reclaim tunnel . . . . 'All they want to do is complain.'" Doran corroborated Jackson that the latter questioned Lively as to whether he had characterized the Las Vegas carpenters as crybabies and that Lively responded "that he was just talking about Randy Fansler and his crew." Joe Lively testified in great detail with regard to other matters but did not deny this conversation. Accordingly, I rely on the credible testimony of Jackson that this incident occurred, noting the corroborative testimony of Doran.

[15] Review of sec. XXI of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement discloses that general foremen are forbidden to work with their tools on a jobsite.

[17] Lively, who admitted being unaware of the Nevada Carpenters Union work rules, stated that in order to avoid a serious problem, he asked Doran and Jackson to help him do the work—"And so I wasn't taking any work away from a man."

Later, according to Lively, when three more panels were ready to be loaded onto a truck, he again began performing the rigging work himself. Just as on the previous occasion, Jackson and Doran questioned his right, as a general foreman, to do carpenter work. Lively replied, calling Doran and Jackson his two best workers and stating that although he appreciated their efforts, he wanted them to stop complaining. "And I told them that the work was still there. If they wanted it, fine. If they didn't want it, there was the office right over there, and the guy didn't run out of ink; he could write a check for them. That's exactly what I told him."[18] Asked why he threatened Jackson and Doran with termination, Lively explained "because we'd have a lot of problems at the beginning of the job and having a hard time getting started and we couldn't afford to have any union problems."

Another supervisor who reacted in a similar manner to "problems" caused by members of the Union was Superintendent Aiton III. Wendell Bridges testified that immediately after being notified of his own termination on May 15 by Supervisor James Easter, he encountered Aiton III near Respondent's office trailer. According to Bridges, he asked, "Wasn't my work satisfactory?" Aiton III replied, "'That's not the point. I have to back my foremen up . . . . Anyone that creates any problems from now on is going down the road.'" Bridges impressed me as being a candid and reliable witness, and Aiton III, who testified at length as to other matters, did not deny this incident. Accordingly, I credit Bridges as to this matter, noting that the coercive comment by Aiton III is corroborative of the admissions of Don Davis and illustrative of Respondent's attitude toward members of the Union generally.[19]

B. The Discharge of Randal Fansler

1. Facts

Randal Fansler had been a journeyman carpenter for approximately 8 years prior to the instant hearing and a member of the Union since April 1977. Having been requested by name by Joe Lively, Fansler was dispatched to work for Respondent at the Anaconda Mining jobsite in Tonopah on March 28.[20] At the time Fansler reported to work at the mine project, there were only five or six carpenter employees, including Don Jackson and Dave Doran, working, and for the next 2 or 3 weeks they all worked on the same crew, constructing wall forms for the crusher building under the supervision of "Obie" Bodiroga.[21] Fansler testified that about April 16 or 17 Lively announced that carpenters were needed for work at the reclaim tunnels and that Bodiroga chose Fansler and an apprentice to work at that area, with Lively as the foreman. Two or three days later, Bodiroga spoke to Fansler near the reclaim tunnels, said that Respondent needed "a good man" to run things in that area, and asked whether Fansler would take that responsibility. Fansler refused. According to Fansler, 2 days later, on a Friday, Bodiroga spoke to him again with regard to his offer that Fansler assume responsibility at the reclaim tunnels. Fansler replied that he had reconsidered and would take the foreman position.

Fansler further testified that on the following Monday, April 21, he spoke to Lively at the reclaim tunnels area and that Lively gave him the job plans for that area "and said he would get me more money." Although admitting that neither Bodiroga nor Lively specifically stated that he was being promoted to a foreman position, based on the foregoing, the extent of his authority, and his job duties, Fansler believed[22] that he had been appointed as the carpenter crew foreman at the reclaim tunnels[23] and [18] Lively asserts that after specifically being advised by Union Officials Laub and Kahle that he was not permitted to do such work, he ceased performing any rigging work on the project.

[19] Counsel for Respondent argues that there is no evidence to support a finding of general antiunion animus on Respondent's part. He points to Buck Brown, Inc.'s long history of stable labor relations in Arizona, the absence of prior unfair labor practices, the fact that Respondent met with union representatives on several occasions to settle disputes at the jobsite, and Respondent's efforts to solve, or at least alleviate, the aggravating cold drinking water and toilet facilities problems as evidence establishing that Respondent harbored no antiunion animus. Contrary to Respondent, I believe the weight of the above-described credited testimony and admissions strongly suggests that Respondent's supervisory staff at the Tonopah jobsite, either based on forewarning by Buck Brown, or early difficulties with the progress of work at the project, harbored a jaundiced view toward members of the Union, who they universally viewed as "crybabies" and were eminently capable of using blatant antiunion threats in order to avoid union problems. Thus, notwithstanding a history of peaceful labor relations in Arizona, given the pressure that Buck Brown had been under to perform the job on an open shop basis and Respondent's lack of familiarity with union attitudes and practices in Nevada, I have no hesitancy in crediting the evidence adduced by the General Counsel regarding Respondent's general antiunion animus. Likewise, Respondent's willingness to resolve jobsite disputes and to attempt to rectify working condition problems can be traced to the terms of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement, which requires such resolution of disputes and permits the Union to strike if disputes are not settled, and, thus, to its own self-interests.

[20] The record discloses that Don Jackson was among the first group of carpenters to be dispatched to work for Respondent in Tonopah; that he subsequently met Fansler and the latter expressed an interest in working on the mine project; and that Jackson recommend the hiring of Fansler to Lively.

[21] After only 2 or 3 days on the job, Fansler was laid off due to a lack of materials. According to Fansler, Lively assured him that he would be recalled as soon as materials arrived. Indeed, Fansler was quickly referred to the Tonopah jobsite on April 4 and began working again on April 7.

[22] Fansler testified that on April 21 and 22, he supervised the carpenter crew's work on the reclaim tunnels, checking that all form construction was performed in accord with Lively's instructions and making sure that proper materials were supplied and utilized. The record establishes such is the normal work of a foreman at the jobsite. Also in this regard, Don Jackson testified that Fansler reported to him that Fansler had been given a foreman position by Respondent.

[23] Contrary to whatever Fansler believed, Joe Lively testified that not only did the former specifically refuse to become a foreman, but also Fansler had ultimately been offered—and accepted—a leadman position. According to Lively, inasmuch as Bodiroga planned to be absent from the project for a short period and in recognition of his superior work, Fansler was offered a foreman job by first Bodiroga and then Lively. However, "he told us flatly. He said, I don't want the foreman's job." At that point, continued Lively, "I said, well, I'll just make it right by paying you more money and just call you a leadman. So that's what we did." Lively added, "And we also told him that we were just starting to build this thing and that if he produced . . . he would probably have a crew all of his own . . . ."

worked that day and the next under that assumption. By the following Wednesday, April 23, the carpenter crew under Fansler had increased from four to six employees. Therefore, on that day, prior to 9 a.m., Fansler approached Lively in the reclaim tunnels area and announced that he would no longer use his tools as there was more than the contractual quota of four men on his crew. Lively replied, "'You're not a foreman. I'm giving you welder's pay.'" Fansler responded that if such was his wage rate, he did not want supervisory responsibility and that he would rather work with his tools. Lively left the area, and Fansler announced to his crew that he was not a foreman as he was no longer being paid a foreman's wages;[24] that he no longer wanted the duties of a foreman; and that the crew should look elsewhere for supervision.

The record establishes that later that morning during a break period, Fansler spoke to Job Steward Herndon and complained that Lively was not properly compensating him for his job duties as a foreman. Fansler explained that he thought he had been performing foreman duties and believed he was, in fact, a foreman and said that he wanted the matter resolved. Shortly after lunch, Herndon reported back to Fansler that he had not received a satisfactory explanation from Respondent and that he had spoken to Elmer Laub, who would visit the jobsite the next day. Two hours later, at approximately 2 p.m., Lively approached Fansler in the reclaim tunnel area. According to Fansler, Lively "asked me why I had come in contact with [Herndon]." Fansler replied that when anyone tried "to screw" him out of pay, he was entitled to speak to the job steward in order to resolve the matter. Lively responded, "Well, all you Las Vegas carpenters are a bunch of crybabies anyway." After Fansler tried to defend the reputation of the Union, Lively turned and walked away. Later that afternoon, according to Fansler, in an obvious attempt to assuage Fansler and defuse a potential problem for himself and Respondent, Lively spoke to Fansler and apologized, stating that the foregoing resulted from a misunderstanding, that Fansler was a good worker, and that Lively hoped that Fansler did not quit.

Lively's efforts were too late and to no avail, for Union Officials Laub and Kahle visited the jobsite the next day. According to Kahle, he and Laub spoke to Lively that morning, raising the matter of Fansler's status as a foreman and his payment in that job classification. Lively replied "That Randy was a good hand and that he would like to give him the pay, but his management wouldn't allow him to pay the extra money on the situation." However, Lively did agree to make up what Fansler lost "in the guise of overtime pay," and Laub said that he would speak to Fansler. Kahle further testified that Laub presented the settlement to Fansler and that the latter accepted the bargain. Thereupon, according to Fansler, he and Laub met with Lively in the reclaim tunnel area. Lively repeated what he said the previous afternoon—apologizing and saying it was all just a big misunderstanding. "He shook my hand, said that we'd get the pay matter straightened out for the three days that I was foreman through welder's pay . . . and that he again hoped I wouldn't quit and needed me as a worker on the project." Fansler admitted that this settlement was a "satisfactory" resolution of the problem; that by his termination date, he had received all the payment which, he believed, was due him; and that I never had another cross word with [Lively]."

Lively's version of the resolution of the aforementioned dispute differs substantially from that of Fansler and Kahle. He testified that shortly after Fansler accepted the leadman position, while Lively was driving toward the crusher building, he observed Fansler talking to Herndon at least 100 yards from Fansler's work area. Later, Herndon approached Lively and said that there was a problem with Fansler because "he's short some money." Lively replied that the matter could be straightened out because money is not a problem. Thereupon, according to Lively, he spoke to Fansler who appeared to be upset. "I asked him . . . Mike says you got a problem." Fansler responded that "his pay was all messed up."[25] Lively replied that such could be easily corrected.[26] "And I took him in the truck over to the office and between Flinchum and I, we got it straightened out." Lively specifically denied the involvement of the Union in this matter—"[t]he Union officials didn't have anything to do with it."[27]

[24] According to the union collective-bargaining agreement job classification and wage rate schedule, "the hourly wage scale for foreman shall not be less than 10 percent more than the hourly wage scale of the craftsmen over whom they have supervision." Further, as of April 23, a carpenter welder earned 35 cents more per hour than a journeyman carpenter. As Fansler testified, he expected to earn more than what Lively apparently was willing to pay.

[25] Fansler and Lively contradict each other not only as to conversations regarding the pay dispute but also as to the basis of the dispute. Thus, to Fansler, the matter concerned his job classification and accompanying wage rate although Lively testified that the dispute merely concerned Fansler's receiving the wrong amount of wages. As between Fansler and Lively, I credit Fansler inasmuch as he impressed me as being a more truthful and forthright witness than Lively. Accordingly, I credit Fansler that the dispute concerned his entitlement to be paid at the foreman's wage rate. Further, notwithstanding that he may not have specified that Fansler would be placed in a foreman position, I do not credit Lively that he offered, and Fansler accepted, a leadman position at the carpenter welder wage rate. In this regard, I note that there is no such classification in the union contract; that Fansler, who exhibited a familiarity with the terms of the agreement, would not, I believe, have accepted promotion to a nonexistent position; and that Lively, who admitted no knowledge of the union contract, stated that there was not even a leadman classification in the Arizona Carpenters Union contract. Based on the foregoing, what is clear is that after he spoke to Lively on April 21 and after the latter handed the job plans to Fansler on that date, Fansler possessed a good-faith belief that he was the carpenter foreman at the reclaim tunnels.

[26] Lively denied that Fansler was a crybaby for going to Herndon with his problem but admits, "I asked him why he didn't discuss it with me first."

[27] Lively did admit that his resolution of Fansler's pay problem was disclosed to union officials—"That was mentioned, but we told them immediately it had already been taken care of." Lively places this disclosure at a time of a dispute with the Union over subsistence payments to union members. Such a meeting did take place, with Respondent ultimately agreeing to apply a double time rate but not agreeing to the Union's interpretation of the collective-bargaining agreement. However, whether Lively discussed the Fansler problem is highly doubtful inasmuch as, according to R. Exh. 25, the subsistence dispute was apparently resolved about April 11—at least 10 days prior to the date Fansler was placed in charge of the carpenter crew at the reclaim tunnels.

I have previously noted that Cliff Kahle impressed me as being an honest and candid witness and as between Fansler and Lively, I found the former to have been the more honest and forthright. Accordingly, I credit the testimonies of Fansler and Kahle as to resolution of the pay dispute—particularly with regard to the Union's involvement therein.[28] I further note that Lively asserted that he and Flinchum, Respondent's office manager, resolved the Fansler matter. However, Flinchum, who testified with regard to his involvement in several payroll disputes, did not corroborate Lively as to this matter.

After the resolution of his wage dispute, Fansler continued working at the reclaim tunnels on the carpenter crew. Approximately 1 week later, Lively informed Fansler that he was needed by Bodiroga to work on the latter's carpenter crew at the crusher building while concrete pours were ongoing and that when these were completed, he would be transferred back to the reclaim tunnels crew. Thereafter, until his discharge, Fansler worked on the crew that was supervised by Bodiroga. According to Fansler, during this time period he spoke to Bodiroga and Lively several times about returning to the reclaim tunnels area and both said that he could ultimately do so.[29] Finally, in the afternoon of May 5, Bodiroga told Fansler "that I was going to be transferred to the other crew shortly and he hated to lose me."

Fansler testified that at approximately 12 noon on May 6, Bodiroga informed him that he should have his tools ready by 2:30 p.m. as he would be transferred to Don Jackson's crew. Thereupon, Lively approached him in a pickup truck at that hour; Fansler loaded his tools in the back and got in. Contrary to his expectations, Lively handed him a check and a termination notice, saying "Here's your money."[30] After studying the notice, Fansler asked why he was being terminated "in that he knew darned well that I was a qualified workman . . . ." Lively replied "that he didn't need a reason to fire me, that my job was ended and that was that." Lively stopped the truck in the parking lot. Fansler got out, noticed Herndon standing nearby, and asked the latter to ascertain the reason for Lively's action. Thereupon, Fansler accompanied Herndon over to Lively, and Herndon asked Lively for an explanation. Lively replied that he did not need a reason—Fansler was fired and that was the end of it.

Meanwhile, a supervisory meeting was scheduled for that afternoon. Several foremen were already assembled in Respondent's trailer when Don Jackson arrived. He immediately was informed that Fansler had been terminated that afternoon; when Lively walked in, Jackson asked him what had happened and for an explanation. According to Jackson's credible testimony, Lively replied that he did not want to talk about it; Fansler had been fired, "that's it." Jackson said, "'You just have a personal problem with Mr. Fansler . . .'"; Lively responded, "'Yes, I do.'" Jackson thereupon said that he had specifically requested certain men for his crew; that Lively had agreed; and "that if he didn't hire Mr. Fansler back, that if he didn't put him on my crew, that I would quit . . . ." Lively just shrugged his shoulders and said okay.[31] Jackson stormed out of the meeting and met Jim Joy as the latter was walking toward the trailer. Jackson explained what had happened and asked Joy to rehire Fansler. Joy "told me that he . . . did not want to override Mr. Lively's decision."

After speaking to Herndon and Lively, Fansler returned to the dry camp and began informing other carpenters of his discharge. Previously angered over perceived contract violations, including the lack of cold drinking water and sanitary toilet facilities, the carpenter employees became incensed over what they believed constituted an unjustifiable discharge and calls for a wildcat strike ensued. That night, Fansler telephoned Laub in Las Vegas and requested that he and Kahle come to Tonopah as soon as possible.

The record establishes that both Laub and Kahle visited the jobsite and dry camp the next day (May 7) and that their major concern, in view of the perilous nature of the Union's relationship with Respondent, was the possibility of a wildcat strike over Fansler's termination. Thus, according to Kahle, investigating the strike threat was his and Laub's main concern that day. Kahle testified that on arriving at the mine project he, Laub, and Herndon met with Jim Joy and Lively in Respondent's office trailer. Regarding Fansler, Lively stated that Fansler "had dropped the ball" since the union officials had last been on the project. Kahle asked, why, inasmuch as 2 weeks before Lively said that Fansler was a topnotch hand. Rather than offering an explanation, Lively repeated that Fansler had just "dropped the ball" after acting as foreman, Laub then stated that he want to patch up all differences and to have Fansler return to work. Joy responded that he would back up his men and that when a decision was reached, he would back them "100 percent." At that point, according to Kahle and as described above, the discussion concerned the possibility of a wildcat strike. The meeting concluded with a discussion of the drinking water and toilet problems and Respondent's efforts to correct these. While stating that Aiton Jr. also attended the meeting, Herndon's testimony regarding what was discussed is corroborative of Kahle's version. According to the job steward, the meeting [28] This, I believe, constituted Lively's second dispute with the Union—first being his rebuke from union officials regarding his practice of performing unit work, including the rigging of panels. The record establishes that as a union member, Lively was well aware of the possibility of fines for violating union work rules.

[29] When Fansler was transferred to Bodiroga's crew, Don Jackson was promoted to foreman over the carpenter crew at the reclaim tunnels. Jackson credibly testified that he immediately requested that Lively transfer Fansler back to his crew and that Lively agreed, saying he needed Fansler at the crusher building because of a manpower shortage there and Jackson could have Fansler on his crew "once they got squared away . . . ." Jackson further testified that he renewed his request for Fansler about 10 days later and that Lively replied that the work on the crusher building was almost completed and Fansler would be placed on Jackson's crew that afternoon or as soon as possible. According to Jackson, Lively said nothing about problems with Fansler's work either in these conversations or at any supervisory meetings, during which Lively did complain about other employees. Lively did not deny this testimony.

[30] The termination notice bore a checkmark next to the notation, "Too slow—poor work."

began with Kahle raising certain problems regarding working conditions—including the lack of cold drinking water and the unsanitary toilet facilities. Joy replied that Respondent was trying to obtain an ice machine and have the outhouses cleaned more frequently. Kahle then mentioned Fansler and asked if he could be reinstated onto another crew, under a new foreman. "Joy said that it was his foreman's decision to terminate him and that he was going to back his foreman's decision on that matter." Laub responded that Fansler had been offered a foreman's job 2 weeks earlier and that he did not understand why he was now being terminated for poor, slow work. Lively replied "that in that two week period he had just changed his attitude toward the whole job anymore." Thereupon, after discussing the employees' threat of a wildcat strike, as described above, Joy agreed that Don Jackson could return to work as he performed well as a foreman and Respondent wanted him back.[32]

Denying that the pay dispute, at all, influenced his decision, Lively stated that Fansler was discharged "because his work had ceased almost. From the time that the incident happened . . . he steadily progressed downhill. He wouldn't do anything that you programmed him to do. He would do it, but it was slow and just an attitude that you can't live with when you're trying to build something." As an example, Lively testified that on one occasion, he approached Fansler and observed the latter just standing there, looking around. When he asked why, Fansler replied that he needed "some 4 x 4's." Lively further testified that a stack of such pieces was located no more than 20 to 30 feet from where Fansler stood. Admitting that, as was his practice, he never discussed what he noticed about Fansler's deteriorating work habits with the latter, Lively testified that he did speak to Fansler on one occasion subsequent to the resolution of the pay dispute: "I asked him . . . if he still had any bad feelings . . . about the money or anything else. And he said, no. But he didn't produce."[33] Finally, Lively corroborated Fansler that the latter was extremely upset over the reason for his termination, saying, "I don't understand how you can do that . . . ."[34]

Regarding his work after having been transferred to Bodiroga's crew on the crusher, Fansler testified that the former praised his work many times. Further, according to Fansler, he did things "beyond the call of duty" such as spotting a bad tie rod and reporting it. He denied ever having been told what to do. Corroborating Fansler, carpenter Charles DeLong, who reported for work at the jobsite on approximately April 21 and worked alongside Fansler at the crusher building, testified that Fansler was a very good carpenter and that he heard no foreman ever complain about his work. Also with regard to Fansler's job performance, Mike Herndon, who was on the carpenter crew at the crusher building, testified, "I thought he was a good carpenter and a knowledgable carpenter."

The General Counsel contends that a cause of Fansler's termination was his complaining about the jobsite toilet facilities during the weekly safety meetings. According to Fansler, these meetings were held each Monday and were attended by all employees, including the entire supervisory staff. Jim Joy conducted the sessions; the purpose was twofold—to discuss, promote, and improve safety conditions and to "air" employee gripes and job complaints. Fansler further testified that employees generally complained about the less than adequate toilet facilities, the lack of cold drinking water, and other perceived contract violations. He stated that he was one of the complainers and that he spoke up at several meetings regarding the number of and the condition of the toilets on the jobsite. During cross-examination, Fansler admitted that several other employees raised the identical complaint and that his complaints did not "stand out."—"I just said, 'Hey, the toilets stink. They're not clean.'"

2. Anaylsis

The consolidated amended complaint alleges that Fansler was discharged by Respondent in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. The General Counsel contends that Fansler was terminated by Respondent for having engaged in protected concerted activities, including complaining about the lack of and unsanitary nature of the jobsite outhouse facilities, demanding foreman's wages, and involving his job steward and ultimately the Union in the latter dispute. Counsel further contends that Lively harbored animus toward members of the Union and that the reasons that were advanced by Respondent for Fansler's discharge are pretextual in nature. Contrary to the General Counsel, Respondent argues that there exists no record evidence of animus towards Fansler inasmuch as his pay dispute was satisfactorily resolved and apparently not a subject of contention at the time of his discharge. Further, it is argued that Fansler was terminated for cause and not based on his involvement with the Union or other protected concerted activities.

As recognized by the parties, a determination of the legality of Fansler's discharge and, indeed, that of the other alleged discriminatees is governed by the traditional precepts of Board law in Section 8(a)(1) and (3) discharge cases, as modified by the Board's decision in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981). Thus, in order to establish a prima facie violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, the General Counsel must establish (1) that the individual engaged in union or other protected concerted activities; (2) that the employer had knowledge of the activities; (3) that the employer's actions were motivated by union animus; and (4) that the discharge had the effect of encouraging or discouraging membership in a labor organization. WMUR-TV, 253 NLRB 697, 703 (1980). Further, [32] Fansler testified that Kahle and Laub came to the dry camp after speaking to Joy at the jobsite. No work was performed that day because of inclement weather conditions. The carpenters were gathered in a group, and after the union officials arrived, Laub reported on his meeting. He announced that Respondent would rehire Jackson but not Fansler. When calls for a strike ensued, Laub calmed them, advising that a strike would be detrimental to their, and the Union's, interests.

[33] Apparently this conversation occurred prior to Fansler's transfer to Bodiroga's crew, for, according to Lively, the move was influenced by his hope that Fansler would improve.

[34] As to whether at the time of Fansler's discharge, he was aware that Fansler had received all the extra wages to which he was entitled, Lively testified, "I think he'd received it the week before if I'm not mistaken because it wasn't that much."

the General Counsel has the burden of proving the aforementioned by a preponderance of the evidence. Gonic Mfg. Co., 141 NLRB 201, 209 (1963). Although the aforementioned analysis was easily applied in cases in which the employer's motivation was straightforward, conceptual problems arose whenever dual motivation was involved—the presence of both a lawful cause and an unlawful cause for the discharge. In order to resolve this ambiguity, in Wright Line, supra, the Board established the following causation test in all 8(a)(1) and (3) cases involving employer motivation. "First, we shall require that the General Counsel make a prima facie showing sufficient to support the inference that protected conduct was a 'motivating factor' in the employer's decision. Once this is established, the burden will shift to the employer to demonstrate that the same action would have taken place even in the absence of the protected conduct." Id. at 1089. Two points are relevant to the foregoing test. First, in concluding that the General Counsel has established a prima facie violation of the Act, the Board will not "quantitatively analyze" the effect of the unlawful motive. The existence of such is sufficient to make a discharge a violation of the Act. Id. at 1089 fn. 14. Second, although apparently warranting the identical analytical approach, pretextual discharge cases should be viewed as those in which the "defense of business justification is wholly without merit." Id. at 1084 fn. 5.

Herein, there can be no question that Fansler engaged in union and other activities protected by the Act. Thus, I have previously concluded that, although unstated, Fansler believed in good faith that he had been promoted by Lively to the position of foreman;[35] that Fansler's demand for higher wages was based on the formula for determining the wage rate for a foreman as set forth in the Union's collective-bargaining agreement; that Fansler sought and obtained the aid of the Union in his pay dispute with Respondent; and that union officials were instrumental in concluding a settlement of the dispute with Respondent. The Board has long held—and Respondent concedes—that in seeking an employer's compliance with the terms and conditions of an existing collective-bargaining agreement, an employee engaged in union and protected concerted activities within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act and that an employer engages in conduct violative of the Act by disciplining an employee for the activity. NLRB v. Pioneer Concrete Co., 637 F.2d 698 (9th Cir. 1981); City Disposal Systems, 256 NLRB 451 (1981); Corry Jamestown Corp., 238 NLRB 320 (1978); Adams Delivery Service, 237 NLRB 1411 (1978); Roadway Express, 217 NLRB 278 (1975). This is so notwithstanding that an employee may act on an individual basis, for complaints under a contract are to the interest and benefit of all employees and the punishment of a complaining employee necessarily may tend to inhibit other employees from implementing the protections afforded by a union contract. Bay-Wood Industries, 249 NLRB 403, 406–407 (1980); Corry Jamestown, supra at 323; Delta Electric, 236 NLRB 1108, 1112 (1978). Further, the merits of the employee's complaint are irrelevant. G & M Underground Contracting Co., 239 NLRB 78 (1978); Perrenoud, Inc., 236 NLRB 804, 805 (1978); United Parcel Service, 234 NLRB 483, 491 (1978). The Board has also long held that efforts to enlist the assistance of a union in raising complaints concerning working conditions or grievances under a collective-bargaining agreement constitute union and protected concerted activity and that disciplining an employee for doing so interferes with, restrains, and coerces employees and tends to discourage union activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Harper & Arterburn Co., 255 NLRB 760 1981); Perrenoud, Inc., supra; Interboro Contractors, 157 NLRB 1295 (1966), enfd. 388 F.2d 495 (2d Cir. 1967).

Respondent further concedes—and the record clearly establishes—that it was well aware of Fansler's contractual assertion and the Union's role in the dispute. What Respondent disputes is the assertion of the General Counsel that the aforementioned were the motivating factors in Lively's decision to discharge Fansler. Close scrutiny of the record establishes the existence of ample evidence of union animus. Initially, I reiterate my prior conclusions that Respondent's supervisory staff generally viewed members of the Union as "crybabies" for constantly complaining about perceived contract violations and that supervisors utilized blatantly coercive threats to dissuade union employees from engaging in protected activities. Specifically, as to Joe Lively, I have credited the testimony of Don Jackson, as corroborated by David Doran, that Lively threatened to terminate them if they did not stop complaining that he was performing carpenter work in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement. In this regard, Lively admittedly complied only on being informed by union officials that to continue to do so would be in violation of the Union's work rules, which, he was well aware, would subject him to the possibility of fines. That the involvement of the Union in work disputes was an anathema to Lively is clear from his comment to Fansler (why didn't Fansler come to him first) on learning that the latter had complained to job steward—and union agent—Herndon about his wage dispute. In that same conversation, Lively called Fansler and the other union employees "crybabies." I specifically credit Fansler's uncontroverted testimony in this regard, noting that Lively did not controvert the testimonies of Jackson and Doran that Lively later repeated this same epithet to Jackson. Finally, in agreement with the General Counsel, I found wholly incredible Lively's testimony in which he attempted to minimize the involvement of the Union in Fansler's wage dispute. Not only is such at utter variance with the credited testimony but also it clearly buttresses the contention of the General Counsel that the involvement of the Union in Fansler's dispute—and the concomitant possibility of internal union discipline for his conduct—was the motivating factor in Lively's discharge of Fansler.

[35] I specifically reject the argument of counsel for Respondent that Fansler could not have believed that he had been promoted to the position of foreman. This argument is solely based on Fansler's admission that neither Bodiroga nor Lively uttered the word "foreman" to Fansler. However, Fansler credibly testified that on April 21 and 22 he performed all the duties that are associated with that position. Further, I have discredited the testimony of Lively that Fansler accepted promotion to a leadman position. Finally, and most significantly, based on the Union's collective-bargaining agreement, there exists no other position but foreman to which Fansler could have been promoted in order to "run things" at the reclaim tunnels area.

Respondent makes two main arguments in support of the lack of union animus. First, counsel contends that Fansler's wage dispute was settled and no longer a matter of controversy when Fansler was terminated. In this regard, counsel points out that both Fansler and Kahle testified that the pay dispute was satisfactorily resolved; that, according to Fansler, Lively was apologetic to him and to the union officials over the problem; that, according to Fansler, his relations with Lively after the settlement of the dispute were extremely cordial; and that both Herndon and Kahle testified that Lively mentioned Fansler's deteriorating job performance as the reason for his discharge. Although quite cogent and logical, I nevertheless am not persuaded by these arguments for the following reasons. Lively did not deny Don Jackson's credible testimony that at a supervisor's meeting subsequent to Fansler's discharge, in response to Jackson's comment that Lively had a personal problem with Fansler, Lively said, "'Yes, I do.'" I find this comment to constitute, in effect, an admission, for I believe it more likely that Lively would be candid as to the true reasons for his conduct in the "friendly" atmosphere of a supervisor's meeting than in the "adversarial" atmosphere of a meeting with union officials. Again, Lively's attempt to minimize the involvement of the Union in the pay dispute strongly supports this view and suggests that such was, indeed, his personal problem with Fansler. Further, in agreement with the General Counsel, aware of the possibility of internal union disciplinary procedures, Lively's apologetic attitude toward Fansler and the union officials at the settlement meeting and his later cordial attitude toward Fansler is not surprising. Respondent's second contention concerns the timing of the discharge, occurring at least 12 days after resolution of the pay dispute and at a time when such was "seemingly a dead issue." This, I believe, obfuscates the true issue, for rather than the dispute itself, the record establishes that Fansler's involvement of the Union in the matter was the motivating factor in his discharge. Also, according to Fansler, his discharge coincided with the completion of Respondent's compliance with the terms of the pay settlement, a fact, the record reveals, about which Lively was apparently aware. Finally, a lapse of time between displays of animus and a discharge does not, without more, negate substantial evidence of unlawful animus. Lauderdale Lakes General Hospital, 227 NLRB 1412, 1413 (1977). Based on the foregoing,[36] and the record as a whole, I believe that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that Respondent's decision to terminate Fansler was based on unlawful considerations—his involvement of the Union in his wage dispute with Joe Lively.[37]

The burden of proof, thus, shifted to Respondent to demonstrate that it would have reached the same decision and taken the same action notwithstanding Fansler's protected concerted activities. In establishing its defense, Respondent relies solely on the uncorroborated testimony of Lively who testified that after the resolution of the pay dispute, Fansler's job performance "steadily progressed downhill" and his work was slow. The only example that Lively was able to relate was an incident during which Fansler, apparently ignorant of a nearby supply of wood, stood helplessly, unable to locate a 4 by 4 piece of wood. Analysis of the record convinces me that this evidence is pretextual and wholly without merit. Initially, as I have previously stated, Lively did not impress me as being a particularly honest or candid witness, and I cannot credit his testimony. In this regard, Lively did not controvert the credible testimony of Don Jackson that, while identifying several other bad workers, Lively never once complained about Fansler's deteriorating work quality and, in fact, on two occasions promised that Fansler would be transferred to Jackson's crew when work permitted. Also, if Fansler's work was deteriorating, it is strange that Lively would not speak to the former and either ascertain why or warn him to improve or face discharge. Yet, Lively admitted not doing so, and I cannot accept his explanation that he normally left such problem employees alone. In this regard, Lively could not even give an explanation to Herndon and Fansler for the latter's discharge. Further, the individual who was most closely aware of Fansler's job performance prior to his discharge was his foreman Bodiroga. Yet, Respondent failed to call him as a witness to corroborate Lively's unsubstantiated testimony. Presumably, he would not have done so.[38] Finally, several witnesses testified to the quality of Fansler's work as a carpenter, stating such was of a high quality. Accordingly, I do not believe that Respondent has met its burden of proof as to the discharge of Randal Fansler and conclude that he was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.[39]

[36] I note Respondent's reliance on Vogt-Conant Co., 248 NLRB 500 (1980), as support for its arguments regarding the discharge of Fansler. Suffice to say, if I viewed the facts as urged by counsel, the decision would be determinative. I believe the record clearly supports—and warrants—the conclusion that Respondent did, indeed, harbor animus towards Fansler for his actions.

[37] I place no reliance on Fansler's "complaints" at Respondent's weekly safety meetings as a motivating factor for his discharge. Thus, his conduct was hardly disruptive or outstanding, and Fansler admitted that his toilet complaints merely echoed those of numerous other employees.

[38] Utilizing the Wright Line, supra, rationale, it was Respondent's burden to establish that Fansler would have been discharged notwithstanding his union activities, and it was, therefore, Respondent's obligation to call its own corroborative witnesses. In this regard, it cannot be said that Bodiroga would have been a neutral witness, for as Respondent's foreman, he presumably was under the control of that party. I am not unmindful of the Board's recent dicta in Wayne Construction, 259 NLRB 571 at fn. 1 (1981), but note that the cited decision involves a neutral employee witness. Bodiroga can hardly be so considered. See Colorflo Decorator Products, 228 NLRB 408, 410 (1977).

[39] Counsel for Respondent points to the testimonies of Herndon and Kahle as corroboration for Lively's explanation for Fansler's discharge. I do not agree. Although both testified that, during the meeting subsequent to the discharge with Lively and Joy, the former explained that Fansler was discharged because of deteriorating work, in light of Lively's admission to Jackson that there was a personal problem between Fansler and himself and Lively's statement to Fansler at the time of the discharge that Lively did not need a reason to fire Fansler, I believe that Lively was less than candid in his reply to the union officials on May 7.

C. The Discharge of Robert Kelly

1. Facts

Robert Kelly, who has been a carpenter by trade for 10 years and a member of the Union for approximately 3 years, visited Respondent at the Tonopah jobsite on April 23, accompanied by two other carpenters. They spoke to Lively and Aiton Jr. and the latter took their names and telephone numbers. Kelly was called "by name" the next day at the Union's hiring hall and was dispatched to work for Respondent at the mine project. He reported for work that same day (April 24) and worked until his discharge on May 14. The record reveals that Kelly's foreman during his employment by Respondent was Don Davis; that in his initial few days of work he worked directly for Davis, constructing wall forms in the ball-and-sag area of the concentrator building; that he was transferred to the yard area for the next 2-week period, working under a working foreman, Larry Perrin;[40] and that from May 9–14, Kelly again worked directly under Davis at the concentrator building, building wall forms.

The record establishes that all employee complaints to Respondent, regarding working conditions, potential grievances, or other matters, were to be channeled through the job stewards—Mike Herndon, for example. The record also establishes that when Herndon, in particular, passed the complaints on to Respondent's supervisory personnel, he was careful never to identify the employee involved. Despite this procedure, the testimony of Robert Kelly indicates that he was not reticent about himself complaining—or, at least, making his feelings known—to his foreman, Don Davis, with regard to perceived contractual violations or other matters. Thus, according to Kelly, during his initial period under Davis' direct supervision, he observed Davis, who never had less than five carpenters on his crew, on more than one occasion working with tools or otherwise performing unit work. Kelly testified that after one such instance, he asked Davis if he was allowed to work with his tools, and Davis replied that he was a working foreman.[41] In addition, besides speaking out about these matters at the weekly safety meetings, during which Davis was in attendance and presumably listening, Kelly complained directly to Davis on several occasions regarding the unsanitary condition of the toilet facilities near the concentrator building and the lack of cold drinking water and/or the lack of an ice machine to cool the tepid drinking water that Respondent did provide. Kelly, who stated that he was the only member of his crew to not follow procedures and to complain directly to Davis about the conditions, recalled one particular conversation regarding the outhouse facilities. He approached Davis and said that he did not understand why, on a multimillion dollar project, Respondent could not afford another toilet. Davis replied that cleaning was difficult because of the location of the project, and Kelly responded that Respondent could obtain more toilets. Other than these matters, Kelly testified that he also complained to Davis regarding a shortage of necessary tools, working at excessively dangerous heights, and the daily starting time.[42]

According to Kelly, what precipitated his discharge was an incident that occurred on the Friday (May 10) prior to his discharge. He testified that Davis' crew, including Vern Hawkins, Larry Perrin, two carpenters named Dick _____ and Jim _____, and himself, was stripping (dismantling) a form that morning and that inadvertently the kickplate, which holds together the bottom of the form, was not removed. Davis became angered at this and directed Kelly to hook the form to a crane and fly the form from its setting. Kelly thereupon completed rigging the form, and while Perrin directed the crane, the remainder of the crew went to land the form. As this procedure commenced, Perrin and Davis argued over whether the failure to remove the kickplate would affect the stripping procedure, with Davis stating that such would not. He was wrong, for as the crane pulled the form out, the latter was ripped apart. By this time, it was approximately 9:30, and with all the other crews taking the normal morning break then, Perrin and Dick _____ just left the area. Seeing this, Kelly turned to Davis, and asked him for the time. When the latter responded, 9:30, Kelly said, "'Well, I guess it's break time,'" Obviously annoyed about what had just occurred, Davis replied, "Kelly, you're not getting a break today." Kelly retorted that the union contract mandated a morning break period[43] and that he was going to report Davis' conduct to Job Steward Herndon. Not bothering to reply, Davis walked away. He did, however, return to where Kelly, Hawkins, and Jim were working approximately 15 minutes later and said, while still visibly upset, "Kelly, go take your break." Thereupon the three carpenters took their morning breaks.[44] Davis did not deny the occurrence of this incident, and I credit the testimony of Kelly as to the incident.

Kelly was terminated on May 14. He testified that at 2:30 that afternoon Davis called him aside and handed [40] Although not particularly clear in the record, Don Davis apparently was the foreman in overall charge of the carpenter crew in the yard area. Larry Perrin was paid a foreman's wages to "supervise" the yard work but, for some reason, refused to accept the duties and responsibilities of a foreman.

[42] Don Davis specifically denied that Kelly or any other member of the crew, under his supervision, ever complained to him about the condition of the toilets or the lack of cold drinking water. As to whether Kelly ever complained to Davis regarding the latter's use of tools or performance of union work, Davis generalized during direct examination that no crewmember ever so complained; however, when asked specifically about Kelly on cross-examination, Davis was considerably less emphatic: "Not that I can recall . . . . That's a possibility, but I don't recall." I previously stated that I was not at all impressed with Davis' demeanor while testifying. Further his testimony was contradictory at times and, particularly regarding the events preceding and causing Kelly's termination, was vague and at variance with his pretrial affidavit. On the other hand, at least as to the matter of his discharge, Kelly impressed me as being candid and forthright. Accordingly, when they conflict, I shall credit the testimony of Robert Kelly.

[43] Sec. XVII(j) of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement provides, in part, that so long as work progress is not impeded, a "reasonable allowance" for a refreshment break during the first half of a shift may be granted but that such is not an absolute requirement. Kelly admitted that such could be given on a staggered basis by the employer.

him two checks and a termination notice, with the notation "work unsatisfactory." Kelly asked Davis what the problem was, and Davis, other than saying he was not happy with Kelly, refused to give the latter any specific reason for the discharge. According to Davis, when he handed the checks and the termination notice to Kelly, Davis said, "I got a present for you, Bob." Asked why he spoke in such a flippant manner, Davis explained, "Presents can be good or bad depending on the way he looks at them." As to whether Kelly replied, Davis gave conflicting testimony. Thus, on direct examination, Davis recalled that Kelly responded, "I knew this was coming"; while during cross-examination, Davis abbreviated Kelly's alleged response to "I've expected it." This testimony must be contrasted with Davis' pretrial affidavit, dated just 8 days after the conversation (May 22), in which he professed not being able to recall any response by Kelly. I am convinced that Davis fabricated this testimony and do not credit him as to Kelly's alleged response. Further, Davis' admitted insensate opening comment to an employee who Davis was about to terminate is indicative of either utter and supreme naivete, or, more likely, his true feelings toward a perceived union crybaby.

Respondent, almost entirely, relies on the testimony of Don Davis to establish that the discharge of Robert Kelly was solely based on his unsatisfactory job performance. Davis, on whose decision Kelly was terminated, testified that his rationale for doing so was based on his conclusion that Kelly was not "doing the job to my satisfaction, wasn't performing as he should." Davis further testified that four separate incidents, each occurring within the 5-day period immediately preceding the discharge, cumulatively caused him to reach this decision. Before analyzing each separate occurrence, inasmuch as Davis steadfastly maintained during both direct and cross-examinations that no less than four instances, taken together, of work-related difficulties resulted in his decision to terminate Kelly, it is crucial to a determination of Davis' credibility in this regard to point out that in his aforementioned pretrial affidavit, given 8 days after discharge, Davis could recall only two such incidents and stated, "I cannot think of any other specific incident of Kelly's poor work."[45] In any event, the first of these incidents, according to Davis, occurred 4 days prior to the discharge, and began when he asked Kelly to go inside a form and predrill holes that were needed so that snap ties could be inserted through the form. After a short period of time, Davis observed that Kelly wasn't doing the work—"I mean he'd get frustrated, set the drill down, walk around, try and pick it up and try and do it again." Finally, Davis testified that he was forced to demonstrate how to perform the task correctly. Regarding this incident on cross-examination, Davis admitted that such was not included in his pretrial affidavit; that he did not observe Kelly performing his work on a continuing basis that day; and that, contrary to the impression created by his direct testimony, rather than Kelly's inability to perform the work or his lack of understanding of its requirements, what allegedly irked Davis was that Kelly did not take the proper amount of time to complete the job—"in the time that it took me to get back to where he was, he hadn't moved far enough."

Kelly testified that predrilling holes in forms was standard work and that he was never disciplined for doing such improperly. However, he did testify regarding an incident that occurred shortly before his discharge and did involve the drilling of holes. According to Kelly, he and Don Carle, a welder, were assigned by Davis to predrill holes in a form but they soon experienced difficulty because Davis gave them improper dimensions for the holes and, as a result, the ends of the rebar would not fit into the holes. Kelly testified that they did not have large enough drill bits to compensate and that when he and Carle mentioned this to Davis, the latter said to "just use a sledge hammer and pound the knuckles in." Kelly and Carle proceeded to follow instructions, but the process was taking an excessively long time. Finally, David yelled over to them, asking what was taking so long. Carle yelled back that more men were needed. "And the next thing I knew, [Carle and Davis] were in a heated argument, with Davis ending [it] by threatening to fire Carle."

Davis testified that the second alleged contributory incident occurred the next day. Kelly was working on a form that day and, according to Davis, at one point in the day, he observed Kelly hanging by his safety belt and doing no work for approximately 3 or 4 minutes. Davis asked why, and Kelly replied that he was out of nails and was waiting for a laborer to bring him a new supply. Davis responded that Kelly was not helpless and should get his own nails. After Kelly protested, Davis repeated the order, and the former came down from his working height and went to the supply area. Davis further testified that what annoyed him was that "a good carpenter is one that will do the work. If he is out of nails, he goes and gets his nails."[46] However, during cross-examination, Davis candidly stated it was not unusual for a carpenter to make such a request of a laborer and that even Davis supplied Kelly with needed materials on occasion. Further, Aiton Jr. testified that, depending on the circumstances, Kelly's actions in this instance were not necessarily indicative of poor work.

During his direct examination, Kelly candidly admitted the incident, placing it on the day prior to his discharge. He testified that while working from a safety belt high on a form, he had no nails left and requested his partner, who was on the ground, to obtain a new supply. Davis, who was standing nearby when Kelly made his request, heard Kelly do so and responded that Kelly had no time to wait for others and that he should get the nails himself. Thereupon inasmuch as no nails remained in the crews' supply bin, Kelly walked across the jobsite in order to obtain a full box of nails. On returning, according to Kelly, Davis was waiting for him and said that Respondent was on a tight schedule and that Kelly did not have time to waste waiting for someone to hand him nails.

[45] Asked why his memory was so much better 10 months later, Davis testified that when he gave his pretrial affidavit, he had just been discharged from the hospital wherein he had undergone treatment for a gunshot wound. Averring that he gave his affidavit under the influence of pain and a lack of sleep, Davis further testified that he missed just 1 day of work and was given no drugs that day.

[46] According to Davis, the laborer had not yet appeared; thus, Kelly had not yet even ordered a new supply of nails.

Soon after this incident on either May 11 or 12 and, according to Davis, based on the aforementioned two instances, he approached his general foreman, Aiton Jr., outside the concentrator building, said that he was unhappy with Kelly's work performance and that if he did not improve, Respondent should "get rid of Kelly." Aiton Jr. asked if Davis had talked to Kelly about the problem and when the foreman said no, Aiton Jr. "suggested that I go talk to Bob and then we observe him for a couple of days and see if his performance improved."[47] Accordingly, Davis testified, approximately 30 minutes later, he pulled Kelly away from the other crewmembers and said that he was unhappy with Kelly's performance and that it needed improvement. Davis testified that Kelly somehow indicated that he understood. Kelly denied such an incident, testifying that the only such conversation, as set forth above, occurred on his return from obtaining a supply of nails.

The third alleged instance of Kelly's poor work prior to his discharge involved his failure to properly tie the corners of a wall form, which work consisted of overlapping 2 by 4 pieces of wood and nailing them together. Davis testified that he assigned Kelly this work, that he checked no less than three times as to whether Kelly completed the work, and that on each occasion, Kelly had not yet performed his assignment. Finally, according to Davis, after ordering Kelly to do the work a third time, the latter did so. During cross-examination, Davis averred that Kelly's actions irritated him: "The consistency of having to go back and say, I need this done . . . and then come back and find the person is not working on it or hasn't started it and then having to again tell him to do it and come back the third time and have to say, do it now." Despite this irritation, 9 days later in his pretrial affidavit, Davis could not recall this incident as contributing to his reasons for terminating Kelly. For his part, Kelly denied ever having been told more than once by Davis to perform any particular task.

Davis testified that the final instance of Kelly's poor work performance occurred on the day of the discharge in the morning. According to Davis, while he was supervising work at the top of a wall form, he asked Kelly to go get a piece of 4 by 4 wood of a certain length. A pile of wood was nearby, and Davis observed Kelly take what appeared to him to be an inordinate period of time choosing a piece of wood—picking up and discarding several pieces of wood of the wrong length before selecting a larger piece and cutting it to the proper length. Davis further testified that he was forced to yell to Kelly to hurry as the wood was necessary to the crew's work. On cross-examination, Davis stated that what irritated him was the fact that as an experienced carpenter, Kelly should immediately have selected the longer piece and cut it rather than needlessly searching for a piece of wood of the exact length necessary. Notwithstanding that the entire elapsed time for Kelly to find the correct length of wood was just 5 minutes, Davis insisted that time was of the essence as a concrete pour was scheduled to commence shortly thereafter. As to the significance of this incident, Davis admitted that this "one incident alone would not have resulted in [Kelly's discharge]," but averred that taken together with the prior three incidents, the 4 by 4 incident was important enough to have been a factor in the discharge.[48] Finally, I note that although he testified that Kelly did ultimately bring him a piece of wood of the correct length, Davis contradicted his pretrial affidavit in which he stated, "I recall that shortly before I discharged [Kelly] I sent him for some 4 x 4's and he didn't get them. I don't recall if I asked him about it or if he said why he didn't get them." Kelly denied the occurrence of such an incident.[49] After answering questions regarding the above four incidents during cross-examination, Davis was asked if he could recall any other incident as being a factor in his decision to terminate Kelly. He answered, no, and was immediately confronted with his pretrial affidavit in which he stated, "Some of his work we had to do over, although now I cannot recall any specific instances." Thereupon, Davis averred that he was able to recall that such, indeed, was a factor in the discharge decision but that he still could not remember any specific occasions.

Besides Davis, Respondent relied on the testimony of Foreman Dennis Jensen to establish that Kelly was a poor worker. Corroborated to this extent by Kelly, Jensen testified that Kelly worked on his crew for 1 day because another crewmember was ill. According to Jensen, he assigned Kelly to precut some plywood, but the latter did not appear to understand the assignment. Consequently, Kelly did not do the work correctly, and two other men were required to tear down and reconstruct what Kelly had previously done. Jensen further testified that he spoke to Davis that afternoon about Kelly. The latter asked how Kelly was doing, and Jensen replied, ""Piss poor."" Davis responded that Kelly was slow and that he was not pleased with him. Davis added that he did not know what he was going to do with Kelly and "in a joking way was asking, hoping I would take him." Jensen replied that he would get his own help, rather than use Kelly. Davis directly contradicted Jensen as to this conversation. Thus, not only could Davis not recall whether Jensen expressed any opinion as to Kelly's work, he specifically denied expressing his [47] Aiton Jr. testified that prior to discharging Kelly, Davis reported the occurrence of just one work-related problem with Kelly and that such involved Kelly yelling to another employee to bring him (Kelly) a supply of nails—an act that did not please Davis. Aiton Jr. further testified that Davis reported this in one of two conversations before Davis terminated Kelly.

[48] In the regard, Davis agreed that taken individually, each of the prior incidents was also trivial.

[49] Davis asserted that after the last incident, he became convinced that Kelly was not a competent worker. Accordingly, Davis testified he approached Aiton Jr. outside the concentrator building at approximately 11 a.m. and told the latter that he should get Kelly's check because he was not "packing his weight or holding up his end of the project." The general foreman asked what he should put on Kelly's termination slip as a reason for the discharge, and after a short discussion, Davis instructed Aiton Jr. to mark whatever was necessary to note that Kelly was fired.

own opinion as to Kelly's work ability: "I don't think I stated it to Dennis, no."[50]

2. Analysis

The consolidated amended complaint alleges that Kelly was discharged by Respondent in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In support, the General Counsel argues that by complaint about perceived contractual violations and other matters affecting employees' terms and conditions of employment to Don Davis and at the weekly safety meetings, Kelly engaged in activities that were privileged by Section 7 of the Act. Counsel further argues that Respondent terminated Kelly because of the activities inasmuch as Davis, in particular, believed all union supporters were crybabies and was not reticent about disguising his disgust at union problems on the project. Contrary to the General Counsel, Respondent argues that the former has failed to establish that Kelly ever actually engaged in protected concerted activities, asserting that Kelly's comments at various times to Davis were hardly in the nature of "complaints" about working conditions, and that there exists no evidence of unlawful animus. Respondent further argues that Kelly's discharge was motivated by, and directly resulted from, his poor job performance.

As with Randal Fansler, the record amply supports the conclusion that Kelly engaged in union and other activities privileged by Section 7 of the Act. Thus, notwithstanding Davis' denial, I have credited the testimony of Kelly that, alone among members of Davis' crew, he either complained or commented directly to Davis concerning several perceived contractual violations and working conditions generally. Regarding the former, Kelly on one occasion questioned Davis about the latter's use of his tools and on other occasions complained to his foreman about the lack of sanitary toilet facilities and properly chilled drinking water. Also, in an incident, which, the General Counsel contends, precipitated his discharge, Kelly exacerbated an already awkward situation, involving the destruction of a wall form, by intemperately complaining to Davis about the latter's refusal to permit him to take a morning break right at that moment. Inasmuch as the aforementioned matters are based on the Union's collective-bargaining agreement, Kelly's conduct in complaining to or questioning Davis about them constitutes union and protected concerted activity within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act. Pioneer Concrete Co., supra; City Disposal Systems, supra; Roadway Express, supra. Even if not cognizable under the Union's collective-bargaining agreement, Kelly's foregoing complaints, as well as those relating to working conditions in general, including a shortage of necessary tools and work at excessively dangerous heights, involve matters of common and vital concern to all Respondent's employees and, therefore, must be found to constitute protected concerted activity whether or not Kelly acted on an individual basis. Cal-Walts, Inc., 258 NLRB 974 (1981); Rose's Stores, 256 NLRB 550 (1981); Air Surrey Corp., 229 NLRB 1064 (1974); Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1985). Finally, although Respondent belittles the nature of Kelly's remarks, questions, or complaints to Davis, the fact is that all such related to either contractual matters, working conditions, or both. Accordingly, I find that all such activity, no matter the form, was protected by the Act.

Regarding whether Kelly's aforementioned conduct influenced Davis in his admitted decision to terminate Kelly, for the General Counsel argues that such was the sole motivating factor. On the other hand, counsel for Respondent argues against the existence of unlawful animus, citing Kelly's own testimony that whenever he voiced a "complaint" or questioned Davis' conduct, the latter responded in measured tones and not vituperatively. The latter argument, at first glance, is appealing; however, to find it meritorious would be to ignore the ample and persuasive[51] evidence of animus. As to this, the record fully warrants the conclusion that such unlawful animus was in the nature of a personal antagonism, on Davis' part, directed toward Kelly and based on the latter's propensity to complain and to do so directly to Davis. Several factors lead me to this conclusion. Initially, not only did Davis believe that the Las Vegas carpenters as a group were nothing more than crybabies for raising what they perceived as legitimate contractual complaints but also, I believe, he harbored some sort of resentment toward the union member/-employees for deliberately "starting all this union shit" at the outset of the project when Respondent was experiencing significant job-related problems—"they expected to have when they came on the job the exact same things they had in Las Vegas, and when we were trying . . . the best that we could, all being out of state . . . but I mean, a lot of the stuff that they were crying about we were trying to work on and they just kept harping and crying about." Also, contrary to Davis' denial and expressed lack of animosity toward him or his position as a union agent, I have expressly credited the testimony of Job Steward Herndon that Davis, on at least two dozen occasions when the former brought employee complaints to his attention, called Herndon a crybaby for doing such. Specifically as to Kelly, however mild his actions may have been, I note that not only did Kelly act outside the standard communications channel by bypassing Herndon and registering his own complaints with Davis but also Kelly was the only member of Davis' crew to so act. That the inference is warranted that Davis, who already perceived the union employees, as a group, to be crybabies for the exact same conduct, took Kelly's conduct personally and was so motivated in terminating him, is clear when one considers Davis' admitted remark to Kelly on terminating the latter—"I got a present for you,

[50] Throughout his testimony, Dennis Jensen impressed me as being biased in Respondent's behalf and as a witness not about tailoring his testimony to fit Respondent's version of the facts. In this regard, the record discloses that Jensen was made a foreman by Respondent at the jobsite under rather questionable circumstances. I do not credit his testimony and, noting the contradictory testimony, do not credit the occurrence of either the Kelly incident or the contents of the alleged conversation between Davis and Jensen.

[51] The admonition of the Board in Wright Line, supra, is instructive at this point—that in analyzing whether a prima facie violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act has been proven, a quantitative analysis of the motivation evidence is not required.

Bob." I believe that such an insensate and utterly unprovoked remark is indicative of an individual who harbors unlawful animus against an employee and further believe that Davis' ludicrous explanation for his comment is not worthy of belief. In this context, finally, the events of the previous day, wherein Davis, already upset over the accidental destruction of a wall form, reacted angrily when Kelly began complaining about not being allowed to take a morning break at that time and threatening to report the matter to Mike Herndon, gain perspective as being nothing less than the precipitating cause for the discharge. In short, I must conclude that the General Counsel has established a prima facie violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) as to the discharge of Kelly.

Turning now to a determination as to whether Respondent has met its own Wright Line burden of proof and established that Kelly would have been terminated anyway for legitimate business reasons and notwithstanding the existence of unlawful animus, three factors are of crucial importance. First, Don Davis testified that just four work-related incidents—Kelly's failure to predrill holes in a sufficient period of time, Kelly's delay in working while awaiting a laborer to obtain some nails, Kelly's failure to properly tie the corners of a wall form, and, lastly, his delay in selecting a 4 by 4 piece of wood of the proper length, all occurring in the 5-day period immediately preceding the discharge—were determinative in Davis' decision to terminate Kelly. Davis further testified that each incident, considered separately, was trivial and would not have resulted in discharge but that taken together, a pattern emerged that revealed that Kelly was a poor worker who Respondent could no longer tolerate as an employee. Second, in his pretrial affidavit, which was given just 8 days after Kelly's discharge, Davis named just two incidents, Kelly's delay in working while awaiting a laborer to obtain a supply of nails and his delay in choosing a 4 by 4 piece of wood of the proper length, as contributing to his discharge decision and swore that "I cannot think of any other specific incident of Kelly's poor work." The last critical factor necessary to evaluate Respondent's defense is Kelly's own testimony regarding his job performance. Thus, he specifically denied the occurrence of the other three alleged instances of his poor work; while candidly admitting the occurrence of an incident involving the procuring of a new supply of nails—albeit a different version than that of Davis. Further, while denying the predrilling of holes incident, Kelly testified to a similar incident involving an argument between Davis and another employee.

With Respondent's economic justification for the termination of Kelly resting on Davis' testimony that four separate incidents of poor job performance by Kelly, taken as a whole, formed the basis for his decision to terminate Kelly, I specifically discredit his testimony regarding the two alleged incidents (the predrilling of holes and the failure to properly tie the corners of a wall form episodes) not mentioned in the pretrial affidavit, which was taken a scant 8 days after Kelly's discharge. In this regard, I believe Davis' failure to include the incidents as contributory factors to his decision is highly enlightening inasmuch as an individual's memory of an event is sharpest immediately after the occurrence and dulls significantly as time passes. Flatiron Materials Co., 250 NLRB 554, 559 (1980). Also, I do not credit Davis' explanation for his markedly clearer memory at the hearing than at the time he gave his pretrial affidavit[52] and specifically credit Kelly's denial of the incidents.[53] Accordingly, then, if Kelly would have been terminated regardless of his protected concerted activities, the remaining incidents that must form the basis for such are the "nails" incident and the "4 x 4" incident.

Initially, I note that it would be intellectually dishonest and illogical to conclude that these latter two incidents justify the discharge of Kelly inasmuch as, by Davis' own admission, four separate incidents, taken together, were the basis for the discharge; as, based on my credibility resolution, at least half of Respondent's defense has been fabricated; and as, again by Davis' own admission, each incident, considered separately, was trivial and did not justify termination. More specifically, as between the conflicting testimonies of Davis and Kelly, I credit the latter's version of the nails incident. Not only did I find Kelly to be a more trustworthy witness, but also I note that his version is buttressed by the testimony of Aiton Jr. who testified that Davis reported on this incident during the first of two conversations prior to the discharge of Kelly, a report which, in effect, corroborates Kelly's version of the incident. I also note the grudging admission by Aiton Jr. that Kelly may not have done anything wrong that day. Finally, notwithstanding the admitted triviality of an incident that consumed just 5 minutes, I credit the testimony of Kelly that the 4 by 4 incident did not occur. In these circumstances, taking into account the record as a whole and in agreement with the General Counsel, I do not believe that Respondent has met its burden and establish that Robert Kelly would have been terminated notwithstanding his protected concerted activities and find that Kelly was terminated by Respondent in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Pioneer Concrete Co., supra; City Disposal System, supra.[54]

[52] Interestingly, Davis' memory had to be refreshed via his pretrial affidavit for him to recall that he also listed as a factor in Kelly's discharge the necessity to redo his work on occasion. Of course, given the time lapse, Davis was unable to recall specific instances of this assertion.

[53] I specifically credit Kelly's testimony regarding the confrontation between Davis and Don Carle and believe that Davis utilized this incident as the basis for his predrilling of holes incident and fabricated Kelly's involvement.

[54] Inasmuch as I have concluded that Respondent acted in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act in terminating Kelly, I find it unnecessary to decide whether Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (4) of the Act by refusing to rehire him. In this regard, I note that there is no evidence in the record that Respondent has yet offered to reinstate Kelly to his former position, that the practical remedy for the violation, which I have found, encompasses, except for the wording on the notice, the standard remedy for an 8(a)(1) and (4) violation, and that, in any event, I have grave doubts as to the credibility of the evidence, which was adduced by the General Counsel in support of the latter allegation, including the testimony of Kelly concerning events subsequent to his discharge.

D. The Discharge of Wendell Bridges

1. The facts

The record establishes that Wendell Bridges, who has been a carpenter for 10 years and a member of the Union since 1978, was acquainted with Robert Kelly, that the latter informed Bridges in mid-April that Respondent was continuing to hire carpenters at the Tonopah Mine project, and that one day in late April Bridges took a day off from work and drove up to the jobsite and spoke to Joe Lively about working for Respondent. Bridges informed Lively that he was capable of doing any work that Respondent required, and the latter, after taking down Bridges' name and address, said there was a possibility that he could use Bridges. Thereafter, about May 8, Respondent requested Bridges by name from the Union's hiring hall. Bridges immediately telephoned Lively at the jobsite and received permission to report for work on the following Monday.

The record further establishes that Bridges reported for work at the Tonopah Mine project at approximately 7 a.m. on Monday, May 12, and that he was assigned to work on Obie Bodiroga's crew at the crusher building. After working about 1-1/2 hours, Aiton III approached Bridges and ordered him to report to the office area and help construct forms. He did so, and at noontime Aiton III again came over to where Bridges was working and informed the latter that he was scheduled to report for work the next day at 3 p.m. and would thereafter be assigned to work on the night shift. Bridges responded that he had not been hired to work nights; Aiton III replied that Bridges' name was on the work schedule and walked away. However, Aiton III returned 10 minutes later but this time with Joe Lively. Lively asked Bridges why he would not work nights, and the latter replied that he had not been hired for that shift. Lively said that he thought he had hired Bridges with that understanding, and the latter said no. Finally, Lively asked Bridges if he would try it for a couple of weeks, and Bridges agreed to do so as an experiment.[55]

That night in the dry camp area, Bridges spoke to another carpenter, Bob Micheli, who informed Bridges that he had been appointed the union steward on the night crew and that the shift was to be 9 hours and not the 10-hour shift that Bridges believed all the other employees of Respondent were working.[56] Angered that he was going to lose anticipated wages by working nights, Bridges drove to the jobsite at 6:30 a.m. the next morning (May 13), went to Respondent's office trailer and encountered Joe Lively. Bridges told Lively that he did not mind working at night but that he now learned that the shift was to be 9 hours and that it was not fair because all the other crews were working 10-hour shifts. Lively responded that such was the way it was and that there was nothing he could do about it. Bridges asked if he could work on another crew. Lively replied, no, that the night crew was all he could give to Bridges and that if he did not want it, "I don't know what to tell you." According to the uncontroverted testimony of Bridges as to this conversation, he and Lively became more agitated as the meeting progressed.[57]

Because he was not scheduled to work until later that day, Bridges returned to the dry camp. Approximately 2 hours later, he walked to Bob Micheli's trailer. Jim Easter, the night-shift foreman, was speaking with Micheli when Bridges arrived. During the ensuing conversation, according to Bridges, Easter said that the crew was shaping up to be a good crew and that while he also did not like working and being paid for just 9 hours, he felt that eventually the crew would work a 10-hour shift. Bridges agreed, saying that it was unfair to work reduced hours and estimating a loss in wages of perhaps $200 per week. Bridges further stated that as he and Easter spoke in Micheli's trailer, Easter consumed the entire contents of a pint bottle of vodka. The latter did not deny these events.

That afternoon, the newly formed night crew[58] reported for work at 3 p.m. and was assigned to work in the crusher building area, finishing the construction of wall forms for the eventual pouring of concrete, the material of which the crusher building walls were to be constructed. Bridges testified that for the initial period of the shift, he predrilled holes in a wall form for an inside wall of the building, which work was necessary for the insertion of 6-foot long steel rods, called doaker rods, which rods tie, or hold, the wall form together while the concrete is being poured, and that for the remainder of the shift, he was involved in the actual process of tying that particular form. The record discloses that the work of tying a wall form is a laborious and at times dangerous (because of the heights at which the men are required to work) process that necessitates the utilization of no less than three carpenters, two stationed outside the opposite walls of the form and one inside. The aforementioned danger results from the requirement that, although able to rest their feet on 4 by 4 wood blocks extending from outside the form, called slim soldiers, the two outside workers, in order to freely and properly perform their work, must support themselves solely by means of their safety belts. This should be contrasted to the degree of danger faced by the inside worker, who is able to stand on a grid of the doaker rod that are spaced about 16 inches apart. The work involved in the process

[55] Bridges admitted that the nature of this complaint, concerning being scheduled on the night crew, was purely personal and involved no one else.

[56] James Easter, who was to be the night crew foreman, testified that he spoke to Bridges sometime that evening and that Bridges told him he did not want to work nights. According to Easter, he responded that he had no control over assignments and that he had nothing to do with Bridges being on his crew. The latter replied that he was going to speak to Joe Lively and that he was sorry for going over Easter's head. Although Bridges did not deny either the occurrence of or substance of this conversation, I note that, according to Bridges, he had previously agreed to work on the night shift, as an experiment, that afternoon and that what he was upset about that night was the matter of the number of hours that the crew would work.

[57] During cross-examination, Bridges testified that after meeting with Lively, he sought out Job Steward Herndon and reported on his argument with Lively over the night crew's work hours. Herndon counseled Bridges to be patient as the Union was trying to work things out with Respondent. Thereupon, Bridges returned to Lively and apologized.

[58] Besides Easter, Micheli, and Bridges, the crew consisted of journeyman carpenters Larry _____ and Dale _____, apprentice carpenter Pat Curtis, a laborer, and two crane operators.

is as follows: one outside man (the feeder) must lean backwards (completely dependent for support on the safety belt) and push with his hands or force, by banging on the end of the rod with a hammer, the 1-1/4 inch in diameter steel doaker rod through the predrilled hole in the panel; thereon, the inside man pulls the rod through that hole and guides it to the corresponding hole in the opposite panel of the form; and, next, the other outside man pulls the rod through his side and secures it by means of affixing a steel plate, termed a cat-head, over the protruding end of the doaker rod (the feeder also places a cat-head around his end of the rod). It must be borne in mind that inasmuch as the outside men, by necessity, must have their hands free in order to work with the doaker rods and to catch and tie the cat-heads, they cannot work efficiently if forced to hold onto the slim soldier, perhaps nervous at the heights at which the work must be done. On this night, according to Bridges, he, Micheli, and Pat Curtis, the apprentice, were tying the aforementioned wall form, with Bridges working as the feeder, Micehli as the opposite outside man, and Curtis working inside the form. Bridges testified further that he spoke just once to Jim Easter during work that night, that Easter simply asked if he was encountering any problems, and that Bridges answered that he was not. In this regard, however, Bridges later admitted that although he had worked at heights previously, he had done so standing on a scaffolding and had never worked solely supported by a safety belt. Further, Bridges admitted that Micheli and Curtis accused him of working too slowly that night; however, he insisted that if any delays occurred, such were caused by the crews' laborer who was slow in passing up materials to him.[59] Notwithstanding this, Bridges also insisted that he was working as fast as someone with experience in that type of work.

Contrary to Bridges, Easter testified to a far different version of the events of that night. Contradicting the former, Easter stated that he assigned Micheli to be the feeder, that Bridges was designated as the other outside man, and that the latter's work consisted only of the placing of cat-heads over the doaker rod ends that protruded from his side of the wall form.[60] Further, according to Easter, early on it became rather obvious to him that Bridges was extremely nervous working at heights while supported solely by his safety belt. Thus, Easter observed Bridges constantly trying to work while holding onto the slim soldiers, the protruding 4 by 4 blocks of wood. This, in turn, caused Bridges to be unable to catch the metal cat-heads that were being passed up to him by the laborer. The resulting work delays necessitated Easter to speak to Bridges twice: "I told him to loose of that slim soldier with his arms and hands, and lean back on the belt, and . . . catch the material the laborer was passing up to him." Bridges replied each time that he would try. Besides the latter's perceived nervousness working off the safety belt, Easter stated that he observed Bridges having difficulty with the hand signals necessary for signaling the crane operator during the "flying" of the wall form panels. Accordingly, because he allegedly believed that Bridges' nervousness at heights could possibly endanger the other crewmembers, Easter further testified that he decided to speak to Bridges during the crews' break period in the job shack. "I asked Bridges if he would transfer back to the day shift and work on the ground . . . because he was too nervous and he was a threat to my people below him."[61] Bridges said no as "he would feel like a pussy if he took a transfer . . . . He wanted to tough it out." Easter next offered Bridges the inside man job; Bridges also refused this job, saying "he wanted to tough it out and be a man . . . ." Nothing more was said. Finally, as to the content of Bridges' testimony, Easter denied both that the laborer caused any delays that night and that Bridges mentioned this to him. Called as a rebuttal witness, Bridges, for his part, denied the occurrence and the substance of the alleged break period conversation between Easter and himself, and he also denied any conversations with Easter regarding signals for the flying of panels or problems in that regard.

In any event, the night crews' shift ended at 11:30 that night, and everyone returned to the dry camp. Bridges testified that he wandered over to Micheli's trailer and that while standing outside, he heard several people speaking about him. In particular, Micheli opined that Bridges was just too slow, and the apprentice, Pat Curtis, said that if Bridges could not do the work, he should let someone else do it and leave. At that point, according to Bridges, he entered the trailer, saying that if there was talk about the crew, it should be in the presence of all of them in the open. Easter then said that the discussion was closed and that he had made a decision that because Curtis had more experience working outside off a safety belt, he was going to put Bridges inside for 2 or 3 weeks until he was familiar with the work. Bridges responded that he could do the job and that he thought he had done a good job that night. Easter agreed but said he would still put Bridges inside so that he could familiarize himself with the work. Bridges specifically denied refusing this change in work duties, and stated

[59] Bridges testified that the slow work of the laborer caused both Curtis and Micheli to yell to him from time to time, "Come on, let's go." However, according to Bridges, neither of them could observe how the laborer was working; therefore, all they could know was that there was some slowness, with someone at fault.

[60] Easter testified in a contradictory manner as to why Bridges was assigned to work as the "other" outside man this night. Initially, Easter averred that he had no idea of Bridges' capabilities and that he assigned Bridges to that position as "somebody had to do it and nobody was on the ground . . . I figured he'd be all right to do it." Later, Easter testified that he formed the opinion from observing Bridges' work the previous day that other workers were more capable. Also, Bridges allegedly told him that "he had never been around like [Respondent's]" before. Accordingly, he did not give Bridges the feeder job because "I figured I had three of four . . . people a little bit more capable than he was."

Bridges specifically denied informing Easter that he had never worked on such a job as the crusher job that night.

[61] During cross-examination, Easter altered his testimony regarding Bridges transferring to the day shift: "I believe I told him I'd help him transfer because he was good on the ground." He was also able to recall telling Bridges that "he was too scared to work above, and he was dangerous. Unless he'd get shaped up, he couldn't handle the job and I wanted him out of there."

that the meeting ended with Easter saying Aiton III was happy with the crews' work that night.[62]

Bridges next testified that as the crewmembers reported to the jobsite for work on the afternoon of May 14, it began to rain. Observing the weather Easter informed the crew that he and Aiton III were going to check on the condition of the work area. While awaiting their return, Bridges noticed Robert Kelly speaking to another carpenter in the vicinity of the office trailer.[63] Kelly came over to Bridges and informed him of his termination. After a few minutes, Easter returned and walked over to where Kelly and Bridges were standing. Bridges introduced Easter to Kelly and inquired whether Kelly could be hired for the night crew. Easter asked why, and Bridges responded that Kelly had just been laid off and Bridges thought Easter could utilize Kelly on his crew. Easter replied that he would get back to Bridges after telling the others that there would be no working that day. Ten minutes later Easter returned and said to Kelly, "I can't do nothing for you, son. . . . I'm sorry, but I've got a new crew here and I don't want any problems." Thereupon, according to Bridges, he (Bridges) asked what if he spoke to Lively. Easter replied, "I wouldn't advise going over my head." Kelly, during his testimony, recalled this conversation, stating that after he approached Bridges that afternoon and informed him of the discharge, the latter introduced him to Easter. Bridges said to Easter that Kelly was a good carpenter and that although he had been let go, he could work on another crew. Easter replied that he would return after informing the rest of the crew that they would not be working that afternoon. He soon returned and said to Kelly, "Well, sorry Bob. I'm a new foreman and I don't want to get involved." Bridges thereupon said that Kelly should speak to Lively; Easter became upset, asking whether Bridges was trying to go over his head. Bridges said no, and, Kelly recalled, the conversation ended.[64]

Bridges, who had driven himself to the jobsite that day, returned to the dry camp with Kelly. According to Bridges, he and Kelly had a conversation with Micheli in front of the latter's trailer shortly thereafter. Kelly, who was upset over his termination, announced that "'I'm going to throw a wildcat on this job.'" Bridges added that he would not cross the picket line; however, Micheli responded that he would run right over Kelly, because he wanted to keep his job. Micheli, then, left the others and walked toward his trailer. According to Bridges, he had previously noticed that Easter's car was parked outside Micheli's trailer, and he asked Kelly whether anyone else was in the vehicle. Kelly replied that Easter had entered it awhile ago.[65] Later that afternoon Bridges learned that Kelly had no means of returning to Las Vegas. Thus, at 6:30 p.m. Bridges went to Easter's trailer and said to the latter that he would be taking Kelly back to Las Vegas and would return in time for work the next day. Easter asked whether Kelly was supporting him. Bridges denied it, saying Kelly was a friend and because he did not have a car, Bridges would drive him back to Las Vegas. Easter asked, "What, are you queer for the guy or something?" Bridges repeated that Kelly was just a friend, and Easter responded, "Look son . . . . You want to work on my crew, . . . you stay out of other people's business." Bridges protested that he liked working for Easter and that all he was doing was giving Kelly a ride home. Easter said okay but that if Bridges failed to return, Easter would find someone else. Bridges replied that he would be back in time for work the next afternoon and nothing more was said.

Bridges testified that he drove Kelly to Las Vegas and that he returned early enough to report on time for work on May 15. Shortly after arriving on the jobsite, he was approached by Easter who announced that he had laid Bridges off at 7 a.m. that day. Angered, Bridges said that Easter should have telephoned him in Las Vegas so that he would not have had to return to Tonopah. Then, Bridges asked why Easter laid him off. Easter replied, "You seem to have a problem." Bridges asked Easter to explain, and the latter said, "You know what I mean . . . . And I don't want no problems on my job." Bridges responded that if the foremen continued to give such "crap" to the carpenters, there could be a wildcat strike. Easter replied, "To hell with your wildcat strike. Get the hell off my job." Easter said nothing more and did not give Bridges a termination notice. Bridges left Easter and a few moments later encountered Aiton III near the office trailer. During their conversation, which I have previously described, Bridges asked him "'Wasn't my work satisfactory?' He says, 'That's not the point. I

[62] Mentioning nothing during direct examination, Easter was able to recall, during cross-examination, that on returning to the dry camp that night, the entire crew met in Micheli's trailer, drinking coffee or beer, and that Bridges walked in 5 minutes after the conversation began. According to Easter, the entire crew was in the process of complaining about Bridges' job performance when the latter entered and said that he did not like people talking behind his back. After various crewmembers insisted that Bridges transfer to days, Easter renewed his offer to Bridges to work inside the form. Bridges said "he'd feel like an idiot . . . to take a transfer like that. He wanted to tough it out, if he could." No more was said.

[63] The record establishes that Kelly had been fired by Don Davis approximately an hour earlier; however, after speaking to Aiton Jr. and Jim Joy, Kelly had been given permission to seek a position on another crew. Thus, Kelly spent the remainder of the afternoon speaking to other foremen as to whether they could use him on their crews. Aiton Jr. corroborated Kelly as to this granting of permission to seek employment with other foremen.

[64] Easter testified regarding this conversation during cross-examination. While informing the crew that no work was to be done on May 14, according to Easter, he was introduced to Kelly by Bridges. Then, Bridges asked Easter to try to fit Kelly into his crew. Easter replied that he could not use Kelly as the latter had been laid off by another foreman and Easter did not want to intervene and as Easter did not want any problems on his crew. Bridges responded that Easter testified that they were going to "wobble" (strike) the job.

Asked what he meant by not wanting any problems, Easter explained, "[Kelly] had been laid by another foreman, and . . . if I hired him on my crew, [such] . . . would cause dissension between the other foremen and myself. . . ."

Bridges denied threatening Easter with a wildcat strike prior to his termination.

[65] Kelly contradicted Bridges in this regard. Thus, the former testified that on returning to the dry camp, he spoke to a group of several carpenters, including the entire night crew and Jim Easter, about possibly picketing the project. Bridges said that he would honor the picket line, but Micheli said that he would run over Kelly. After listening to all this, Easter walked away just as Kelly and Micheli began arguing and went into the trailer of a member of the night crew. Easter failed to deny either version of this incident.

have to back my foremen up. . . . Anyone that creates any problems from now on is going down the road.'"[66]

The record establishes that regarding the decision to terminate Bridges and the rationale for the action, Respondent's evidence is contradictory and utterly confusing. As to the former, under questioning by me during redirect examination, Easter stated that at the conclusion of the night crews' shift on May 13, he knew that something had to be done about Bridges but that "I hadn't made up my attitude." Moments later, however, Easter evidently made up his mind, as he testified that the decision to discharge Bridges was made "that first night. . . . But I wanted to talk to my supervisor." Reminded that on May 13 rather than mentioning possible discharge to Bridges, he spoke only in terms of transferring Bridges to another crew or placing him inside the wall forms and asked again whether the discharge decision was reached that night. Easter altered his testimony, stating, "Not really then. . . . The following day. . . . Around noon . . . ." The foregoing must be contrasted with Easter's admission during cross-examination that, notwithstanding Bridges' apparent refusal on the previous night to accept either of the aforementioned alternatives, on May 14, prior to work that night, Easter had no reason to believe that Bridges would not work where he was instructed to work: "I believe he would have tried it, yes." Nevertheless, and more supportive of his later testimony, according to Easter, he spoke to Aiton III, concerning Bridges, while they inspected the night crew's assigned work area that afternoon. "I approached [Aiton III] and told him I thought I was going to have to make some changes in my crew—that I couldn't use Bridges on my crew." According to Easter, Aiton III responded that the former should go ahead and terminate Bridges if that was what Easter wanted to do. Aiton III did not corroborate this conversation.

Easter testified during direct examination that, after being informed that it would not work that afternoon (May 14) and on returning to the dry camp, the members of the crew, including Bridges, and Easter met in Bob Micheli's trailer. According to Easter, every other crewmember expressed the hope that he would transfer Bridges because no one wanted to work around him as "they were scared that he would drop something." In front of the other crewmembers, Easter turned to Bridges and said "that I couldn't use him, and he would have to transfer." Bridges responded that "he would go to Las Vegas that evening and come back and think about it. And I asked him, I said, 'Well, I can get your check now.' But he proceeded to come to Las Vegas without picking up his check." Thereupon, Easter further testified, because Bridges refused all alternative jobs offered to him, he went to Jim Joy that evening and "I asked him for Mr. Bridges' check."

Later, during his aforementioned questioning by me and redirect examination, Bridges reaffirmed the crew meeting in Micheli's trailer after the crew returned from the jobsite on the afternoon of May 14 but denied any conversation with Wendell Bridges as "he was already gone. . . . Bridges wasn't there. He left for Las Vegas . . . at 3:30. As soon as I talked with him at the jobsite." Reminded of his earlier testimony, Easter quickly recalled that Bridges had been present and that he told Bridges to take his final check with him back to Las Vegas so that he would not have to return to Tonopah. Thereupon, Easter contradicted his prior version of the meeting, testifying that Bridges said, "I'll try to get a transfer when I get back from Las Vegas." As with this latter response, Easter had changed the circumstances, resulting from that meeting, he was asked to explain why, with Bridges now willing to leave his crew, he went to Jim Joy to request Bridges' termination—"Because when he left to go to Las Vegas, he didn't come back till after the job—we'd already been working an hour or two." Informed that this last response did not at all comport with the facts as previously developed, Easter once again changed his testimony, stating, "He didn't even give me a good response. He said, 'I'm going to Las Vegas and I'll see you later.'"

Concerning the reason for Bridges' termination, Easter testified that he instructed Jim Joy on the evening of May 14 to place "unsafe" as the reason for the discharge: "He asked me why, and I told him he was unsafe to my crew." Joy informed Easter that Bridges' final check and a termination notice would be prepared and be ready by 7 a.m. the next day (May 15). Despite these rather explicit instructions, for some reason, Respondent has never seemed to understand the real reason for Bridges' termination. Thus, the next morning when, according to Easter, he went into the office trailer and Office Manager Flinchum handed him a termination notice for Bridges which notice gave as a reason, "drunk on the job." Easter stated that he immediately returned the notice to Flinchum and asked him to issue a new termination notice, reading "for safety reasons . . . ." Contradicting Easter, Flinchum testified that either Aiton Jr. or Joe Lively instructed him on May 13 to prepare a termination notice for Bridges, reading "too slow, poor work." Accordingly, he prepared a termination notice for Bridges, which was received into the record as Respondent's Exhibit 22 and which contains a checkmark next to the notation "Too slow—poor work." Further, Flinchum specifically denied preparing any termination notice for Bridges, stating that the latter was drinking on the job. In contrast to this testimony, Easter averred, "I terminated . . . Wendell Bridges because he was . . . not too slow, but unsafe." Finally, and further confusing the exact reason for Bridges' termination, is Respondent's Exhibit 24, a document prepared by Flinchum and which is a list of all discharged employees and the reasons for such; next to his name the reason for Bridges' termination reads: "Not qualified."

Whatever the reason for his termination, Bridges was terminated by Easter on May 15. The latter testified that Bridges arrived at the jobsite at 5 p.m., 2 hours late, and that he immediately spoke to Bridges, telling the latter that he was being discharged because he was "unsafe." Bridges "got a little belligerent" and said "that he was going to wobble the job." Easter replied, "Wobble be damned. I could care less."[67]

[66] Although he testified extensively at the hearing, Aiton III did not deny this conversation, and I previously credited Bridges as to what was said.

2. Analysis

The consolidated amended complaint alleges that Respondent terminated Wendell Bridges in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. In support, the General Counsel argues that Bridges engaged in protected concerted activities during his brief period of employment by Respondent (complaining to Lively about being assigned to the night crew and about having to work less than a 10-hour shift, attempting to gain the reinstatement of Kelly, and supporting Kelly in a threatened wildcat strike) and that Easter exhibited unlawful animus regarding Bridges' aforementioned activities. In contrast, Respondent minimizes the extent of whatever protected activities in which Bridges may have engaged and asserts that Easter exhibited no unlawful animus in his conduct toward Bridges. Further, counsel for Respondent contends that Bridges was terminated for legitimate reasons—unsafe work.

Analysis of the record discloses that not only did Bridges engage in protected concerted activities during his brief tenure of employment with Respondent but also that Respondent was well aware of the extent of and nature of Bridges' activities. Initially, although Bridges did not so testify, Easter admitted that on the night of May 12, Bridges informed him that Bridges intended to go over Easter's head and complain directly to Joe Lively about having been assigned to the night crew. In this regard, the record discloses, and it was uncontroverted, that earlier in the day Bridges had agreed to work the night crew on an experimental basis, that at some point in the evening he was informed by Bob Micheli that the night crew was to work less than a 10-hour shift, that Bridges became angered by this information, and that early the next morning (May 13) he had a heated conversation with Lively on the subject of the night crews' hours of work. Throughout his entire testimony, James Easter impressed me as being a contradictory and utterly dishonest witness who did not know the meaning of candor, and, except for inadvertent admissions or when corroborated by others, I do not rely on his testimony. Based on the foregoing, and the record as a whole, I believe that Bridges did, indeed, inform Easter, on the night of May 12, that he was going to complain directly to Lively the next day but that the subject matter was going to be the night crews' hours of work—not Bridges' assignment to that crew and that Easter's testimony is nothing more than a "cover-up" of the true nature of that conversation. Although not a matter covered by the Union's collective-bargaining agreement, the matter of the night crews' hours of work was a matter of urgent and common concern to all those on the crew, and when Bridges, who, I previously stated was a candid and forthright witness as to all matters, complained to Joe Lively concerning this issue, he engaged in protected concerted activities. Cal-Walts, Inc., supra; Rose's Stores, supra; Air Surrey Corp., supra.[68] Further, although there is no record evidence that Easter was aware that Bridges actually spoke to Lively, the record does warrant the conclusion that on May 12 Easter was aware that Bridges intended to go over Easter's head and do so the next day.

Next, all witnesses are in agreement that on May 14 Bridges sought Easter's consent to employ Robert Kelly on the night crew and I credit Bridges that he threatened to take the matter over Easter's head and directly to Lively. Further, by his own admission, Easter refused to employ Robert Kelly, stating that he wanted no "problems" on his crew.[69] There can be no doubt that Bridges engaged in conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act in making this request on Kelly's behalf. Thus, notwithstanding that the latter had just been terminated by Respondent, such termination was, I have previously concluded, unlawful, and Kelly, therefore, remained as an employee of Respondent. Even if not unlawfully discharged, Kelly must be viewed as a potential employee inasmuch as, with management's admitted assent, Kelly was diligently engaged in seeking employment on carpenter crews, supervised by all foremen, other than Don Davis. In this context, Bridges' request that Easter employ Kelly on his crew is directly analogous to an employee's protest to a supervisor regarding the discharge of a fellow employee—conduct that the Board and courts consider as within the protection of Section 7 of the Act. NLRB v. John S. Swift Co., 277 F.2d 641, 645–646 (7th Cir. 1960); Auto-Truck Federal Credit Union, 232 NLRB 1024, 1028 (1977). Further, the definition of "employee," within the meaning of Section 2(3) of the Act, has traditionally been viewed as broad enough to encompass potential employees. Phelps Dodge Corp. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 177 (1941); Pioneer Printers, 201 NLRB 900 (1973). Therefore, Bridges' request, on behalf of Kelly, was protected and concerted in nature. Finally, as to this May 14 conversation, although denied by Bridges, and of import in characterizing the latter's conduct, is Easter's admission, which I credit, that Bridges threatened that "they" were going to strike the project—the comment coming immediately after Easter refused to hire Kelly on his crew. It is gainsaid that a strike, or concerted work stoppage, in protest of the discharge of a fellow employee constitutes protected concerted activity. Go-Lightly Footwear, Inc., 251 NLRB 42 (1980); Diagnostic Center Hospital Corp. of Texas, 228 NLRB 1215 (1977). In agreement with the General Counsel, taking into account its context, the conclusion is warranted that Easter could only have taken Bridges' threat as a protest of Kelly's discharge or, at least, as a statement of support for such a protest—conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act. AMP, Incorporated, 218 NLRB 33, 36 (1975).[70]

[68] I do not believe that Bridges engaged in protected concerted activities when he complained to Lively on the afternoon of May 12 about his assignment to the night crew. Such appears to have been, by Bridges' own admission, a personal complaint about a matter of concern only to himself. I agree with Respondent in this regard. Inked Ribbon Corp., 241 NLRB 7, 12 (1979).

[69] I place no particular significance on the the reason for Easter's refusal except to the extent such reflects on his overall attitude towards Bridges.

Having established that Bridges engaged in protected concerted activities, however limited, and that Respondent, through Bridges, was aware of, or suspected, such conduct, I believe that the record establishes, and the General Counsel has proved, that Jim Easter, a newly appointed foreman and admittedly afraid of "problems" caused by his crew, harbored animus toward Bridges because the latter apparently went over his head and complained directly to Lively about the crews' hours and he supported Robert Kelly, who had recently been terminated by another foreman, and that Easter's termination of Bridges resulted from same. As to this, I initially note the ample—and well documented—evidence of Respondent's unlawful animus toward all union members, particularly those who protested perceived problems with their terms and conditions of employment. Specifically as to Bridges, as between himself and Easter, I credit the testimony of Bridges regarding the late afternoon or early evening conversation of May 14 (during which Bridges informed Easter that he was leaving in order to drive Kelly back to Las Vegas) and the discharge conversation of May 15. Further, I view Bridges' uncontroverted conversation with Aiton III, immediately after his discharge, as revealing the exact nature of Respondent's unlawful animus toward him. Thus, during their early evening, May 14 conversation, Easter accused Bridges of being "queer" for Kelly and warned him that in order to remain on his crew, Bridges should "stay out of other people's business." Clearly, this was nothing less than a thinly veiled threat of discharge if Bridges continued to support Kelly—conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act. Next, during their discharge conversation on May 15, Easter asserted that Bridges had a "problem" and that he wanted "no problems" on his crew. That Easter, who averred that he wanted to avoid conflicts with other supervisors, quite obviously was again referring to Bridges' protected concerted activities and not to the latter's job performance is clear from the subsequent comments of Aiton III, regarding the fact that Bridges' work was not an issue or cause of his discharge: "That's not the point . . . . Anyone that creates any problems from now on is going down the road." (Emphasis added.) There can be only one inference drawn from the aforementioned—that Bridges' problem was having engaged in protected concerted activity and that he was terminated for having so participated.

Turning next to whether Respondent has established that Bridges would have been terminated notwithstanding having engaged in conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act, I note that Respondent's defense rests solely on the testimony of Jim Easter and conclude, based on my belief that his demeanor was that of an untruthful witness, that this defense is nothing more than a sham and pretextual in nature. In this regard, I credit the testimony of Bridges regarding his work and the events of the night of May 13, his only work on the night crew. Thus, I believe that Bridges, Micheli, and Curtis performed that work of tying a wall form for an inside wall of the crusher building; that Bridges was assigned to, and worked, the feeder position; that although inexperienced at such work while supported only by means of a safety belt, Bridges did not cause any unnecessary delays in the rate of work that night; and that although Micheli and Curtis may have believed work was progressing more slowly than normal, such was the fault of the crews' laborer, a fact about which Micheli and Curtis were unaware. Notwithstanding Bridges' testimony, Easter insisted that his decision to terminate the former was based solely on his observation that Bridges was an "unsafe" worker. However, despite Easter's consistent testimony, the record, as a whole, is utterly contradictory on this point. Although Easter maintained that he informed both James Joy and Robert Flinchum, the office manager, that "unsafe" was the reason for Bridges' discharge, such did, and does, not appear on any of Respondent's documentation of the termination. Rather, two termination notices were prepared for Bridges; the first asserted that Bridges had been drinking on the job and the second listed as the discharge reason: "too slow—poor work." Further, in a document that was prepared expressly for the hearing, Bridges is listed as having been discharged for being "not qualified." Moreover, Flinchum's testimony directly contradicted that of Easter. Thus, although the latter says he specifically instructed Joy to list unsafe as to the discharge reason, Flinchum stated that either Joy or Aiton Jr. instructed him to list "too slow—poor work" as the rationale. Also, despite Easter's testimony to the contrary, Flinchum specifically denied ever preparing a termination notice for Bridges, which notice listed drinking while working as the reason.

Besides the aforementioned problems with the rationale for Bridges' termination, Easter's testimony concerning his decision-making process was contradictory, confusing, and uncorroborated. Thus, not only did Easter contradict himself as to when he decided that Bridges must be terminated (was that decision reached on the night of May 13, at 12 noon on May 14, or at approximately 6 p.m. on May 14) but also he was contradictory as to what Bridges supposedly said at the alleged crew meeting on May 14, which comment, according to Easter, precipitated his request to Joy for Bridges' termination (of course, at one point Easter denied the former's presence at the meeting). Also Easter contradicted himself as to exactly why he went to Joy on May 14 with the aforementioned request, at one point testifying that his rationale was that Bridges' absence left him a worker short on his crew—a reason that would place the discharge decision subsequent to 3 p.m. on May 15. Further, I credit Bridges' testimony that he never refused Easter's offer, after work on May 13, to move him inside the wall forms during the tying process, noting that Easter's admission, that prior to work on May 14, he believed Bridges would accept whatever work was assigned to him, corroborates Bridges as to that point. Bearing in mind the admission, I fail to understand Eas-

[70] I place no reliance on the alleged strike comments by Bridges, in support of Kelly, back at the dry camp on May 14. I do not do so particularly because it cannot be definitely established that Easter was present to hear, or even became aware of, anything said by Bridges. Thus, I note the contradictory testimony of Bridges and Kelly and do not believe that any conclusions may be drawn therefrom.

ter's assertion that he was forced to seek Bridges' termination because the latter refused to accept any job alternatives that Easter offered. Finally, although Easter asserted that he discussed the termination of Bridges with Aiton III prior to learning of Bridges' support for Kelly, Aiton III, despite extensive testimony, failed to corroborate Easter on this point, permitting the inference that he would not have corroborated Easter.

Accordingly, inasmuch as Respondent's defense appears to be a sham and pretextual, the inference is permissible, indeed, warranted that the true motive for the termination of Wendell Bridges is one that Respondent sought to conceal—his protected concerted activities. Shattuck Denn Mining Corp. v. NLRB, 362 F.2d 466, 470 (9th Cir. 1966); J. P. Stevens & Co., 247 NLRB 420 (1980). In these circumstances, I conclude that the termination of Bridges was violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.[71]

E. The Discharges of David M. Doran and John R. Angle

1. The facts

David Doran, who is a carpenter by trade and a member of the Union, was among the initial group of carpenters hired by Respondent for work at the mine project in Tonopah—starting to work about April 1. Initially, Doran was assigned to work in the yard area where he constructed wall forms under the direct supervision of Joe Lively. While under the latter's supervision, Doran and another carpenter, Don Jackson, continually complained about Lively's propensity to perform carpenter work despite a contractual prohibition against such. These complaints culminated in Lively threatening to terminate both Doran and Jackson if they continued to complain in that regard.[72] At some point in April, Jackson was promoted to a foreman position, and Doran was assigned to his crew. After Jackson resigned his position in early May, Doran was assigned to work on the carpenter crew at the reclaim tunnels, under the supervision of Bruce Alford. According to Doran, the reclaim tunnels crew consisted of himself, John Angle, Mitchel Getz, Bob Steadman, and John Steadman.

The record establishes that Aiton III was appointed to the position of superintendent, in overall charge of the reclaim tunnels area, on approximately May 1. According to Doran, from the day of his own assignment to Alford's crew until his termination on May 30, he observed Aiton III, in violation of the Union's collective-bargaining agreement, giving work orders directly to carpenters on eight or nine different occasions. Doran further testified that he complained to Mike Herndon regarding the conduct of Aiton III "a couple of times." Unable to recall specifically who, Herndon testified that "the whole crew down at the reclaim area" on various occasions complained about direct supervision by Aiton III. Thereafter, without identifying the source of the complaints, Herndon had two separate conversations with Aiton III regarding that subject. During one conversation, according to Herndon, Aiton III asked why he could not directly supervise the carpenters at the reclaim tunnels as by doing so, he would avoid wasting time searching for Bruce Alford. Although not disputing this logic, Herndon explained that Aiton III was wrong, that the chain of command, as set forth in the contract, would be broken, and that the crewmembers worked for their foremen.

Notwithstanding Herndon's admonition, the record discloses that on May 28, Aiton III assumed supervision of the reclaim tunnels crew from Alford and directed its work for the entire day. According to Aiton III, after having observed the work of that crew for a 2-week period, he believed that its production was not at an acceptable level; however, he was not sure whether this production failure was the fault of the crew or of the foreman. Accordingly, "I then spent one full day actually supervising the crew on my own and giving them orders." Concluding that the carpenters on the crew were working "in a very efficient manner," he decided that Alford was at fault and that he should be replaced. That he acted in violation of the Union's collective-bargaining agreement does not appear to have been a concern to Aiton III.

In any event, according to Doran, he reported for work on May 29 at 6 p.m. at which time Aiton III "gave a little speech before we went to work. He apologized. He said, 'Guys, I'm sorry I had to take over for the day, but I had to find out who was screwing up, you or your boss.'" After commending the crew on doing a good job, Aiton III announced that a new foreman would be transferred to the reclaim tunnels area. As the short meeting concluded, Doran testified, "I confronted him and told him that there was no excuse for breaking our union rules, because our union's weak enough the way it is. And he just stormed off." John Angle, who is a member of the Union and had been working on the Tonopah jobsite since May 1 (at all times on the reclaim tunnels crew),[73] testified that on the day after he supervised the [71] Although he clearly engaged in protected concerted activities and was discharged for same, there is no evidence that Bridges engaged in union activities. Accordingly, I shall dismiss that portion of the consolidated amended complaint, alleging that Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(3) of the Act by that conduct.

[72] The exact wording of Lively's threat to Doran and Jackson and the surrounding circumstances were more fully set forth and analyzed earlier in the instant decision.

[73] Angle testified that on the morning of May 21, Aiton III asked for volunteers from the reclaim tunnels crew to help in an emergency situation at the crusher building work area at which, with a concrete pour scheduled to occur that day, problems arose with the wall forms. Aiton III told the employees that "if we would come with him right then, he would pay us for our break." Angle, who believed that the union contract requires payment whenever members are forced to work through the normal break period, Getz and John Steadman volunteered to help, and the record discloses that they worked without morning or lunch breaks, bracing a wall form while the concrete pour progressed. After completing their work and taking lunch breaks, Angle and the others returned to the reclaim tunnels area where, in the presence of the entire crew, according to Angle, he complained about the conditions under which the three employees worked and demanded extra wages for working through the morning and lunch breaks. Bruce Alford replied that he would check with management.

Angle further testified that he spoke to Alford that night in the dry camp and on, at least, three or four other occasions regarding his demand for payment for the missed morning and lunch breaks on May 21. He fur-crew, Aiton III spoke to the carpenters prior to work and apologized for what he did the day before. Aiton III said there been trouble at the reclaim tunnels; that, at first, he believed the problem was the fault of the crew; but that now he realized that the problem resulted from Alford being a "poor" foreman. After instructing the men to commence working, Aiton III was approached by Doran, who said that the crew was not supposed to take orders from Aiton III because he was a superintendent. That latter replied "that he would get a foreman." According to Angle, Aiton III "wasn't happy" inasmuch as he abruptly broke off the conversation and walked away. Recalling that he spoke to each crewmember individually rather than to the reclaim tunnels crew as a whole, Aiton III testified that he explained to each carpenter what the problem was and what he intended to do as a solution. According to Aiton III, he so spoke to Doran, and the latter replied, "I don't feel you have any business running the crew." He responded "that I had to do it to make sure that the crew itself was not at fault." Aiton III further testified that Doran indicated his agreement, and Aiton III walked away. The record further discloses that John P. Hendershot Jr. assumed the role of foreman over the reclaim tunnels carpenter crew that day at approximately noontime.

The record reveals that on the next day (May 30) Doran and Angle were assigned to "pour watch" duty and that such required them to work through the normal lunch hour. The concrete pour was not completed until approximately 12:45 p.m., at which time both employees took their lunch breaks, eating together in back of the reclaim tunnels job shack.[74] Doran testified that for lunch, he ate a hamburger and drank A & W root beer from a can but that he did not observe whatever Angle ate or drank. According to Doran, 10 or 15 minutes into the break period, Aiton III approached and asked what they were doing. Doran replied that they were eating lunch as their pour watch had been completed. Aiton III asked where they were supposed to go after lunch, and after both men responded that they did not know, the superintendent replied that he would send Hendershot over with instructions.[75] Aiton III then left where Doran and Angle were eating, and 10 minutes later, Hendershot came over to them and ordered them to help construct a scaffolding, which was necessary for work on a footing of the radial arm stacker. Regarding the lunch break that day, Doran denied drinking any sort of alcoholic beverage. Regarding what he consumed for lunch, John Angle testified that he ate a hamburger and drank Gatorade from a can, which was enclosed in a styrofoam cooler. Angle stated that although he noticed that Doran also ate a hamburger, he had no idea what beverage Doran drank. According to Angle, Hendershot was the first supervisor to come over to them. He told Doran and Angle to help construct the scaffolding at the radial arm stacker after they finished eating lunch, saying nothing about Doran and Angle drinking beer or any other alcoholic beverage. Hendershot left them, and, Angle further testified, 15 minutes later, Aiton III walked over to where the two employees were seated. Angle continued, testifying that Aiton III spoke directly to Doran, that Angle could not hear what was said because of the loud equipment noise, and that by the time of this conversation, he and Doran had finished eating and returned all the luncheon materials to their respective lunchboxes. Like Doran, Angle specifically denied drinking any alcoholic beverage with his lunch.

Both Doran and Angle testified that after lunch and pursuant to Hendershot's instructions, they helped work on the wood scaffolding at the radial arm stacker.[76] According to Doran, no more than 15 minutes after finishing lunch and while both he and Angle were working high on it, Aiton III drove up to the base of the structure in a pickup truck and yelled up to them, "Guys, I'm going to have to let you go." After instructing the two employees to go back to the office and to pick up their final checks, Doran asked Aiton III why he was discharging them. The superintendent replied "Drinking on the job," and he said that supervisory witnesses who were on the hill saw them drinking. Thereupon, Aiton III drove off in the pickup truck. Doran further testified that he did not deny this accusation, averring, first, that he had not time to do so as Aiton III drove off so quickly and, later, because "I figured it wouldn't do any good anyway." Doran added that he left the jobsite at approximately 1:30 p.m., after Jim Joy gave him his final check. As with the lunch events, John Angle's recollection of the scaffolding incident contradicts that of Doran. Thus, Angle testified that 15 minutes after lunch and while he and Doran were working on the scaffolding, Aiton III drove up to the work area in a pickup truck and motioned to Doran and Angle to come over to him. They did so, and "[Aiton III] was upset. He just got out of the truck and said 'We are going to have to let you go; get your tools.'" He then told the two employees to get into the truck; they did so and were taken to the office trailer, where Angle received his final check. According to Angle, while angry, Doran said nothing when ther characterized Alford as not only never appearing upset at Angle's complaints but also as agreeing with the validity of Angle's demand. Finally, approximately 5 days prior to Angle's termination on May 30, Alford informed Angle that Aiton III had decided that "we would get paid for the lunch but we wouldn't get paid extra for the break." As far as can be determined from the record, the incident was closed.

[74] The record establishes that this job shack is located between the two reclaim tunnels and that it was regularly used by the members of the crew for their luncheon breaks. Neither Doran nor Angle explained why each chose to eat lunch behind rather than inside the job shack this day.

[75] Doran stated that while Aiton III spoke to them, both had their luncheon food and drinks on the ground between them and that Aiton III said nothing about alcoholic beverages.

[76] The record establishes that in May 1980 the radial arm stacker, which rests on a series of concrete footings, was located on a hill, 10 to 15 feet above the reclaim tunnels job shack and facing the rear of the building. David Doran testified that the particular footing, at which the crew was constructing the scaffolding, was located 50 feet from the back of the job shack. Dennis Jensen, the foremen who was supervising the construction of the scaffolding, testified that the footing was located in the middle of the radial arm stacker, was directly above the job shack, and was 50 to 60 feet from the building. Aiton III corroborated Jensen as to the placement of the footing, estimating that such was 80 feet from the job shack. The foregoing must be contrasted with the testimony of carpenter employee Mitchell Getz who stated that the footing, on which the crew was working on May 30, was the second or third from the end (to the left of center as one faced the job shack) and was 50 yards from the back of the job shack.

Aiton III terminated them, and he did not learn the reason for their terminations until told by Doran, while driving back to the dry camp, that they had been observed drinking on the job.[77]

Respondent's defense, and justification for the termination of Doran and Angle, is that both were observed drinking beer with their lunch on May 30, and, as such is directly prohibited by Respondent, the two employees were immediately terminated.[78] Dennis Jensen, the foreman over work on the radial arm stacker at that time, testified that on May 29, he ate his lunch in the reclaim tunnels job shack and that present and also eating lunch were Doran, Angle, Mitchell Getz, Bob and John Steadman, and John Hendershot. He further testified that both Doran and Angle were drinking beer with their respective lunches, that Doran was drinking Coors light beer (the "Silver Bullet"), and that Angle drank Pabst Blue Ribbon beer. According to Jensen, neither he nor Hendershot commented on what he observed. However, Hendershot, who is a member of the Union, had worked on the jobsite since early May and had just been appointed a foreman that day by Aiton III, and who admittedly did not think beer with lunch was particularly harmful, testified that not only did he observe Doran and Angle drinking beer during the lunch, but also he said right then to both, "Look don't do it in front of me. I just got up here. It's company policy, you know. Any other time . . . you're going to be sent down the road."[79] As to whether either employee consumed beer with his lunch that day, Angle admitted eating his lunch in the job shack, stated that he ate a hamburger and drank a 7-Up, but had "no idea" who else was in the shack, what Doran drank with his lunch, or whether anyone had beer with his lunch that day. Doran could not recall whether he drank beer with his lunch and did not know what, if anything, Angle consumed during lunch.[80]

In any event, Jensen testified that immediately after lunch he pulled Hendershot aside "and told him that I knew that we were working for; and if they would not only fire them, they would also fire us for letting them drink . . . . [Hendershot] said he would take care of it." According to Hendershot, Jensen did, indeed, speak to him after lunch regarding beer drinking—"He said this was part of the problem that had been going on." Whatever, having just been appointed as the reclaim tunnels crew foreman and cognizant of work-related problems in that area,[81] Hendershot attempted to solve the perceived problem of beer drinking on that crew by speaking to Mike Herndon later that afternoon. "And I told him, 'Go up and say something to them. If they're going to do it, at least have sense to hide it because we've got a company policy; and the instant they're caught, they're going to be fired.'"[82] That evening, Hendershot also reported the beer drinking incident to Aiton III. Although not identifying the employees involved, Hendershot told Aiton III "just that the conversation happened, an incident had happened, and what transpired of it." He concluded, "And if its [sic] caught again, that's all there is to it, then they're fired." Aiton III replied, "'Well, O.K., that's fair . . . . you know next time, its you or them.'" Aiton III corroborated the occurrence of such a conversation, placing it late in the afternoon of May 29 and stating that Hendershot accused the entire crew of drinking beer during lunch that day. According to Aiton III, Hendershot informed him that Hendershot warned the crew not to be caught drinking again; Aiton III replied that in those circumstances, he would not become involved.

Notwithstanding his pledge, Aiton III testified that on May 30 at the exact time Doran and Angle were eating their lunch behind the reclaim tunnels job shack, he was standing at the radial arm stacker footing, on which [77] Admitting that he received a termination notice, Angle testified that he was not interested in its contents as he was such a great distance from Las Vegas.

[78] The record disclosed that on being hired each individual, employed by Respondent at the Tonopah Mine project, was given by Respondent a sheet of paper that set forth various work-related and safety information and that required the employee's signature at the bottom. Regarding the consumption of alcoholic beverages, the document states: "A WORD OF WARNING—A man must be completely sober to STAY ALIVE around construction equipment. We will not tolerate drinking on the jobsite; don't plan to sober up at work. We will not risk the lives of our men on the retarded reflexes of the man who has 'had a couple.'" Both Doran and Angle admitted knowledge of this rule. In this regard, Doran identified R. Exh. 14, which is a copy of the aforementioned document and which bears his signature. Angle was shown a similar document, which bears what was alleged as his signature but, he testified, was his name but not his signature. Comparison of this alleged signature with a sample of Angle's handwriting by me disclosed that the writing of Angle's name on Respondent's document was not done by Angle.

[79] During cross-examination, John Angle testified to a similar conversation but under entirely different circumstances. According to Angle, Hendershot was introduced as the new foreman to the entire crew after lunch on May 29 and that later in the afternoon, Angle was standing next to Mitchell Getz in the reclaim tunnels area while the latter had a conversation with Hendershot. "[Hendershot] said he . . . likes to drink a beer at lunch and he didn't see anything wrong with it, but we shouldn't make it publicized or get caught with it." Hendershot also said that "he didn't want to lose his position by somebody seeing us drink." Under further questioning, Angle changed his version of Hendershot's warning to, "If you are going to drink beer, keep out of sight" and, finally, to, "He said he didn't want anybody seeing us drinking beer during lunch; it might hinder his job." Mitchell Getz, a carpenter by trade and a member of the Union, who had been employed by Respondent since May 1, testified to a third version of this conversation. According to Getz, early in the morning on the day he assumed the position of foreman, while the crewmembers were preparing for work, Hendershot spoke on a variety of subjects, among them drinking on the job. He said "that there was a company policy that there should be no drinking on the job; that he didn't mind, personally; and so that, if we were going to, we would have to be very discreet and police the area—get rid of the empties . . . ."

[80] Another alleged luncheon participant, Mitchell Getz, who "exhibited" a detailed memory as to other incidents, testified, "I've forgotton [sic] what I was doing on May 29."

[81] According to Hendershot, at the time Aiton III promoted him, the former told him that "the job just wasn't going right, and he needed production . . . ."

[82] Herndon corroborated Hendershot, testifying that one day at the end of May, the latter came to him and explained that he had just been appointed as the foreman at the reclaim tunnels and that some members of his crew had been drinking beer during lunch. Hendershot then asked Herndon to speak to the crewmembers and tell them that such was against the company's rules and that they should not do it. Herndon further testified that the next day, he went over to the reclaim tunnels area and spoke to the two employees who were on pour watch duty. "I just explained to them that the foreman had notified me that some of the men were drinking, and it was illegal, and we'd signed a paper . . . that we wouldn't drink on the job, and that they could be fired if they were caught." Herndon identified the two carpenters as Dave Doran and Bob Steadman and said that he could not recall speaking to John Angle.

Doran and Angle specifically denied speaking to Herndon on May 30.

Dennis Jensen's crew was working.[83] Jensen approached and asked whether Aiton III was aware of what was happening behind the job shack. The latter, who had been observing the work, turned toward the job shack and saw Doran and Angle, sitting with their backs up against the shack and drinking beer.[84] After Jensen suggested that if he wanted a better look, he should go down to the job shack, Aiton III walked down the hill to the left of the job shack, through the reclaim tunnels, and around the front of the job shack, and came up to where Doran and Angle were seated from behind them.[85] According to Aiton III, as he came around the side of the building, both employees were holding beer cans in their right hands; then, as each noticed Aiton III, he placed the can behind his legs.[86] Also, both Doran and Angle were sitting, with Doran closest to Aiton III and Angle no more than 6 feet away. Confronting the two men, Aiton III further testified, "I said, 'Gentlemen, we can't go for this drinking . . . . I know you've been warned yesterday by . . . Hendershot, and we can't go for it' . . . Doran replied, 'Yeah, we were warned about drinking in the job shack, so we figured we'd get out back here where we couldn't get caught.'"[87] Denying that he instructed the two employees to start working at the radial arm stacker and testifying that he assumed Doran and Angle would follow him, Aiton III turned and walked away.

Respondent's other alleged eyewitness to this incident, Dennis Jensen, testified that while he was directing work that day at the footing of the radial arm stacker,[88] he noticed that both Doran and Angle were sitting at the back of the job shack and that each was drinking a can of beer.[89] At that point, Aiton III approached him and, pointing to where Doran and Angle were sitting, said they would work with him the remainder of the day. While Aiton III looked toward the two employees, he asked "if they were doing what he thought they were doing." Jensen replied, "It looks like it." Thereupon, according to Jensen, Aiton III, on his own initiative, said that he was going to go down to the job shack and come up behind Doran and Angle. Jensen further testified that Aiton III then walked down the hill and around the job shack and came on Doran and Angle from behind and that Aiton III had a conversation with them. Next, Jensen testified, Aiton III walked back up the hill to where he stood, instructed Jensen to keep Doran and Angle on the ground, and asked if Jensen knew where Hendershot was. A moment later, the latter walked over to Aiton III and Jensen. Hendershot and the superintendent spoke about Doran and Angle drinking that afternoon. Hendershot stated that they had been warned the day before, and both men agreed that Doran and Angle would "get their checks." Jensen also testified that the two discriminatees worked for him for just 15 minutes that afternoon and that he did not assign either one to work up on the scaffolding.

Denying that he spoke to Jensen after confronting Doran and Angle that afternoon, Aiton III testified that he met Hendershot on the road between the reclaim tunnels. "I told him that I had caught [Doran and Angle] drinking again . . . and told [him] that I was going to [83] The exact positions of Aiton III and Jensen are crucial to Respondent's defense. Thus, Angle testified that while he and Doran ate lunch, the remainder of the crew was, at least, 300 yards away and the closest persons to them were some surveyors, who were standing 75 yards away. Also, Hendershot testified that at approximately the same time that Doran and Angle were eating lunch, he observed Aiton III with "a whole bunch of company officials . . . . up on top of the hill there, looking over the project out in our area." Hendershot stated that the group of officials had just completed an inspection of the concrete pour at the radial arm stacker and were "just standing there looking the site over." Hendershot further testified that the footings of this structure were at the bottom of this hill and that the job shack was at essentially the same level as that of the radial arm stacker footings. Also, he testified that he was on the hill but the others were higher up than he; that there was an unobstructed view of the job shack from this hill; and that inasmuch as he was working at the time, Hendershot did not spend any significant amount of time observing the company officials. Finally, Hendershot could not recall seeing either Jensen or Aiton III at the footing of the radial arm stacker.

Mitchell Getz also testified regarding the positions of Jensen and Aiton III while Doran and Angle ate lunch on May 30. According to Getz, he was working up on the scaffolding at the footings of the radial arm stacker and that he observed Doran and Angle eating lunch behing the job shack. At this time, Getz further testified, Aiton III was "on the hill between the stacker and the crusher." As to whether he observed Aiton III at the base of the footings, Getz averred that "I don't remember" and that "I did not see it." He was more specific as to Jensen, asserting that the latter was not, at that time, directing work at the footing and that Getz did not even see Jensen at that location while Doran and Angle ate lunch.

[84] Asked how he knew what Doran and Angle were drinking from a distance away, Aiton III responded, "We could see the cans." When questioned further by me, Aiton III identified the beer brand that Doran was drinking as Coors Regular. Asked how he could be so sure, Aiton III averred that the brand of beer is contained in a distinctive yellow can. As to Angle, Aiton III admitted, "I never did see Angle clearly."

[85] Asked on cross-examination why he chose to have a closer look at what Doran and Angle were doing, Aiton III said, "Basically to actually catch them, say, red-handed," and "I needed to make sure, yes, before I discharged them." Pressed as to why it was necessary to catch Doran and Angle "red-handed," Aiton III responded, "For basically what we're going through now. It's not a matter of whether Mr. Joy believed me. It's other persons that might get involved." Asked the same question again, he answered, "Because I'm not in the habit of viewing something from a distance, not letting the individuals in question know anything and just show up with their checks . . . . I obviously had to make it apparent to them . . . let them know I caught them." Finally, Aiton III denied that it was his desire to catch Doran and Angle red-handed.

[86] Aiton III testified that prior to both Doran and Angle hiding the cans behind their legs, he confirmed, in his mind, that Doran was drinking from a Coors Regular beer can, recognizing "its color" and "the general configurations" on the label. However, as to Angle, Aiton III noticed only that he was holding a "blue can," at the hearing admitting that he did not know it was a beer can but that he just assumed the can was, in fact, a beer can as "the . . . can I saw in his hand resembled a Pabst can." Further, Aiton III denied that Angle's can was within a styrofoam container. Later, during cross-examination, Aiton III became more positive regarding the can from which Angle drank: "I saw Mr. Angle drinking out a beer can that I knew at that time was a beer can . . . ."

[87] According to Aiton III, he believed that Angle heard what he said as there was no loud noise interference (while a crane was operating, it was over 200 feet away).

[89] Jensen averred, "I could see vividly what they were drinking at that distance." As to Doran, he was drinking Coors Light beer—"a lot of people call it the Silver Bullet. And you can spot that can a mile away. It['s] a distinct can." As to Angle, Jensen identified his can as a Pabst Blue Ribbon beer can and denied that the can was wrapped within a styrofoam container. According to Jensen, "Frankly, because I never thought Pabst was a very good beer, that's one reason I noticed [Angle] drinking Pabst—because I figure he probably got it on sale. And the Silver Bullet, it['s] just a distinct beer. Matter of fact, it's the beer I drink."

have to fire them." Hendershot replied, "Oh, shit," and shrugged his shoulders; Aiton III turned and walked away.[90] Hendershot testified that he was unaware that Doran and Angle had been observed drinking that day until so informed by Aiton III. According to Hendershot, Aiton III came over to him and said that his pep talk did not work because Aiton III caught Doran and Angle drinking again. Hendershot states that he replied, "Well, you caught them. What the hell do you want me to do." He further testified that as he knew where Doran and Angle were eating their lunches, he went and informed them that they had been caught drinking.

After speaking to Hendershot, according to Aiton III, he went to the office trailer and instructed Office Manager Flinchum to prepare final checks and termination notices for the two discharged employees. Aiton III then walked out of the office and encountered Mike Herndon just outside the trailer. According to the former, he asked Herndon if he knew what had happened and said that he had to fire Doran and Angle. Herndon replied, "That's all you can do." Next, Aiton III testified that he drove back toward the radial arm stacker and was surprised to find Doran and Angle working there. He instructed the two employees to go to the office saying, "'I'm going to have to let you go for drinking.'" Neither denied the accusation, and Doran responded that he should go ahead and fire them and threatened that the job would be struck the next day. Aiton III then offered to give Doran and Angle rides, but they refused.

Mike Herndon testified that he first learned that Doran and Angle had been terminated during a conversation with Aiton III and Hendershot that afternoon in the yard near the office trailer. Aiton III said that he had just caught the employees drinking beer and was going to terminate them. Later, according to Herndon, he noticed Doran and Angle preparing to leave the jobsite, and he spoke to them. Doran seemed angry but neither employee denied having consumed beer that afternoon. "The only thing [Doran] said to me was that it was his word against theirs."[91]

The General Counsel contends that, assuming Doran and Angle were, in fact, drinking beer on May 30, such was not a valid reason for discharge inasmuch as not only was the rule prohibiting the consumption of alcoholic beverages on the jobsite not strictly enforced but also the practice was actually condoned by Respondent. In support, he points out, and the record establishes, that beer cans, on occasion, could be found in the employee parking area near the jobsite[92] and that it was the custom of union members to drink beer with their lunches. He further points to the testimony of Wendell Bridges that the night crew foreman, Jim Easter, openly consumed the contents of a one pint bottle of vodka just a few hours prior to work on May 13. Next, counsel relies on the testimony of carpenter Mitchell Getz on cross-examination that on one occasion he observed Foreman Obie Bodiroga sitting in a truck, parked between the crusher building and the radial arm stacker, and drinking whiskey. Getz averred that he knew the foreman was drinking whiskey because "it was in a whiskey bottle." However, under intensive questioning, Getz admitted that he did not see a brand name and that "I don't know that it was a whiskey bottle. It was a flat pocket flask, that I have identified with a pint bottle of liquor." Getz further admitted that he only assumed the "flask" contained whiskey as "that is the only thing I have seen in bottles that look like that." Specifically pertaining to the carpenter crew at the reclaim tunnels, Doran, Angle, and Getz all testified that the practice of drinking beer with lunch was common on that crew and was openly permitted by Foreman Bruce Alford. In this regard although there is no evidence that Aiton III or other upper level managerial officials were aware, Doran testified that Bruce Alford brought beer to the jobsite one day and informed the crewmembers that he had no objection to the crew drinking beer with lunch as long as cans were put back in the lunchboxes and not left lying on the ground and that, thereafter, all crewmembers had beer with their respective lunches, with the drinking normally confined to the job shack. Both Angle and Getz corroborated Doran in this regard; however, Getz added that there was much beer can litter around the reclaim tunnels area, with as many as "a couple of cases of cans" lying around. This latter assertion is open to doubt in light of the above testimony of Doran, the testimony of Mike Herndon that he never saw empty beer cans on the jobsite, and the testimony of Angle, who gave as the reason why he put the can, from which he had been drinking during lunch on May 30, back in his lunchbox—"We never threw trash out. That was one of the things Bruce always was after us about . . . . He didn't want garbage, or trash, or anything." Getz testified further that beer drinking during lunch continued on Hendershot's crew after the terminations of Doran and Angle, with Getz drinking beer approximately three times a week and in Hendershot's presence in the job shack—a practice that the latter specifically denied. Finally, the General Counsel points to the content of Hendershot's comments to the crew on May 29 as establishing that Hendershot, who saw nothing wrong with a beer for lunch, did not mind beer drinking as long as the people left no beer can litter on the project. In this regard, Angle interpreted Hendershot's comment as follows: "I took that to mean that you better not drink any beer on the job when he was there."

2. Analysis

The consolidated amended complaint alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating employee David Doran and John Angle. In support, the General Counsel argues that each engaged in protected concerted activity, that the individual who effectuated the terminations, Aiton III, harbored animus against all employees who created "problems" on the project, and that the discharges occurred just 1 day after Doran angered Aiton III by accusing the latter, in the presence of the entire reclaim tunnels crew, of acting in violation of the union contract by directly supervising the crew. Contrary to this, counsel for Respondent argues that Doran and Angle were terminated for violating Respondent's express prohibition against the consumption of alcoholic beverages on the jobsite. As to this, the General Counsel asserts that Respondent's defense is wholly fabricated and, even if Doran and Angle were drinking on May 30, that Respondent's "prohibition" was openly violated by its own foremen and that drinking on the jobsite was condoned.

[90] On cross-examination, Aiton III changed Hendershot's reply to, "Oh, shit . . . . And I had warned both those guys yesterday."

[91] At the hearing, both Doran and Angle denied drinking any sort of alcoholic beverage on the afternoon of May 30. Regarding which brand of beer each favors, Doran stated that he normally drinks Coors Regular beer but, on occasion, he drinks Coors Light, and Angle stated that he normally drinks Pabst Blue Ribbon beer.

[92] The parking area was utilized by employees of all subcontractors, including Respondent, on the jobsite.

At the outset, I believe that the General Counsel has made a prima facie showing that David Doran's union activities were a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to terminate him. Initially, Respondent's witnesses, Lively and Aiton III, admit that Doran, on at least two occasions, raised contract-based complaints regarding their conduct—to Lively for performing bargaining unit work and to Aiton III for having directly supervised the work of the reclaim tunnels crew. That Lively reacted adversely to Doran's conduct is clear, for he admittedly threatened to terminate both Doran and Don Jackson because of the complaints. As to Aiton III, he did not deny the testimony of Wendell Bridges that on the afternoon of May 15 Aiton III warned, "Anyone that creates any problems from now on is going down the road." I have previously drawn the inference that, based on Respondent's conduct herein, by "problems," Aiton III was referring to "union problems" or employees engaging in protected concerted activities. In the ensuing 15-day period not only did Mike Herndon do so on two occasions but also Doran directly complained to Aiton III regarding assuming supervisory authority over the reclaim tunnels crew. The next day after so complaining, Doran was terminated by Aiton III. Clearly, then, the inference is warranted, indeed, mandated that Doran's union activities may have been a motivating factor in his discharge.

As to John Angle, whether a prima facie showing of unlawful animus has been established is less certain. Thus, notwithstanding the aforementioned animus exhibited by Aiton III toward union adherents, the fact is that Angle's sole instance of having engaged in union or other protected concerted activities concerns his demand to Respondent for payment for having worked through his morning break and lunch break periods on May 21. In this regard, Angle admits that he raised the matter only to Bruce Alford and that Alford not only agreed but also exhibited no anger over Angle's demands. Further, there is no evidence that Aiton III reacted negatively to Angle's demand or that after Aiton III responded, Angle continued to insist on increased compensation. In fact, Angle seems to have accepted Respondent's answer to his demand. Accordingly, although Angle may have engaged in union and/or other protected concerted activities, I will not draw the inference that such was a motivating factor in his discharge. However, I do find merit in the General Counsel's alternative argument that, if Doran was unlawfully terminated by Respondent, Angle was an unoffending victim of the conduct. In concluding that the discharge of employees, along with clearly, unlawfully terminated workers, is likewise unlawful, the Board often adopts the rationale that "it is clear that their layoff was essential to give colorable support to the claim [that the discharges were lawfully motivated]. As the claim has been found to lack merit, their layoff was also unlawful." Hall of Mississippi, Inc., 249 NLRB 775, 778 fn. 7 (1980). Accordingly, inasmuch as Respondent's defense is identical for both Doran and Angle (with each discharge intertwined in the other), if Doran was unlawfully discharged, the same conclusion must be drawn as to that of Angle.

As with all the instant discharges, the question is has Respondent established that the discharges of Doran and Angle would have occurred notwithstanding the union and/or protected concerted activities of David Doran. Put another way, has Respondent established that these two employees were discharged for having violated a work rule, of which both were admittedly aware—a rule prohibiting the comsumption of alcoholic beverages on the jobsite. In this regard, I must initially determine whether Doran and Angle were, in fact, drinking beer with their respective lunches on May 30, and I note that such involves essentially a matter of credibility—do I believe Aiton III and Jensen that they observed the foregoing, prohibited conduct or do I credit the explicit denials of same by Doran and Angle. Both the General Counsel and counsel for Respondent have set forth cogent and convincing arguments that not one of the above individuals should be credited and, indeed, I did not find either Aiton III, Jensen, Doran, or Angle to be a particularly convincing witness. Thus, as to the former pair, their testimony as to what they observed, said, and did on May 30 was utterly contradictory. Likewise, Doran and Angle, besides contradicting each other as to the events of May 30, were directly contradicted on significant points by other witnesses, who testified on behalf of the General Counsel. Additionally, I found utterly unpersuasive their respective lapses of memory with regard to important events and conversations. Yet, they either were or were not drinking beer with lunch that day.

With credibility problems as to each of the four main witnesses, I look to the other witnesses and the record, as a whole, in order to resolve this matter. Two witnesses, in particular, impressed me as being honest and candid in their respective testimony—Mike Herndon, the job steward, and John Hendershot, the replacement foreman. Based on their testimonies, I conclude that on May 29, Hendershot observed Doran and Angle drinking beer with their lunches; that he warned and threatened each with termination if caught doing so in the future; that Hendershot informed both Herndon and Aiton III of the events of that afternoon;[93] that on the morning of May 30, Herndon warned Doran, and perhaps Angle, about the consequences of drinking beer on the jobsite; and that when Herndon confronted Doran after the terminations, the latter did not deny the stated reason for such averring only, "it was his word against theirs." As to the record itself, two facts, regarding the events of May 30, [93] In so doing, I credit Hendershot that he did not identify the individuals to either Herndon or Aiton III.

are of utmost significance. First, by their own admissions, neither Doran nor Angle, at any time, denied that he had been drinking beer with lunch that afternoon. The General Counsel sought to minimize the adverse consequences of this fact by asserting that Doran believed that it would be useless to argue with Respondent and that Angle deemed it of little utility to contest the issue when he was so far from home. I cannot accept such explanations; rather, I believe that discharge for cause, especially for arguably spurious reasons, is—or should be—of sufficiently serious magnitude to warrant some sort of a protest—even if limited to a denial. But, assuming the uselessness of a protest to Respondent, surely, if Respondent's allegations were untrue, one would think that Doran and Angle would immediately lodge a protest with the Union, the entity most likely to be supportive. Yet, when Herndon spoke to Doran as the latter was leaving the jobsite, Doran still did not deny the allegation, choosing to plead that it was his word against Respondent's. But, of even more significance to a determination of credibility than the foregoing factor is the related fact that, contrary to Doran's assertion to Herndon, Doran and Angle were carrying with them the proof of their innocence—the cans from which they drank during lunch. This must be the case inasmuch as Angle testified that after he finished eating, he placed his empty can of Gatorade back in his lunchbox. Presumably, Doran did the same, for Angle further testified, "We never threw trash out. That was one of the things Bruce always was after us about." He continued, stating that all luncheon refuse was carried away from the jobsite by the employees in their lunchboxes as there were no trash barrels located on the jobsite. In these circumstances, it is not accurate to say that whether Doran and Angle drank beer with lunch on May 30 was a matter of their word against that of Jensen and Aiton III. Rather, when in their view, wrongly accused of such that afternoon, all that was required of either Doran or Angle was to exhibit the proof of his innocence, which, as far as can be determined from the record, was stowed in his lunchbox. Yet, neither discriminatee thought to do so. The reasons for this and the failure of both to, at least, deny the accusation of drinking beer on the jobsite were, I must conclude, that not only were both drinking beer with lunch but also that each, presumably, was carrying an empty beer can in his lunchbox on leaving the jobsite that afternoon. Based on the foregoing, and the record as a whole, I credit the testimony of Aiton III[94] as to the fact that on the afternoon of May 30, initially while standing at the base of the footing of the radial arm stacker and later as he confronted the two employees at the back of the job shack, he observed David Doran and John Angle, sitting side by side behind the job shack and each drinking beer with his lunch, and as to his subsequent movements and conversations that day.[95]

The General Counsel argues that, notwithstanding my aforementioned conclusions, Doran and Angle were terminated for having engaged in protected concerted activities as Respondent condoned the practice of drinking alcoholic beverages on the jobsite. Insofar as this argument bears on the motivation of Aiton III, on whose observation and decision the discharges were based, I find it to be without merit. Regarding the presence of a few beer cans in the employee parking area, inasmuch as the location was utilized by many different construction craft workers, employed by several jobsite subcontractors, it could hardly be said that such represents condonation by Respondent of violations of its drinking while on the jobsite prohibition. As to the conduct of James Easter in drinking vodka before work on May 13, while perhaps in contravention of the rule, as there is no evidence that Aiton III was aware or permitted this, I fail to see how this bears on the motivation of Aiton III in terminating Doran and Angle. Next, I do not credit the testimony of Mitchell Getz that he once observed Obie Bodiroga drinking "whiskey" from some sort of a container on the jobsite. Not only was his testimony as to this alleged incident contradictory and apparently based on assumptions, but also Getz' demeanor while testifying was that of one biased on behalf of the Charging Parties. He impressed me as testifying to whatever would advance the causes of the discriminatees and as willing to embellish his testimony to accomplish this goal. Perhaps the most pertinent example of this was his utterly incredible assertion that as many as a couple of cases of beer can litter could be found around the reclaim tunnels area. No other witness corroborated this, and both Doran and Angle insisted that Alford instructed the crew never to leave empty beer cans in the work area and that they complied with this.

The most troubling aspect of counsel's contention concerns the alleged granting, by Bruce Alford, of permission to the members of his crew to drink beer with lunch. I note initially that the occurrence of such rests on the less than credible testimonies of Doran, Angle, and Getz. There is not a scintilla of corroborating evidence except for the fact that Doran and Angle were observed having beer with lunch on May 29. Presumably, they would not have acted in such blatant disregard of Respondent's prohibition against such conduct unless they had previously been permitted to do so. In any event, the fact is that if such permission had been granted, such was done by a prior supervisor. Their new supervisor, John Hendershot, specifically warned them against drinking beer on the project and can, in no way, be considered to have also permitted such. This is clear from Angle's admission that he interpreted what Hendershot said as prohibiting the drinking of beer in the latter's presence. Moreover, Mike Herndon explicitly repeated [94] I do so notwithstanding the utterly conflicting testimony of Dennis Jensen, on whose testimony I do not, at all, rely. I reiterate that Jensen impressed me as being a biased witness who tailored his testimony to fit Respondent's view of the facts. I can find no explanation—or justification—for Respondent's use of him as a witness.

[95] Noting that Aiton III and other witnesses, including Herndon and Hendershot, are contradictory regarding what was said during conversations that afternoon, I do not think that such detracts from the credibility of any witness, believing that honest men may honestly differ as to their recollection of past events. Finally, as to whether Aiton III was in a position to observe Doran and Angle prior to walking down to the job shack, I note that neither Hendershot nor Mitchell Getz, who, in any event, I do not credit herein, denied that Aiton III may, at some point, have been at the footing of the radial arm stacker.

this warning certainly to Doran and perhaps to Angle the next day. Accordingly, contrary to the General Counsel, there was no practice, as of May 30, on the reclaim tunnels carpenter crew permitting the drinking of beer with lunch and, at least, Doran was well aware of this.[96] Finally, as between Hendershot and Getz, I rely on the denial, by the former, that any drinking occurred on his crew subsequent to the discharges of Doran and Angle.

I shall, therefore, recommend that the paragraphs of the consolidated amended complaint, pertaining to the discharges of Doran and Angle, be dismissed.

F. Other Alleged Violations of the Act

I have previously concluded that in order to inhibit union and other protected concerted activities at the Tonopah Mine jobsite, Respondent's management officials, often taking advantage of the Union's insecurity with regard to its collective-bargaining relationship with Respondent, engaged in blatantly coercive tactics. Thus, I have credited Mike Herndon and Cliff Kahle that on two occasions Project Manager Jim Joy "predicted" that Respondent would lose its construction contract for the project and that such would be awarded to Brown and Root, a nonunion contractor, if union member/employees caused "union problems" or otherwise engaged in protected concerted activities. The record establishes that Joy never offered Respondent's employees or the Union any supporting evidence necessary to establish that the consequences, of which he spoke, were beyond Respondent's control. Absent such, the law is clear that Joy's predictions constitute nothing more than veiled threats to close the business if employees engaged in conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act and that this conduct is violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. NLRB v. Gissel Packing Co., 395 U.S. 575, 618 (1969); George C. Shearer Exhibitors Delivery Service, 246 NLRB 416, 419 (1979); El Rancho Market, 235 NLRB 468, 472 (1978); Yellow Cab Co., 229 NLRB 643 (1977). Next, I have credited Don Jackson, as corroborated by David Doran, that Joe Lively threatened to terminate them unless they stopped complaining about his propensity to perform unit work—in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement. There is no question that both Jackson and Doran engaged in conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act and that, therefore, Lively's threat, in response to the activities, was in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Cal-Walts, Inc., supra; Rose's Stores, supra. Also, I have credited Herndon that on one occasion Joy interrogated him regarding his duties as job steward and threatened future adverse consequences because of the conduct. I agree with the contention of the General Counsel that such constitutes harassment of an employee engaged in activities protected by Section 7 of the Act and, thus, conduct violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Blount Bros. Corp., 230 NLRB 586 (1977). Further, the uncontroverted threat of Aiton III to Wendell Bridges on May 15, that those creating "union problems" from that point on would be fired, clearly constitutes a threat of termination for engaging in union activities and is violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Stewart-Warner Corp., 253 NLRB 136 (1980). Further, I believe that Easter's statement to Bridges on learning that the latter intended to take Robert Kelly to Las Vegas ("Look son. . . . You want to work on my crew . . . you stay out of other people's business.") constitutes the same type of threat of adverse consequences for engaging in protected concerted activities and is, likewise, violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Finally, Lively's interrogation of Randal Fansler as to why he spoke to Job Steward Herndon on April 24 constitutes unlawful interrogation in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Morton's IGA Foodliner, 237 NLRB 667 (1978).

[96] I give no credence to Doran's self-serving statement that had he known, he would never have violated such an express prohibition. Rather, I credit Aiton III that Doran did not believe that anyone could see him drinking beer in back of the job shack that afternoon.

Also, there is no evidence that Aiton III was aware of any beer drinking by the reclaim tunnels crew during the month of May. Thus, notwithstanding whatever Alford may have permitted, I believe Aiton III was ignorant of such.

REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. I have found that Respondent discharged employees Randal Fansler and Robert Kelly on May 6 and 14, 1980, respectively, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act and that Respondent discharged employee Wendell Bridges on May 15, 1980, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. Accordingly, I shall recommend that Respondent be ordered to offer each employee immediate and full reinstatement to his former position of employment or, if the position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to any rights and privileges to which he may be entitled. I shall further recommend that Respondent be ordered to make each employee whole for any loss of earnings he may have suffered as a result of his discharge by payment to him of the amount he normally would have earned from the date of his termination, with backpay to be computed in the manner set forth in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as described in Isis Plumbing Co., 318 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). Furthermore, it shall be recommended that Respondent be ordered to post a notice, setting forth its obligations herein.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By discharging employees Randal Fansler and Robert Kelly on May 6 and 14, 1980, respectively, based on their union and other protected concerted activities, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. By discharging employee Wendell Bridges on May 15, 1980, based on his protected concerted activities, Respondent interfered with, coerced, and restrained its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act and, thereby, engaged in unfair labor practices violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By threatening that Respondent could lose its construction contract because employees engage in union or other protected concerted activities; by threatening to terminate employees because they engage in union or other protected concerted activities; by threatening to adversely affect the job steward's ability to perform the duties and responsibilities of his position because of his activities on behalf of the Union; and by interrogating employees with regard to their union activities, Respondent interfered with, coerced, and restrained its employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act and, thereby, engaged in unfair labor practices violative of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

6. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

7. Unless specified above, Respondent engaged in no other unfair labor practices.

The W. G. Diehl Distributing Company and Teamsters Union No. 348, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America and Lynn Stovall. Cases 8–CA–17626–1 and 8–CA–18294

31 March 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 9 September 1986 Administrative Law Judge Walter J. Alprin issued the attached decision. The Respondent, the Charging Party, and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs, and the Respondent and the General Counsel filed answering briefs.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent herewith.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the complaint in Case 8–CA–17626–1 is dismissed.

[1] On 23 December 1986 the Board issued an Order granting the General Counsel's motion to sever and remand Case 8–CA–18294, which had been consolidated with the above-captioned case, to the Regional Director because the parties had arrived at a non-Board settlement in that case. Thus, this decision is limited to resolution of the issues in Case 8–CA–17626–1.

[2] The Respondent, the Charging Party, and the General Counsel have excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[3] The judge recommended dismissal of that portion of the complaint which is presently before us in Case 8–CA–17626–1. We are adopting that dismissal and, accordingly, our Order is limited to that case.

Steven D. Wilson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Harry A. Tipping, Esq. (Roderick, Myers & Linton), of Akron, Ohio, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WALTER J. ALPRIN, Administrative Law Judge. On charges filed 19 June 1984[1] by Teamsters Union 348 (the Union), and on charges filed 23 May 1985 and amended 30 July 1985 by Lynn Stovall, the General Counsel issued complaints on 30 July and 2 August 1985. A hearing on the first charges was begun at Akron, Ohio, on 17 April 1985 but was adjourned for 8 months while the parties discussed settlement of these and additional cases in litigation. The complaints were consolidated on 23 October 1985, and were heard at Akron, Ohio, from 4 through 6 December and on 13 December 1985. Briefs were thereafter filed on behalf of the General Counsel and the Respondent.

The issues are whether John Jaber and Frank Cutright were refused employment in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) and whether the employment of Lynn Stovall was terminated in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

On the entire record of the case, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The W. G. Diehl Distributing Company (Respondent) of Akron, Ohio, operates as a wholesale beer distributor. It is stipulated and I find that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act, and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Kohn Beverage Company (Kohn) was a wholesale beer distributor in Akron. It was owned and operated by members of the Kohn family, including Gary W. Diehl (Diehl), who joined the Company in 1970 and became vice president and general manager at some later date. Kohn warehousemen, driver-salesmen, and helpers had been represented by the Union since at least 1957, and there was a bargaining agreement in effect from 1 June 1980 through 31 May 1983, providing for a union shop.

Kohn's union employees engaged in what has been described as a "wildcat strike," and all unit employees who refused to report to work on 9 October 1981 were discharged on that date and subsequently replaced by new employees who were not members of the Union. Diehl advised the new employees that under the existing bargaining agreement they were required to become union members, and even physically took them to the office of the Union to see that they joined. The Union, however, for purposes not pertinent to this proceeding, refused to permit the new employees to join the Union.

Jaber and Cutright were employed by Kohn as driver-salesmen at the time of the wildcat strike, both since 1957, and both were members of the Union. At the time of the strike Cutright was on sick leave and Jaber was on vacation. Mailgrams were sent to them as to other employees, terminating their employment for failure to return to work on 9 October 1981. However, they presumably later demanded the right to return to work because their failure to report to work was due to proper absence for illness or vacation. Jaber apparently went on sick leave prior to the end of his vacation leave. Kohn permitted them to return to work after examination by a company-appointed doctor. Cutright returned to work in late October or early November 1981, and Jaber returned in March 1982. On their return they were Kohn's only union employees.

B. Failure to Rehire Jaber and Cutright

Diehl caused the incorporation of Respondent in May or June 1983 with no specific plan to engage in the wholesale distribution of beer, but in the fall of that year decided to assume Kohn's operations, which he did in February as sole owner and operator. Applications for employment were distributed to and returned by all of Kohn's employees and all were employed by Diehl for Respondent but for one Stanley Knepper, Jaber, and Cutright. Knepper had been hired by Kohn after the wildcat strike and had not been a member of the Union.

1. Diehl's union animus

a. Antiunion meetings

Although Kohn was still in operation there was an election held to decertify the Union. Knepper, then a Kohn employee not later hired by Respondent, testified that about five monthly meetings were held among Kohn employees prior to the election, with notice only by word of mouth and, "on rare occasions," by notes left on the timeclock, at which the subject matter was, without further description, "antiunion." Diehl was present at most of these meetings and the speakers were "a select group of people that were very close to Gary Diehl." Jaber and Cutright testified they were never given notice of these meetings. Knepper also testified that Kohn removed from the bulletin board a union notice of a pizza-and-beer "prounion" meeting.

Cutright testified that early one morning, about a week prior to the decertification vote, he unexpectedly walked into a meeting and heard Diehl "mention something about the Union," that when the other employees saw him there was "dead silence," and that Diehl merely said, "Remember what we talked about," and the meeting broke up. Jaber testified he arrived immediately afterwards and, in response to his question of what was going on, Cutright responded that he did not know. Knepper was at the meeting and testified that it was the "usual" statements by employees, that it was "antiunion, don't vote for the union because if you do your money is going to end up with the Mafia, and so on and so forth," and that when Cutright appeared the unidentified speaker changed the topic to "sales." Knepper also identified this as an evening, rather than a morning, meeting.

Brian Ross, at various times a warehouseman, driver-helper, and driver-salesman for Kohn, was later hired by Respondent as a warehouseman, but he was discharged about a month prior to giving testimony. He testified that at an employee meeting attended by Diehl, Dave Weaver, a driver salesman for Kohn since 1981 who was hired by Respondent to take over Cutright's route, said that it was a "bad idea to hang around with" Jaber and Cutright "and if they get their jobs back or if we go union they'd—we'd lose our jobs and the other guys would come back, things like that."[2] Ross also testified that Weaver stated Jaber and Cutright were coming back to Kohn to cause trouble "and stuff like that." Weaver testified there were no "antiunion" meetings at Kohn, but he was not questioned as to the alleged statements described by Ross. Ross also testified that Kohn's employee meetings before decertification were at first arranged by word of mouth and later by notices on the bulleting board. He also testified that Cutright walked into one such morning meeting in 1981 and that Jaber also came in, "and everything got quiet and then the meeting just came to a halt and we all went back to work." He could not recall the topic of that meeting.

Diehl specifically denied holding any antiunion meeting or barring Jaber and Cutright from any meeting. He admitted that when employees in groups asked questions he would attempt to address them.

As later discussed, there were a number of sales meetings held for driver-salesmen and driver-helpers during this period which Jaber and Cutright did not attend.

b. Exclusion from social affairs

Kohn held Christmas parties annually for its employees. Jaber and Cutright testified that prior to the wildcat strike of 1981 notices of the parties were posted on the bulletin board and they would attend, but that from then on they were not notified of and hence could not attend such parties. Knepper testified that in 1981 and 1982 notification of the parties was "verbal,"[3] but that in 1983 it was by a mailed, written invitation.

Diehl testified that starting in 1981 notices of the parties were posted on the bulletin board, and in the last year they were distributed to employees, including Jaber and Cutright, by hand. He stated that Jaber and Cutright were never excluded from the parties. James Stanford, a driver-salesman hired by Kohn after the wildcat strike and later hired by Respondent, testified that he believed notices of the 1981–1983 parties were distributed along with paychecks, and that posters and maps were displayed on the bulletin board. Gary E. Maddy, also a driver-salesman for Kohn since 1981 and then hired by Respondent, testified that invitations were by word of mouth from Diehl, and that posters and maps also were placed on the bulletin board.

c. Prejudicial assignment of vehicles

Kohn had several different types of vehicles available for assignment to driver-salesmen. Knepper testified that Kohn's general manager, and Diehl, told warehousemen to use trucks 27, 28, and 29, "obsolete" vehicles without power steering and with nonstandard storage bins, for Jaber and Cutright. He further testified that these vehicles were assigned to Jaber and Cutright regularly though other, newer and better vehicles were available. Cutright testified that from the time of his return after the wildcat strike he was never assigned one of the newer vehicles, and Jaber testified that he "mostly had the old trucks," which were harder to work with. The record does not clarify whether Jaber and Cutright were also assigned those vehicles prior to the wildcat strike.

[2] The "other guys" referred to apparently were the Kohn employees fired during the wildcat strike, who had grieved their discharges.

[3] I assume the witness meant that notification was oral, i.e., by word of mouth, rather than verbal, by means of words.

James Morrison, sales supervisor for both Kohn and Respondent, testified that vehicles were assigned to drivers on the basis of capacity, to match quantities sold by the driver-salesman, and that trucks 28 and 29 were still in use. He stated that diesel trucks were not assigned to city routes, such as Jaber's and Cutright's, because the advantage in using them was over greater distances out of town. Diehl denied that the assignments to Jaber and Cutright were "intentional," pointing out that there were six vehicles in all without power steering, and that because of an increased chance of mechanical breakdown the older vehicles were rotated among the driver-salesmen whose routes, like those of Jaber and Cutright, were closer to the warehouse.

2. Respondent's grounds for not hiring

Decisions on hiring for Respondent were made solely by Diehl, who testified that his criteria were "eagerness, competency . . . [and] aggressive salesmanship" as he observed them while the applicants had worked for Kohn.

a. Failure to attend sales meetings

Kohn had regular monthly as well as special sales meetings for driver-salesmen, which driver-helpers also sometimes attended. Attendees were not paid for attendance, and though attendance was expected it was not a requirement and no one was discharged or disciplined for failure to attend.

Cutright testified that prior to the 1981 wildcat strike notices of the meetings were always posted and he usually attended, but that after his return to work after the strike the notices were never posted and he never attended the meetings because he "knew nothing about them until after they was [sic] over."[4] Jaber also testified that prior to the wildcat strike meeting notices were posted and the general manager would ask "whether you were coming,"[5] and that he attended "some of them." After the wildcat strike the meetings continued, but Jaber did not attend because "nobody mentioned it, there was nothing put on the bulletin board."[6] Knepper, a warehouseman until shortly before his discharge, testified that he attended "a couple" of sales meetings, learning of them by word of mouth except for "very rare occasion[s]" on which a notice was posted.

Sales Manager Morrison testified that he posted notices of all sales meetings on the bulletin board. Mark Bonchu and Michael George, driver-salesmen and helper for Kohn and Respondent, testified that notices of meetings were posted, and that attendance was necessary. Michael George attended the meetings even when working as Jaber's helper, and testified that when he tried to get Jaber to also attend Jaber told him he had gone to such meetings when he was paid for attendance, and intimated he would do so again only if paid.[7]

b. Failure to participate in contests

Among the means fostered by individual brewers and conducted by Kohn as sales aids were contests awarding prizes to driver-salesmen, and sometimes to their helpers, over and above normal commissions or salary. Diehl, General Manager Granata, and driver salesmen Bonchu and Weaver testified that participation by driver-salesmen in such contests was required, but the admitted failure of Jaber[8] and of Cutright[9] to participate did not result in their censure, discipline, or discharge. Knepper specifically testified that the salesman for whom he worked as helper also failed to participate in at least one contest.

c. Poor job performance

Respondent declared that the alleged discriminatees did not properly perform their work at Kohn by failing to build "displays," which are generally attractive, customer-convenient physical placements of merchandise, at retail outlets, by "turning in stops," which are notations of failure to make service calls on the route, and by failing to make special deliveries after completing their routes when requested to do so.

Displays are built by a driver-salesman, by his sales supervisor, or by both. In some stores, particularly chain outlets, permission to build displays had to be obtained at higher management levels and was beyond the power of a driver-salesman to obtain. At other such stores bargaining agreements with employees restricted a driver-salesman from performing such work in the retail outlet. There is nothing in the record to indicate warnings to or discipline of the alleged discriminatees, other driver salesmen, or any sales supervisors for failure to build displays.

Stops are turned in by all driver-salesmen, and can be caused by any number of circumstances beyond the control of the driver-salesman, such as vehicle malfunction, excess time required by other customers, or the stop not being open when called on. The record does not disclose specific instances, the number, frequency, or reasons for stops turned in by the alleged discriminatees nor the relationship of these instances compared to other drivers.[10]

[4] Two exceptions were one meeting he was told about in advance because brewery representatives were coming and the meeting referred to earlier on which he and Jaber unexpectedly walked in.

[5] I am not certain whether Jaber here referred to being asked about attending a regular sales meeting on the premises or an off-premise party sponsored by a brewer, but the point is not determinative.

[7] George had given the same testimony at a hearing on Jaber's complaint to the Ohio Civil Rights Commission of age discrimination, discussed below.

[8] Jaber explained that his failure to participate was first the result of not being advised of the contests. There is sufficient contrary evidence to overcome the assertion, but because Jaber admits he did not participate even after learning of the contests a credibility determination is not called for.

[10] Except that former driver-salesman Knepper testified that the driver-salesman with the worst record, who was not one of the alleged discriminatees, turned in three times as many stops as anyone else.

The record also reveals no discipline of any driver-salesmen for turning in stops.

Customer complaints regarding the alleged discriminatees existed, some actual and at least one refuted by customer testimony. There are also instances of proven customer satisfaction. The record again contains no method of judging customer complaints in terms of number, frequency, or services or of comparing the records of the alleged discriminatees with those of other driver salesmen. There is no record of any discipline of driver-salesmen due to such complaints. General Manager Granata testified regarding some complaints, but added, "It's kind of hard for anybody to have a rapport with every customer."

3. Other proceedings

Though the charge on their behalf in this proceeding was filed by the Union, Cutright and Jaber themselves had filed complaints with the Ohio Civil Rights Commission on 17 February 1984[11] charging age discrimination. Both complaints state: "I believe I have been unlawfully discriminated against due to my age (57) because . . . [d]espite my years of experience, Mr. Diehl refused to hire me opting instead for younger, less experienced workers. At the present time all of the driver salesmen working for the company are in their twenties or early thirties. I believe my age was a factor in the company's refusal to hire me."

Discussion

Section 8(a)(3) of the Act proscribes "discrimination in regard to hire . . . to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization" and it is clear that any refusal to hire based on union affiliation constitutes violation of both that section and of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act as well.

The General Counsel proved that Cutright and Jaber were the only union members to be retrained by Kohn after the wildcat strike and two of the only three Kohn employees not hired by Diehl for Respondent. I consider that a prima facie case has been made by such showing alone that the failure to hire was based on union membership.

I do not credit inferences that Respondent conducted meetings which were unlawfully "antiunion" in nature. Knepper was an obviously prejudiced witness, having been, though not a union member, also not rehired by Diehl for Respondent. I do not credit his testimony that meetings were held without general notice, particularly in view of the contrary testimony by Morrison, Bonchu, and George, even though the alleged discriminatees supported Knepper's statements as to a general lack of notice of meetings. The only evidence of antiunion sentiment expressed at such meetings is Knepper's bare statement that they were antiunion. When Cutright unexpectedly walked into a meeting, all he could testify to was that Diehl "said something about the union." Particularly because this was during the period prior to the decertification election it is clear that there would be nothing per se improper in a meeting at which "something" is said about the Union.

I do not credit testimony by Cutright and Jaber that they were purposely excluded from Christmas parties as an indication of union animus. Contrary testimony was presented that notice was posted and/or written invitations extended. It is much more in the nature of the attitude, discussed below, of Cutright and Jaber not to participate in contacts with fellow empoyees, that they knew of such functions and voluntarily absented themselves.

Although I credit testimony by Cutright and Jaber that the equipment assigned for their use did not have automatic transmissions or power steering, that per se is insufficient to draw any inference of union animus. It was proven that other, similar equipment was assigned to other driver-salesmen who were not union members.

Having determined that there does, however, exist a minimal showing that the alleged discriminatees were refused employment because of their union membership, it is necessary to consider whether Respondent has demonstrated by a preponderance of the evidence that it would have failed to rehire Cutright and Jaber even had they not been union members.

I do not credit testimony of Respondent's witnesses that Cutright and Jaber did not successfully complete the work functions of overall sales, of covering their routes, of turning in excessive stops, of failing to make special deliveries, of failing to build displays or engage in contests, or of improperly servicing or improperly dissatisfying customers. The testimony presented on such points, all contested, is completely lacking in sufficient detail to consider it, if at all, as more than vague feelings or subjective attitudes, rather than as demonstrated fact.

As to the activities and attitudes of the alleged discriminatees regarding interacting with other personnel in the employer-sponsored sales meetings and activities, I fail to credit the testimony of Knepper, Cutright, or Jaber that prior notice of the meetings was withheld. Even Knepper, a witness clearly prejudiced against Respondent for not being rehired, testified that on at least "rare" occasions notice of meetings was posted. Of greater weight is the fact that the alleged discriminatees knew by long experience in the field and with the Employer that sales meetings and programs would be held. Jaber even discussed with his helper his reason for not attending meetings. The helpers attended sales meetings and were aware when and where they were to be held. Still, Cutright and Jaber, if they are to be believed, made no effort to learn of the meetings and programs or to participate in them.

In failing to credit the testimony on these points of the alleged discriminatees, I must credit Diehl's uncontradicted testimony that he made his hiring decisions on the basis of eagerness and aggressive salesmanship in addition to competency, and that he did not hire the alleged discriminatees because of a perceived lack of eagerness and aggressiveness, and not because they were members of the Charging Party Union.[12]

C. Stovall's Discharge

Stovall was employed by Kohn as a sales supervisor, and was not a member of the bargaining unit represented by the Union. He was hired by Respondent in the same position, but after later being placed on probation for 60 days, about May 1984, was moved to the position of warehouseman and, at times, driver-helper.

On 11 April 1985 Diehl gave Stovall a "warning letter" referring to three alleged instances of negligent damage occurring on 18 February and 3 and 8 April 1985. The letter concluded with the following:

> These incidents of repeated negligence resulting in damage to company property will not be tolerated. You are hereby warned that any further occurances [sic] of negligence and disregard of company property will not be tolerated and will result in your termination of employment with this company.

Stovall testified that while working in the warehouse he became aware of the lack of power Respondent's employees had in dealing with management. He discussed common work problems with fellow employees Brinley, Ross, Sigman, and others. With their approval he went to the offices of the Union to inquire about getting their representation and was given authorization cards which, however, he had not attempted to distribute. There was an elected "committee" of employees, one function of which was to help employees take care of grievances, but Stovall did not approach them. In addition to having the committee, Diehl also conducted "issue meetings" on request, during which employees could raise work complaints either directly or, if they preferred anonymity, by putting a note into a hat that was passed around. Stovall suggested to fellow employees that they raise their complaints in an "issue" meeting, and they agreed.

There was a sales meeting scheduled for 6 May 1985 and Stovall decided to ask at that time for an issue meeting. He decided to make the request at that meeting because, first, he wanted the assembled employees to know that an issue meeting was to be held at a specific time and place, and, second, because he was afraid that Diehl would refuse to hold a meeting if asked privately. Precisely what happened at that meeting is the subject of some dispute.

The meeting was scheduled by Sales Manager Morrison for 7 a.m., though due to tardiness it did not begin until about 7:10 a.m. The regular workday began at 7:30 a.m., and employees were not paid for attending sales meetings. Morrison described this meeting as one of the two most important of the year as it began the summer sales season. Morrison's highlight of the meeting was a promotion for Stroh's beer.

Stovall testified that about 7:30 a.m., Morrison was "summing up" and called for questions. Stovall determined that there were no questions, and then raised his hand. When Morrison acknowledged him, Stovall rose and said to Morrison, "We have some issues that we would like to talk about." Morrison responded that the meeting was for sales, not for issues, and Diehl stated that he would get together with Stovall and the three committee members. Morrison then "spoke a little bit more," and, thinking the meeting was over, Stovall raised his hand and was recognized by Morrison a second time. Without rising, Stovall queried when the issue meeting would be held, to which Diehl responded that he would "get in touch with" him. Stovall did not raise his voice during either period, and the meeting concluded about 7:40 a.m.

Morrison's testimony was that Stovall's first statement came early in the meeting when he had covered the aspects of pricing, job duties, and displays of Stroh's and was looking for questions as to those topics before going on to other brands. Stovall stated that "he had some issues to discuss" and Morrison responded that this was a sales meeting and that "[i]f you have any questions or grievances, I'm sure that Mr. Diehl will be more than glad to meet with you after the meeting or at a later date, as soon as possible." Stovall kept going on about having issues to discuss and wanting "to discuss them now" and refused to sit down though Morrison again assured him that Diehl would meet with him later. Stovall repeated his message two or three times, and then "finally did sit down." Morrison attempted to continue the meeting, but first again asked for questions on Stroh's products. Stovall again rose, turned to face Diehl, and said, "Mr. Diehl, we have to talk about these issues now. I want a date now when we can meet, and all you're doing is putting this off." Morrison again asked him to sit down, and Diehl said to him, "Lynn, I'll be glad to meet with you after the meeting or later in the day after the job is done and discuss any problems you have." Stovall remained standing and in a loud voice stated, "I want to discuss them now." Feeling that the meeting was entirely disrupted Morrison decided to adjourn and to speak to the driver-salesmen individually.

Diehl's testimony regarding the meeting was that as Morrison was into his presentation Stovall raised his hand and, when recognized by Morrison, said while seated, "I have some issues I would like to address." Morrison told him it was a sales meeting, "And if you have any issues you should get with Mr. Diehl, and he'll talk and discuss those with you at that time." The meeting continued for 5 minutes, when Stovall "jumped up [and] . . . said 'I want a date and time, right now, to discuss these issues.'" Diehl told him that he "would get with the committee, and we will set up a date and time, and we will do that. But this is a sales meeting and it's for sales matters." Stovall, however, remained standing, though Morrison attempted to continue his presentation. Finally, Morrison adjourned the meeting.

Other of Respondent's employees at the meeting also testified. Yakovazzi testified that Stovall asked, near the end of the meeting when the floor was open to questions, "if he could address some issues at this time"; that on being told by Morrison that the meeting was only for sales Stovall sat down, but after a short time, when the meeting was nearly over, he raised his hand again and when recognized asked "if a date could be given as far as scheduling a meeting where the issues could be addressed"; and that Stovall did not raise his voice during the meeting, but Yakovazzi's attention was diverted from the sales aspect of the meeting. Weaver testified that it was a motivational sales meeting, "And Lynn stood up I think, I don't know, approximately three times, you know, and interrupted the meeting to bring a point across to Gary about something. I don't really know what he was talking about." Weaver did not recall Morrison speaking to him later about the Stroh's promotion. The interruption of the meeting was, in Weaver's opinion, disruptive. Stanford testified that during the sales presentation the floor was opened to questions, "And Lynn stood up and said he had a couple of things he wanted to settle and he wanted to get them off his chest. And it was told that it was not the time, that it was a sales meeting . . . and that it would be handled at a later date, to get with someone and they'd set up some kind of meeting." They attempted to get back into the sales meeting, "And Lynn stood up and said he wanted it settled now and a time set now for the hearing." They attempted again to get back to sales, "and Lynn stood up for the third time and, you know, said that he wanted this settled or a time that it would be settled." Stovall's voice at these time was firm but not really loud. Gary Maddy testified that Stovall "stood up, like, two or three times and [Morrison] kept telling him [Stovall], you know we'd do it [have an issues meeting] at a later date." Maddy had no idea what Stovall was talking about, and Diehl also did not know. Mark Bonchu testified that during the meeting Stovall "raised his hand and stood up and told Gary that he wanted—that a meeting should be called to discuss the issues"; that Diehl responded "he would set something up and that it would be up to the committee to set up a date that they would try to work something out"; that Stovall remained standing for a while, and then said that he wanted a definite date right then as to a meeting and "he was, you know, persistent about getting a date and it sort of went back and forth a little bit, as far as I recall." Bonchu considered that the meeting had been disrupted.

[12] Allegations by Jaber and Cutright to the Ohio Civil Rights Commission that their not being hired was due to age are not considered relevant, as claimants are free to make alternative and even conflicting claims in different forums.

After the meeting was concluded Stovall returned to the warehouse to load the truck to which he was assigned. Diehl approached him there, and precisely what happened is also subject to some dispute. Stovall testified that Diehl asked if he had a problem, and he responded that he had issues, not a problem; that Diehl insisted, "getting louder and louder," that Stovall had a problem; and that Diehl finally stepped back "and yelled at me to get back to work in a very loud voice." Diehl testified that he merely said to Stovall, "Lynn, what is your urgent problem here?" and that Stovall replied, "I don't have a problem. You have a problem. . . . I don't have a problem. I have issues. You have a problem." Diehl then told Stovall to "just go about your job" and went into his office. Yakovazzi testified that he saw Stovall working and Diehl following him, that their attitudes appeared confrontational, and that though he could not hear what was said both appeared to be speaking excitedly and loudly.

At the end of the workday the members of the employee committee, and Stovall, were called into Diehl's office. With no objection from the committee, Stovall was given the following dismissal letter:

> Your continued disruption of the scheduled sales meeting held on 5-6-85 was inappropriate, uncalled for and inexcusable.
> That meeting was a scheduled sales meeting for sales matters. You were told by Jim Morrison that another meeting would be arranged to discuss any other matters. You again interrupted the meeting and thus caused considerable attention to be taken away from important sales presentations.
> This type of behavior and disregard for company scheduled meetings will not be tolerated. As a result of these actions and those which occurred within the previous months, you are terminated, effective immediately, as an employee with this company.

Stovall filed his charge with this Board on 23 May 1985. On 6 June 1985 he also filed a complaint with the Ohio Civil Rights Commission stating that he believed the reason given for his discharge to be pretextual and retaliatory for his having testified in March 1985 in Jaber's complaint to that Commission. Stovall's complaint to that Commission was found to be without merit.

Discussion

The General Counsel alleges that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Stovall for engaging in a concerted and protected activity. Respondent denies the allegation, and argues that the activity was not concerted and was not protected under the Act. It is undenied that Stovall was discharged, and that the cause of discharge, together with allegations of prior negligence, was Stovall's actions at the meeting of 6 May 1985.

Both parties recognize that the issue of concert is governed by the relatively recent decision in Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984), remanded sub nom. Prill v. NLRB, 755 F.2d 941 (D.C. Cir. 1985), which overruled the prior Board policy as enunciated in Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975), and its "progeny." Although the prior policy was issue oriented, determining whether an issue addressed by a single employee "ought" to have been of concerted interest to a number of employees, the current policy is factually oriented and considers whether other employees had indeed expressed their concerted interest to the single employee who took the action. As expressed in Meyers, supra at 497, we must determine whether an objective review shows the conduct of the single employee to actually have been "engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by or on behalf of the employee himself."

Whether Diehl or other individuals were aware of it, it is uncontroverted that Stovall discussed both union affiliation and complaints regarding the conditions of employment with several other employees, and obtained their agreement to raising these complaints at an issues meeting. Both management, represented by Diehl and others, and the employees recognized that issues meetings related to labor disputes involving a number of employees, and not the complaints of a single employee. I find that though Diehl may not have known the specific issues which were to have been raised, as in fact we do not know from the record the exact nature of those issues, he recognized the call for an issues meeting as a demand to consider concerted complaints. In addition, Stovall made the demand before an assemblage of employees so that all would be advised of the time and place of such meeting. As stated by the appellate court, "The activity of a single employee in enlisting the support of his fellow employees for their mutual aid and protection is as much 'concerted activity' as is ordinary group activity."[13]

To satisfy the test set out in Meyers, supra at 479, it must also be shown that the concerted activity was also protected under the Act. Although we are not aware of the precise complaints sought to be raised at the issues meetings, it is clear that they arose from the concerted discussions of Stovall with the others regarding terms and conditions of employment, and hence fall within the purview of the Act. It can also be argued that the appeal to fellow workers to meet for support, mutual aid, and protection, as enunciated in Owens-Corning, in addition to being concerted must have related to such matters of mutual employment as to be protected by Section 7 of the Act.

Respondent argues that the manner in which Stovall conducted himself at the sales meeting stripped his actions from the protection of the Act in that he used intemperate language, disturbed the efficient operation of Respondent's business, and was insubordinate. The Board has certainly held that conduct or language can be so offensive, defamatory, or opprobrious as to forfeit the protection of law. However, I find no such language or action present in the record. Indeed, Stovall's language was sufficiently temperate to be repeated in any Sunday school without alarm, a distinct difference from the language ordinarily heard during labor disputes.

The manner of Stovall's actions also bespeaks a calm reasonableness. I credit his testimony, supported by the testimony of current employees of Respondent, that he sought and received recognition, without interrupting others, before he spoke out, and that while his voice was "firm" it was not overly loud nor his manner overly argumentative. Although the later meeting between Diehl and Stovall was described as confrontational, with loud and excited voices, it was Diehl who followed Stovall to the latter's workplace and initiated the exchange, and not Stovall leaving his work to confront Diehl.

There remains the question of whether Stovall's choice of time and place in making the demand for an issues meeting forfeited the protection afforded such action by the Act. The sales meeting at which the demand was made was planned for and conducted during a period prior to the start of the workday. Although the unpaid attendance at such meetings was expected by management, there is nothing in the record to indicate that failure to attend ever resulted in discipline. On the other hand, sales meetings were normal in Respondent's business, and current employees testified that Stovall's interruption of the sales theme for a nonsales function interfered with the purpose of the meeting. It is clear, though, that absent egregious harm to the employer's business operations or damage to its premises, which I find not to have here occurred, the time, place, and even the manner of conducting concerted and protected activities will not alienate the employees from the protection of law. As the scholarly decision of Administrative Law Judge Brandon in the matter of Johnnie Johnson Tire Co., 271 NLRB 293, 294–295 (1984), phrased it:[14]

> It has long been recognized that employees have a legitimate interest under the Act in acting concertedly in making known their views to management without being discharged for that interest. . . . Even the reasonableness of the method of protest adopted does not decide the protected nature of the concerted activity. . . . Accordingly, concerted activity by nonrepresented employees to protest their working conditions is normally held to be protected regardless of the time of day it occurs or the impact of such activity on production.

I find that Stovall's statements and actions during the sales meeting, although interrupting the planned purpose of the meeting, were orderly, not overly damaging to Respondent's business or premises, and did not result in the loss of the Act's protection. They did, however, pinpoint Stovall as a speaker for concerted and protected activities, and motivated his discharge, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. By discharging Lynn Stovall, an individual, because of his engaging in concerted activity protected under the Act, Respondent engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Sections 8(a)(1) and 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

Respondent having unlawfully discharged Lynn Stovall, I find it necessary to order it to offer him immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if such job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority and other rights and privileges, and to make him whole for any loss of earnings that he may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against him by payment to him of a sum of money equal to that which he normally would have earned from the date of his discharge to the date of a bona fide offer of reinstatement, less net interim earnings during such period. Backpay shall be computed on a quarterly basis as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest to be computed in accordance with Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[18] Moreover, consistent with the Board's decision in Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982), I shall recommend that Respondent be required to remove from its records any references to the unlawful discharge of Lynn Stovall, provide written notice to him of such action, and inform him that Respondent's unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for future disciplinary action against him.

The General Counsel has requested a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board to engage in discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Because establishment of the rate of pay to which the discriminatee would have been entitled at various times from 6 May 1985 until compliance is finally achieved may be difficult without Respondent's cooperation, I grant the request.

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 21 October 1986 Administrative Law Judge Raymond P. Green issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief. The Respondent Union filed a letter opposing the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, brief, and letter and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RAYMOND P. GREEN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard by me in Albany, New York, on 3, 4, and 9 June 1986. The initial charge in this proceeding was filed by Richard Lindheimer against the Union on 3 February 1986. The charge alleged that since 1 December 1985 the Union has unlawfully altered his seniority date and has improperly refused to process a grievance over this change. Lindheimer amended this charge on 10 March 1980 and the Regional Director issued a complaint against the Union on 11 March 1986.

On 6 March 1980 the Union, no doubt being advised that a complaint was going to be issued against it, filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Employer in Case 3–CA–13133. This charge alleges that the Employer discriminated against Lindheimer by changing his seniority date. At the same time, the Union averred that it nevertheless believed that the change in Lindheimer's seniority date was proper. In effect, the Union's intention in filing this charge was to assert (rather cleverly I must say), that if it is held to have violated the law because of the alleged change in Lindheimer's seniority, then the Employer should also be held liable because the Employer and the Union agreed to the change.

As a result of the charge in Case 3–CA–13133 the Regional Director issued, on 27 March 1986, an order consolidating cases, and an amended consolidated complaint against both the Union and the Employer. This amended consolidated complaint alleges:

(1) The Employer and the Union for many years have maintained a series of collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which runs from 1 November 1984 to 31 October 1987.

(2) In July 1985 the Employer and the Union made an oral agreement whereby Lindheimer (who had previously left the bargaining unit to work as a supervisor) would be allowed to return to a bargaining unit job with a 1961 seniority date, and/or with protection against any possible future layoffs.

(3) In reliance on the oral agreement, Lindheimer returned to the bargaining unit in August 1986 as a working foreman.

(4) In December 1985 the Union by its secretary-treasurer, Leo Lester, reneged on the oral agreement described in paragraph 2 by insisting that Lindheimer's seniority date be 26 August 1985 (i.e., when he returned to the bargaining unit).

(5) As a result, the Company on 11 December 1985 changed Lindheimer's seniority date to 26 August 1985.

(6) In January 1986 the Union caused the layoff of Lindheimer by insisting that his seniority date was August 1985 and by insisting that he should therefore be laid off before employees hired before August 1985.

(7) In February 1986 the Company acceded to the Union's demands and laid off Lindheimer.

(8) In December 1985 and February 1986 the Union refused to process Lindheimer's grievances relating to the change in his seniority date and his layoff in February 1986.

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

I. JURISDICTION

It is agreed and I find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

It also is agreed and I find that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[1]

II. OPERATIVE FACTS

Lindheimer initially began working at the Company about 1958 or 1959. He then left for a short time to work with his brother and returned in 1960. Thereafter, he continued to work continuously in jobs covered by the collective-bargaining agreement until July 1984 when he was asked to become the head of the maintenance department, a supervisory position. At the time, Lindheimer spoke to Bob Herman, another supervisor, who told him that if he did not like the new job, he could always return to the bargaining unit within 2 years. Nothing was said, however, about retaining or losing seniority on such a return. After his discussion with Herman, Lindheimer decided to accept the promotion and he began working as a supervisor. Simultaneously, he obtained a withdrawal card from the Union.

For one reason or another, Lindheimer found that he did not like his new job and about June 1985 he asked the Company's director of operations, Walter Munroe, if he could return to the bargaining unit. Munroe, who had himself just recently arrived at the Albany facility, replied that he would check with his superiors and get back to Lindheimer. When Munroe did check, his superiors told him to do what he thought best. The next week Munroe told Lindheimer that he could go back to a unit job, whereupon Lindheimer expressed some concern that if he went back into the bargaining unit, his seniority might begin again at zero. Munroe states that he then contacted Morse who worked in the personnel department (in Syracuse) because he did not know what Lindheimer's seniority should be if he returned to the bargaining unit.[2] Morse told him that she would get back to him, but apparently did not. Because Munroe was not certain about the interpretation of the contract in connection with Lindheimer's seniority question and because he was desirous of protecting Lindheimer from any possible seasonal layoff, Munroe arranged for a meeting with the Union in July 1985.

Before discussing the meeting of July, I note the following relevant provisions of the collective-bargaining agreement:

(1) Article XI—Seniority

> The principle of seniority shall prevail at all times except as otherwise specified herein. After working 30 days a new employee shall be placed on the appropriate seniority list as of his first day of employment. When it becomes necessary to reduce the working force, the last man hired shall be laid off first, and when the force is again increased, the men are to be returned to work in the reverse order in which they are laid off. Seniority shall be broken only by discharge, voluntary quit, or more than a two year layoff.

(2) At Article VII, the last paragraph states:

> The Company has discretion to select employees for the position of working foreman. A working foreman will be paid $.40 more per hour than the rate of his classification.

(3) Article XX Leave of Absence states:

> If the Company grants a leave of absence not to exceed six months, to any employee, the Company, on request of the employee, will furnish such employee in writing confirmation of such leave of absence. The employee assumes the responsibility of requesting such confirmation of leave in writing and filing same with the Union. The Union shall not be required to recognize such leave of absence unless the employee shall file such written confirmation thereof, with the Union within one week from the date the same is granted.
> Any employee absent without leave for any reason other than for sickness, or other legitimate or excusable reason, or any employee absent beyond the period of approved leave of absence, shall be considered as having left the employ of the Employer.
> The Company and the Union must jointly agree upon all leaves of absence prior to being granted. Prior to leaving, the employee must deposit with the Company monies to cover his pension contributions for the period of the leave of absence.[3]

In early July 1985 a meeting was held to discuss the return of Lindheimer to the bargaining unit. In addition to Lindheimer's presence, the Company was represented by Walter Munroe and Bob Herman and the Union was represented by Leo Lester and Irv Wood, its president.[4] It was at this meeting, according to the General Counsel, that the Union and the Company made an agreement whereby, (1) Lindheimer would go back into the bargaining unit as a working foreman, (2) he would have a seniority date of 1961 (i.e., his date of hire minus the 13 months that he was a supervisor), and (3) he would be protected from layoff in the event of possible future layoffs. In reviewing this record, and considering all the evidence in conjunction with the demeanor of the witnesses, I am convinced, contrary to the General Counsel, that no such agreement was made. Rather, what I think transpired is set forth below.

There is no doubt that the Company and the Union recognized that Lindheimer was an extremely valuable employee who, because of his ability to fix and maintain a wide variety of machinery, had almost a unique value to the Company. As such, the Company was anxious not only to accommodate the wishes of a long-term and loyal employee, but also was desirous of protecting him

[1] The contract in this case was jointly negotiated by several Teamsters Union locals with respect to several plants located in different cities. The particular contract with Local 669 covers Coca-Cola employees in Albany and in Glen Falls, New York.

[2] According to Munroe, when he arrived at the Albany plant he received his training relative to the collective-bargaining agreement by being given the union contract and told to read it.

[3] There is also at art. XXI a grievance-arbitration clause.

from the possibility of being laid off if future layoffs occurred. I also believe that the Union acknowledged Lindheimer's skills and was likewise desirous of accommodating him to the extent possible within the limits of the collective-bargaining agreement.

I conclude that at the July meeting the Company by Munroe expressed the desire to protect Lindheimer from layoffs because Munroe feared that the seniority clause might very well be interpreted as requiring Lindheimer to start at zero seniority on his return to the bargaining unit. I also conclude that Lester, although indicating his view that Lindheimer would lose his prior seniority, expressed the opinion that Lindheimer might be afforded some protection if the Company made him a working foreman. In this regard, I think that Lester had in mind the idea that if Lindheimer was designated as a working foreman, other employees who were hired before his return to the unit might not attempt to bump him in the event that regular employees were laid off.[5] The evidence shows that Lester said at this meeting that the Company could make Lindheimer a working foreman so as to afford him some protection, but that if other employees were laid off and if they filed grievances alleging that they had greater seniority than Lindheimer, Lester would have to take such grievances to the Union's executive board for consideration. In effect, therefore, I conclude that Lester merely suggested that a possible way to protect Lindheimer from layoff was for the Company to make him a working foreman. I do not believe that he agreed Lindheimer could have a 1960 or 1961 seniority date or that the Union would consent to guarantee Lindheimer absolute protection from layoff. Rather, I think that Lester essentially hoped that a layoff-seniority problem would simply not arise either because (a) no regular employees would be laid off in 1985–1986, or (b) if regular employees were laid off, they would not think to file grievances because of Lindheimer's working foreman's position and/or his unique skills. It is clear to me that Lester expressly reserved the right to process grievances in the event that future layoffs occurred and if other employees did assert they had greater contractual seniority than Lindheimer.

After Lindheimer returned to the bargaining unit in early August, the Company and the Union had a meeting in August to discuss the updating of the seniority list. When the Company proposed that Lindheimer should be assigned a seniority date of 1961, Lester objected and stated that Lindheimer's seniority date should be the date that he returned to the bargaining unit in August 1985.

Lindheimer's wife also works at the Albany plant. She is, as far as I can see, an intelligent and determined woman who is not afraid to assert her "rights." In 1984 she was fired when she became involved in a personality conflict with the plant manager. At that time, Lester processed a grievance on her behalf and succeeded in convincing the Company, without going to arbitration, that Lindheimer should be reinstated with backpay.

During the summer of 1985, Lindheimer's son had a summer job with the Company. After he was laid off in September, the Company needed a replacement and called the Union to send a man, which it did. When Mrs. Lindheimer discovered this, she called Lester and accused him of sending up a crony instead of having her son recalled for a week so that he would be eligible for unemployment benefits. Lester hung up on her, and after she called back and spoke to Wood, Lester went up to the Company, spoke to Robert Herman, and arranged for Mrs. Lindheimer's son to be recalled for a week.

On 18 November 1985 the Union held a nomination meeting for the purpose of selecting candidates for office. The incumbent officers, Leo Lester and Irv Wood were nominated for another term. Also nominated was Tony Jesmaine for secretary-treasurer. Right after the nominations, Lester and Wood held a party at a nearby restaurant where the local's members were invited. According to Mrs. Lindheimer, while at the party she told Lester that although she was supporting Irv Wood for reelection, she had not made up her mind between Lester and Jesmaine. She contends that Lester thereupon angrily told her to leave his party. This is denied by Lester.

Regarding the relationship between Mrs. Lindheimer and Lester, Munroe recalled one occasion, sometime in July 1985, when Lester referred to Mrs. Lindheimer as "that bitch." Munroe, who overheard this remark, could not relate the context that this remark was made. Also, Ken Richardson (the Company's production manager), recalled that on one occasion he overheard Lester remark that if it was not for his wife, Lindheimer would not have these problems.

At a meeting on 9 December 1985, the Company and the Union discussed a new proposed seniority list. When Lindheimer's name came up, Richardson agreed with the Union's position that having left the bargaining unit in 1984, Lindheimer had lost his seniority status under the terms of the contract. Further, he agreed that as neither shop stewards nor working foremen had contractual superseniority, Lindheimer's seniority began when he returned to the unit in August 1985. Thereafter on 11 December, a seniority list was posted and on 12 December Lindheimer presented a grievance to Leo Lester at the Union's office. This grievance read:

> Loss of 25 years seniority. I grieve that employer lists starting date as of 8/26/85 when starting time was in fact 6/29/60.

Present at the meeting on 12 December were Leo Lester, the Lindheimers, and their friend Pat Franklin who also was a shop steward. The Lindheimers argued that there had been an agreement back in August between the Company and the Union whereby Lindheimer retained most of his seniority. Pat Franklin took up Lindheimer's case and said that if there had been an agreement, then the Union should live up to it. Lester denied, however, that he had ever made such an agreement and said that the contract was controlling. He said that he neither could nor would alter the contract for Lindheimer's benefit or for the benefit of any other person.

[5] During the summer the Company hires college students who are laid off before regular employees are laid off. In some years no regular employees are laid off at all, while in other years some are. In July 1985 there was no way for anyone to predict to what extent, if any, there would be layoffs of regular employees in the autumn or winter.

These positions by the respective parties were repeated over and over again with greater and greater heat.

On 12 December Mrs. Lindheimer wrote a letter to Jesmaine expressing her support for his candidacy. For the most part she set forth the situation regarding Lindheimer's seniority status from the Lindheimer point of view. She also expressed the opinion that Lester was not to be trusted because he had reneged on the alleged agreement to allow Lindheimer to return to the bargaining unit while retaining most of his previous seniority. She gave permission for the letter to circulate as part of Jesmaine's election campaign. Despite its publication it did not harm Lester who won on 18 December.

In late December 1985 or early January 1986, a number of bargaining unit employees were temporarily laid off. Thereafter, in January some grievances were filed alleging that employees with greater seniority than Lindheimer had been laid off while he remained at work. These grievances were responded to by Herman, after consulting Munroe (Munroe was ill). The responses to the grievances of Conradt and Robbins were (1) the Union and the Company had agreed to give Lindheimer a seniority date of August 1961, and (2) they also agreed that Lindheimer would be classified as a working foreman. It should be noted that these letters of Herman were written despite the fact that he was aware that the Company's position as expressed by his superior, Richardson, in December 1985 was that Lindheimer's seniority date was August 1985 and that Lindheimer did not have any type of superseniority. As stated by Herman, he and Munroe drafted these replies because they disagreed with the Company's position. I also note that the response to Robbin's grievance was never sent to the Union because it was intercepted by Richardson who countermanded it.

A meeting was held between the Union and the Company on 28 January 1986. The spokesman for the Company was Richardson and the spokesman for the Union was Lester. The purpose of the meeting was to discuss the various pending seniority grievances. At this meeting Lindheimer was told by Richardson that the Company agreed with the Union's position. Lindheimer was also told that he was going to be laid off commencing on the first week of February.

On 30 January 1986 and 3 February 1986 Lindheimer filed three related grievances concerning his seniority status and his "layoff." These grievances were denied by the Company both orally and in writing.

I should note that in actuality Lindheimer was never really laid off because he used some of his accumulated vacation time for the period that he was scheduled for layoff. Also the Company, without objection from the Union, gave work to Lindheimer during his "layoff" period as a subcontractor because his skills were needed. Lindheimer returned to work on 1 March 1986 and has worked continuously since that date.

III. DISCUSSION

The General Counsel's theory in this case is based on a number of factual premises which, in my opinion, cannot be sustained. As I understand his theory, it is based on the hypothesis that (1) an agreement was made in July and/or August 1985 whereby the Company and the Union agreed to allow Lindheimer to return to a bargaining unit job with the retention of almost all the seniority that he had earned prior to his promotion to management and/or with a guarantee of job protection as a working foreman; (2) the Union reneged on this alleged agreement thereby ultimately causing Lindheimer's layoff in February 1986; and (3) the Union's reneging on the agreement was motivated by Lester's retaliation against Mrs. Lindheimer's support of his rival for union office.

As to motivation, the evidence may show a degree of hostility between Mrs. Lindheimer and Lester, two strong-willed individuals. But the facts show that whatever differences they may have had, Lester has assisted either her (when she was fired in 1984), or her son, when he was laid off in September 1985. The evidence simply cannot support the claim that Lester "reneged" on an alleged agreement in July 1985 concerning Lindheimer's seniority status because of his wife's intraunion activities, because it is clear that such a "reneging," if it occurred at all, occurred before his wife expressed her support for the rival candidate, Jesmaine.

Further, it is my opinion that Lester never entered into an agreement whereby Lindheimer would, on his return to the bargaining unit, retain his old seniority status minus the 13 months that he spent in management. Nor do I find that Lester agreed to any kind of arrangement guaranteeing Lindheimer job protection in the event that layoffs occurred in the future. Rather, I conclude that the credible evidence establishes that Lester, at the July 1985 meeting, merely suggested that if the Company, as was its contractual right, designated Lindheimer as a working foreman, this might give him some degree of protection because of his special skills. Thus, at most, it is my opinion that Lester made this suggestion because he hoped that layoffs of regular employees would not occur and that if they did, other employees might be dissuaded from filing grievances because of Lindheimer's "special skills." In this regard, it seems to me that Lester basically was hoping that the problem would simply not come up. Moreover, despite making the working foreman suggestion, Lester protected his flanks by explicitly reserving the right to take to his executive board any grievances which might arise in the event layoffs did occur and if employees did claim greater seniority than Lindheimer.

The evidence further establishes to my satisfaction that at the August 1985 meeting Lester specifically took the position that Lindheimer's seniority status began on the date that he returned to the bargaining unit. This position was ultimately agreed to by the Company's representative, Richardson, on 9 December 1985 when the Union and the Company were in the process of drawing up a new seniority list.

Having found that there never was any agreement as alleged by the General Counsel and having found an absence of unlawful motivation in connection with the Union's alleged "reneging," I must conclude that the allegations of the complaint have no merit. In my opinion the existing labor agreement is ambiguous concerning what should happen to a person's seniority when he or she is promoted to management and thereafter returns to the bargaining unit. As such, it seems to me that the Union's interpretation of the contract (to the effect that such a person starts over again with zero seniority) is not unreasonable. It is, at the very least, a contractual interpretation which it could legitimately argue before an arbitrator.

As the question of Lindheimer's seniority status is to my mind one which solely concerns the interpretation of the existing contract, it properly was decided during the grievance meetings established by the contract's grievance procedure. As I am convinced that neither the Union nor the Company engaged in any acts motivated by the Lindheimers' protected concerted activity and as I am equally convinced that the Union's actions were not arbitrarily, capriciously or invidiously motivated, it is concluded that the allegations of the amended consolidated complaint should be dismissed.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Upstate Coca Cola, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Bakery, Laundry, Beverage Drivers and Vending Machine Servicemen and Allied Workers of Albany and Vicinity, Local No. 669, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Neither the Union nor the Company has violated the Act in any manner as alleged in the amended consolidated complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[6]

ORDER

It is recommended that the complaint be dismissed in its entirety.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 21 October 1986 Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro issued the attached supplemental decision. The Respondent filed an exception and a supporting brief and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

The Respondent contends that it is obligated to make contributions to the Union Trust for employees only when they become eligible to receive benefits from the Trust, rather than from the beginning of their employment. Its contention is based on its interpretation of the phrase "eligible for benefits" in the following pertinent contract provision:

> The employer agrees to pay the Hotel, Restaurant and Beverage Employees Trust or its successor the sum of fifty (.50) cents per compensible [sic] hour for employees covered by this Agreement and eligible for benefits hereunder exceptions therefore [sic] all supervisory employees, (part-time being defined as either less than 30 hours per week of 60 hours per month, the Employer agrees, however not to replace any full-time employee with such part-time employees.)

The judge found that pursuant to the language of an addendum to the contract—"The Employer shall pay the [Trust] . . . for each employee covered by the terms of the labor agreement"—the Respondent agreed to contribute to the Trust on behalf of all the employees covered by the contract without regard to their eligibility to receive benefits from the Trust. He concluded that the addendum was intended to supersede the contract provision, the parties recognizing that the contract phrase, "eligible for benefits," was incompatible with the parties' intent to provide trust fund benefits. This incompatibility existed because the Trust would not pay benefits to any employee for whom 1000 hours of employer-paid fund contributions had not been made, and under the Respondent's reading of the contract provision (a reading which the judge appeared to accept, at least for the sake of argument), the Respondent would never make contributions on behalf of an employee who was not already eligible for benefits. Hence, virtually no employees would ever qualify for benefits.

In its sole exception, the Respondent argues that the judge's finding—that the Respondent's interpretation of the contract language "eligible for benefits" would result in an "impossible situation" because most employees would not receive benefits—requires application of the contract law doctrine of mutual mistake. For the reasons stated by the judge and for the following reason, we find no merit to the Respondent's claim. The judge found the language of the provision and of the addendum to be incompatible, the latter being clear and unambiguous and the former leading to an untenable result in this situation. However, there is another reasonable interpretation of the phrase "eligible for benefits" that is consonant with the language of the addendum: that it refers to that kind of employee who will, at the appropriate time, become eligible to receive benefits from the Trust, as opposed to certain ineligible part-time employees, apprentices or supervisors, who will never become eligible to receive benefits. Under either view of the meaning of the phrase, the contract, read as a whole, requires Trust contributions for all employees otherwise covered by the terms of the contract, except those specifically excluded.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Coos-Bend, Incorporated, d/b/a The Sawmill Restaurant and Lounge, North Bend, Oregon, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Gail M. Streicker, for the General Counsel.
Patrick M. Kilby, for the Respondent.
Darrell L. Cornelius, for the Union.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

JERROLD H. SHAPIRO, Administrative Law Judge. On 5 November 1985 the National Labor Relations Board (Board) issued an unpublished Order in this proceeding adopting the findings and conclusions of its administrative law judge contained in his decision issued 4 October 1985 in which the judge concluded that Respondent Coos-Bend, Incorporated, d/b/a The Sawmill Restaurant & Lounge (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) by, among other things, failing and refusing to execute a written collective-bargaining contract containing terms which had been verbally agreed to by Respondent and Culinary, Bartenders, Hotel & Motel Union Local 828 (Union). On 5 March 1986 the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit issued an unpublished judgment enforcing the Board's Order.[1]

The Board's Order, as enforced by the court, remedied Respondent's unlawful refusal to execute the collective-bargaining contract it had reached with the Union by, among other things, requiring Respondent to make the contractually required payments to the Hotel, Restaurant & Beverage Employees Trust (Trust) on behalf of the union-represented employees. A dispute having arisen over the amount of contributions owed by Respondent to the Trust under the Board's Order, the Regional Director for Region 19 of the Board, on 21 May 1986, issued a backpay specification, which was amended at the hearing, alleging the amount of Trust contributions due under the Board's Order. On 5 June 1986 Respondent filed its answer to the backpay specification, and on 2 July 1986 filed a supplemental answer. The issues presented by the pleadings are twofold: (1) whether Respondent's contract with the Union obligates Respondent to make contributions to the Trust on behalf of all employees covered by the contract, except apprentices and part-time employees, from the moment of their employment, as contended by the General Counsel and Union or, as contended by Respondent, whether the contract obligates Respondent to make these contributions on behalf of employees only when employees become eligible to receive health and welfare benefits from the Trust; and, (2) whether the part-time employees on whose behalf Respondent is not obligated to contribute to the Trust are limited to three who work no more than 60 hours a month, as contended by the General Counsel and Union, or constitute all employees who work less than either 30 hours a week or 60 hours a month, as contended by Respondent.

On 17 July 1986 I conducted a hearing in this proceeding.

On the entire record, from my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and having considered the parties' posthearing briefs, I make the following

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. The Facts

Respondent operates a restaurant and lounge. The Union represents a unit of Respondent's employees. Immediately prior to the time material herein, the Respondent and Union were parties to a collective-bargaining contract covering these employees. Under the terms of the contract, which was effective from 1 June 1983 to 1 June 1984, Respondent was obligated to contribute to the Trust on behalf of the unit employees. The sole provision in the contract dealing with this subject was entitled "Health and Welfare" and read, in pertinent part, as follows:[2]

> 1. The employer agrees to pay the Hotel, Restaurant and Beverage Employees Trust or its successor the sum of 38 cents per compensible [sic] hour effective with May 1, 1983 hours for all employees covered by this Agreement. The Employer shall increase its contribution rate by 12 cents per compensible [sic] hour commencing with hours worked on or after August 1, 1983. The Employer's contribution shall not be increased above 50 cents per compensible [sic] hour during the term of the Agreement.

Under the terms of this provision Respondent contributed to the Trust on behalf of the employees covered by the contract as soon as they were employed, i.e., from their first compensable hour, even though they were not eligible under the Trust's eligibility rules to receive contractual health insurance benefits until they worked 1000 compensable hours, hours for which an employer contributed to the Trust.

In April 1984 the negotiators for Respondent and the Union commenced bargaining for a contract to succeed the 1983–1984 contract which was scheduled to expire 1 June 1984. Respondent's president, Bruce Brandt, was Respondent's negotiator and the Union's financial secretary/business representative, Phyllis Wright, who was accompanied by an employee committee, was the Union's negotiator. In the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding the Board affirmed the judge's conclusion that these negotiations resulted in the parties reaching a verbal agreement on all the terms of collective-bargaining contraction
8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing and refusing since December 1984 to execute a written collective-bargaining contract containing the terms of this verbal agreement. In the instant supplemental proceeding the parties agreed that General Counsel's Exhibit 2 is the written collective-bargaining contract that the Board found contained the terms that had been verbally agreed to by Respondent and the Union and that Respondent was obligated, under the Board's Order, to execute and give effect to retroactively.

General Counsel's Exhibit 2, which for the sake of convenience is referred to herein as the 1984–1985 contract, consists of eight pages and two addenda. The 1984–1985 contract is effective from 1 June 1984 to 1 June 1985[3] and covers a bargaining unit consisting of chefs, cooks, cooks' helpers, dishwashers, hostesses, waiters, waitresses, bus persons, bartenders, and banquet waiters/waitresses; but excluding persons employed as a kitchen supervisor, waiter/waitress supervisor, bar supervisor, banquet supervisor, and cocktail supervisor.

[2] Unlike the 1984–1985 contract, which is described infra, the 1983–1984 contract, R. Exh. 1, does not include an addendum which deals with Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust on behalf of its employees.

[3] The contract is subject to being automatically renewed for an additional period of 1 year if notice of modification or termination is not given prior to 1 June 1985.

The 1984–1985 contract contains three separate provisions dealing with Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust; one provision at page 8 and the other two are attached to the contract as addenda. The provision at page 8 of the contract has no title and reads as follows:

> The employer agrees to pay the Hotel, Restaurant and Beverage Employees Trust or its successor the sum of fifty (.50) cents per compensible [sic] hour for employees covered by this Agreement and eligible for benefits hereunder exceptions therefore all supervisory employees, all apprentices and the part-time employees (part-time being defined as either less than 30 hours per week or 60 hours per month, the Employer agrees, however not to replace any full-time employee with such part-time employees).

The first addendum, entitled "Part-Time Employees," reads as follows:

> Three Employees To Work Not More Than Sixty (60) Hours Per Month Without Paying Health And Welfare Payments On Such Employees. Part-Time Employees Shall Not Replace Existing Union Represented Positions.

The second addendum, entitled "Agreement," is a printed form which in pertinent part reads as follows:

> I
> The Employer shall pay to the Hotel, Restaurant & Beverage Employees trust, or its successor, the sum of (50) Fifty cents per compensable hour xxxxxxx for each employee covered by the terms of the Labor Agreement, said payments to become effective on the first day of August 1984 for employees who worked or were paid for xxxxxxxxxxx hours in the previous of August 1984. The undersigned employer agrees to be bound by all of the terms and conditions of the trust agreement establishing said Trust Fund or its successor, together with any amendments thereto.[4]
> II
> The Employer hereby grants Power of Attorney to the Employer Trustees or their successors of said Trust, or its successor, to administer said fund as their representatives in the administration of said funds.

General Counsel's Exhibit 8, the "trust agreement" in effect during the time material, referred to in the above-described second addendum, reads in pertinent part, as follows:

> Each Employer shall have an obligation to contribute to the Fund the amount of benefit contributions specified in its applicable Collective Bargaining Agreement or such other written agreement adopted pursuant to regulations of the Board of Trustees. [art. IV, sec. 4.1.]
> The Trustees shall have the power to construe the provisions of this Trust Agreement and the eligibility requirements established by the Trustees and any such construction adopted by it in good faith shall be binding upon any and all parties and persons affected thereby subject to the appeal procedure set forth herein. [art. V, sec. 5.2.]

Pursuant to the authority granted to them in the above-described Trust Agreement, the Trust's trustees promulgated eligibility requirements which were in effect during the time material and which were printed for distribution in the form of a booklet. The eligibility requirements pertinent to this case, which are set forth in the booklet, General Counsel's Exhibit 9, read as follows:

> INITIAL ELIGIBILITY for benefits will be attained on the first day of the month following accumulation of at least 1000 hours of paid contributions as reported by one or more employers within NOT MORE than 12 consecutive months AND with NOT LESS than 62 hours in any month during accumulation of the 1000 hours of paid contributions. If less than 62 hours of paid contributions is reported by your employer(s) in one or more months of the initial qualifying period you will start a new initial qualifying period when you once again are reported for 62 hours or more of paid contributions.[5] You will remain eligible during each succeeding calendar month if your employment for one or more participating employers totaled at least 62 hours during the preceding calendar month and contributions are paid for those hours.
> If you cease to be eligible and fail to re-establish your eligibility within 6 months, the initial eligibility will again be imposed.

It is undisputed that Respondent's negotiator, Brandt, was not shown and was not given a copy of the above-described trust agreement either prior to or during the contract negotiations. In dispute, however, is whether Union Negotiator Wright during the negotiations gave Brandt the booklet containing a description of the above-described eligibility requirements. Brandt testified he was not given the booklet during the negotiations. Wright testified that during the time material she had a stack of the booklets, that it was her practice to distribute booklets to the several employers whom she was negotiating with, and that pursuant to this practice she gave a booklet to Brandt at the start of the negotiations for the 1984–1985 agreement. I credit Wright's testimony and reject Brandt's because of Wright's testimonial demeanor which was better than Brandt's.

[4] The italicized language refers to either handwritten or typed notations which were inserted in blank spaces on the printed form. The series of x's refers to where language on the printed form has been x'd out by a typewriter.

[5] G.C. Exh. 10 shows that effective 1 May 1985 the Trust's trustees amended the above-described eligibility requirements so that "qualifying hours for eligibility shall be reduced to 500 hours over, not more than, an eight-month period and no less than 62 hours in any one month."

It is undisputed that Brandt, during the negotiations for the 1984–1985 contract, on more than one occasion stated emphatically that he did not want to continue making contributions to the Trust on behalf of employees who were not eligible to receive benefits and stated that he wanted to contribute only on behalf of the employees who were eligible to receive benefits. Brandt testified that in response Wright replied by stating she did not think Brandt should have to make contributions on behalf of employees who were not eligible to receive benefits. Wright, on the other hand, testified she responded by telling Brandt that virtually every employer she negotiated with complained about having to contribute on behalf of employees who were not eligible to receive benefits, and also informed Brandt that when Wright had worked in the trade that Wright, herself, had problems with this system, but explained to Brandt that the way the Union's health and welfare program operated, was that an employee had to work a certain number of hours before he or she became eligible to receive health insurance benefits and that the employer was required to contribute to the trust for those hours even if the employee was not at the time eligible to receive benefits. I have credited Wright's testimony because her testimonial demeanor was better than Brandt's.

Regarding the language set forth at page 8 of the 1984–1985 contract which states in substance that Respondent agrees to pay the Trust the sum of 50 cents per compensable hour for employees covered by the Agreement and eligible for benefits, neither Brandt nor Wright were able to remember the circumstances surrounding the drafting of this language. When asked whether he was responsible for it, Brandt testified: "It was a combination. You know, Ms. Wright drafted some; I drafted some; and I don't remember exactly who drafted this paragraph." Wright testified she felt she would never have worded the paragraph the way it was set forth in the 1984–1985 contract, but testified she had no independent recollection of who was responsible for its wording.

Regarding the language set forth at page 8 of the 1984–1985 contract which refers to part-time employees and defines them as employees employed for less than 40 hours a week or 60 hours a month and states that Respondent agrees not to replace full-time employees with part-time employees, Brandt testified that this language was negotiated under the following circumstances. Brandt and Wright were attempting to draft contractual language to excuse Respondent from paying trust contributions on behalf of part-time employees who were not eligible to receive benefits. Wright informed Brandt that she thought that if employees worked less than 30 hours per week or less than 60 hours per month that they would not be eligible to receive health insurance benefits. Wright, however, accepted the language with respect to part-time employees only after Brandt agreed to the addition of the proviso whereby Respondent agreed not to replace any full-time employees with part-time employees, which Wright told Brandt she felt was needed to make sure Respondent did not replace all of its full-time employees with part-time employees in an effort to avoid making contributions to the Trust.

No evidence was presented during the instant hearing about the circumstances surrounding the addition of the first addendum to the 1984–1985 contract, the addendum which states Respondent may employ three part-time employees to work not more than 60 hours a month without contributing to the Trust. However, in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding the administrative law judge, whose findings were adopted by the Board, found that with respect to the Respondent's health and welfare contributions that the "main focus of bargaining" during the contract negotiations "was the employer's proposal to exclude three part-time employees from coverage" and further found that during the negotiations Brandt explained to Wright that he wanted this addendum to be a part of the contract because "he did not feel he wanted to pay into [the trust for] these employees that did not work [but] only a few hours a month."

No evidence was presented during the instant hearing nor were any findings made by the judge in the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding about the circumstances surrounding the addition of the second addendum to the 1984–1985 contract, the one dealing generally with Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust.

B. Discussion and Conclusionary Findings

The General Counsel's position is that under the terms of the 1984–1985 contract the employees covered by the contract on whose behalf Respondent does not have to contribute to the Trust are the apprentices and three part-time employees who work not more than 60 hours per month.[6] Respondent's position is that the employees covered by the contract on whose behalf Respondent does not have to contribute to the Trust are apprentices, part-time employees who work less than 30 hours per week or 60 hours per month, and employees who have not completed "1000 hour of uninterrupted non part-time employment." I am of the opinion, for the reasons set forth hereinafter, that the position of the General Counsel has merit.

Pursuant to the plain and unambiguous language of an addendum to the 1984–1985 contract—"The Employer shall pay to the [Trust] the sum of (50) fifty cents for compensable hour for each employee covered by the terms of the Labor Agreement"—Respondent agreed to contribute to the Trust on behalf of all of the employees covered by the contract, without exception. Also, as described in detail supra, the language of this addendum requires Respondent to abide by the terms of the Trust Agreement, any amendments to the Trust Agreement, and to designate the Trust's trustees as Respondent's representative in the administration of the Trust. The trustees, pursuant to the authority vested in them by the Trust Agreement, promulgated certain "eligibility for benefit" requirements which employees must meet to qualify for benefits, including the requirement that, "INI-

[6] All the parties to this proceeding agree that employees employed as kitchen supervisor, waiter/waitress supervisor, bar supervisor, banquet supervisor, and cocktail supervisor are not covered by the contract and that Respondent is not obligated to contribute to the Trust on their behalf.

TIAL ELIGIBILITY for benefits will be attained on the first day of the month following accumulation of at least 1000 hours of paid contributions as reported by one or more employers . . . ." Respondent, when it reached agreement with the Union on the terms of the 1984–1985 contract, knew about this eligibility requirement inasmuch as it was in effect during the term of the parties' previous agreement and, at the start of the negotiations for the 1984–1985 contract, Respondent's negotiator was given a booklet by the Union's negotiator which set forth the eligibility requirements promulgated by the trustees.

In other words, when they reached agreement on the terms of the 1984–1985 contract, the Respondent and the Union added to the contract an addendum dealing solely with the subject of Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust. The addendum obligated Respondent to abide by the terms of the Trust agreement and any amendments thereto, designated the Trust's trustees as Respondent's representatives, and obligated Respondent to contribute 50 cents per compensable hour to the Trust on behalf of each employee covered by the contract, commencing with the employee's first compensable hour of employment. This latter obligation is consistent with the eligibility rules promulgated by the Trust's trustees which required "at least 1000 hours of paid contributions" before an employee was eligible to receive benefits. Thus, under the terms of the eligibility rules, which Respondent knew about when it reached agreement on the terms of the 1984–1985 contract, virtually no one would ever become eligible to receive health insurance benefits from the Trust, if, as Respondent urges, Respondent was only obligated to contribute to the Trust on behalf of those employees who had completed "1000 hours of uninterrupted non part-time employment."[7] For, the only employees who would receive health insurance benefits under Respondent's interpretation of the contract are those who before coming to work for Respondent had already met the eligibility requirements by virtue of their employment with another employer or employers. The aforesaid circumstances, viewed in their entirety, warrant the inference that when Respondent and the Union reached agreement on the terms of the 1984–1985 contract that their intent was for Respondent to contribute to the Trust on behalf of employees covered by the contract and for the contributions to begin from an employee's first compensable hour of employment and not, as Respondent contends, only after the employee became eligible to receive health insurance benefits.

All the parties to this supplemental proceeding agree that Respondent is not obligated to contribute to the Trust on behalf of employees covered by the contract who are classified as apprentices, inasmuch as contributions for this class of workers have been unambiguously and specifically excluded by the contractual provision dealing with Trust contributions located at page 8 of the contract, which provision has been set out in detail supra. Respondent contends that by virtue of certain additional language in this provision, Respondent, despite the above-described addendum to the contract, was obligated to contribute to the Trust on behalf of only those employees eligible to receive benefits, namely, those who completed 1000 hours of uninterrupted part-time employment. However, the language relied on by Respondent—"[t]he employer agrees to pay [the Trust] the sum of 50 cents per compensable hour for employees covered by this agreement and eligible for benefits hereunder"—does not plainly and unambiguously state this. Respondent's attorney concedes that the language is ambiguous (Tr. 134, LL. 2–10, and p. 135, LL. 5–10). Respondent's attorney in fact describes this language as "idiotic, it means nothing; it creates an impossible situation" (Tr. 135, LL. 5–10). The "impossible situation" referred to by Respondent's attorney is that if the language, "eligible for benefits hereunder," is interpreted to mean Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust is limited solely to employees who are eligible to receive benefits, the effect would be that virtually none of Respondent's employees would ever become eligible to receive benefits because virtually none of them would be able to accumulate the 1000 hours of paid employer contributions necessary to obtain eligibility. In other words, if this language is interpreted to limit Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust only on behalf of employees who are eligible to receive the health insurance benefits provided by the Trust, it would defeat the principal purpose for which the provision was included in the contract; the furnishing of health insurance benefits to employees covered by the contract.[8] It is for all these reasons that I am persuaded the phraseology, "and eligible for benefits hereunder," is meaningless and that when Respondent and the Union agreed to add the above-described addendum to their 1984–1985 contract, that their intent was to have the language of the addendum supersede this meaningless, or as Respondent puts it, this "idiotic" phraseology.

Likewise, I am persuaded that by adding to their agreement an addendum dealing solely and specifically with Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust on behalf of part-time employees, the Respondent and Union intended to repudiate or supersede the previous reference to this subject located at page 8 of the agree-

[7] See Restatement 2d, Contracts, sec. 203(a) ("an interpretation which gives a reasonable . . . and effective meaning to all the terms [of a contract] is preferred to an interpretation which leaves a part unreasonable . . . or of no effect"); see also 3 Corbin, Contracts, sec. 552 at 210 (1960) ("It is quite possible for two parties to make a valid contract that seems unfair or unreasonable or even absurd to other people. If, however, the words of agreement can be interpreted so that the contract will be fair and reasonable, the court will prefer that interpretation."); 4 Williston, Contracts, sec. 620 at 748–749 (3d ed. 1961) ("an interpretation which renders the contract or agreement valid and its performance possible will be preferred to one which makes it void or its performance impossible or meaningless; an interpretation which makes the contract or agreement fair and reasonable will be preferred to one which leads to harsh or unreasonable results.").

[8] See Restatement 2d, Contracts, sec. 202(1)(1979) ("Words and other conduct are interpreted in the light of all the circumstances, and if the principal purpose of the parties is ascertainable it is given great weight.") See also 4 Williston, Contracts, sec. 619 at 732–733 (3d ed. 1961). (If it is impossible to read together all of the provisions of an agreement so as to give them a reasonable meaning, "an interpretation which gives effect to the main apparent purpose of the contract is favored.") ment.[9] The language of the addendum—"[t]hree Employees to work not more than sixty (60) hours per week without paying health and welfare payments on such employees"—is part of a contractual provision which deals solely with the subject of Respondent's obligation to make Trust contributions for part-time employees, whereas, the language at page 8 of the contract—"exceptions therefore . . . the part-time employees, (part-time being defined as either less than 30 hours per week or 60 hours per month . . .)"—is part of a provision dealing with other matters besides Respondent's obligation toward the part-time employees. Moreover, the language of the addendum, in a significant respect, is in harmony with the part-time employee language set forth at page 8 of the contract. The language of page 8 of the contract does not deliniate the number of part-time employees involved, whereas, the addendum deliniates the exact number of part-time employees that the parties intended to be encompassed by the limitation upon Respondent's obligation to contribute to the Trust on behalf of part-time employees.[10] It is for all these reasons that I find when the Respondent and Union agreed to add to the 1984–1985 contract the addendum dealing with the subject of part-time employees, it was their intent to have the language of this addendum supersede the previous reference to part-time employees in the agreement.

Based on the foregoing, I find Respondent's obligation to make the contractually required payments to the Trust, as required by the Board's Order, will be satisfied by paying to the Trust 50 cents per compensable hour for all employees covered by the 1984–1985 contract who have been employed by Respondent at any time since 1 August 1984, except for apprentices and three part-time employees who work not more than 60 hours per month. I further find that in addition to the aforesaid Trust contributions that Respondent is obligated to make on behalf of the employees, Respondent is also obligated pursuant to the terms of the Trust agreement to pay to the Trust liquidated damages of 10 percent of the delinquent contributions, plus interest thereon at the rate of 12 percent per annum.

The amended backpay specification alleges that for the period from 1 August 1984, the start of the backpay period, through 31 March 1984, the last completed quarter prior to the issuance of the backpay specification, that Respondent's obligation herein will be discharged by payments to the Trust of the sums of money set forth aside of the names of the employees named in Appendix A of the specification, and further alleges that this obligation will be discharged by payments on behalf of these employees to the Trust of $21,470 and liquidated damages of $2147, plus interest accumulated to the date of payment. The specification, as amended, is accurate in all respects except one,[11] namely, it does not exclude from Appendix A the three part-time employees employed not more than 60 hours per month (Tr. 33, LL. 2–6), on whose behalf Respondent is not obligated to contribute to the Trust. In view of this it is impossible for me to accurately compute the amount of contributions Respondent was obligated to make to the Trust during the backpay period. I therefore shall recommend that the parties resolve this matter by themselves, but if they are unable to agree within a reasonable period of time about the amount of trust contributions owed by Respondent to the Trust from 1 August 1984 to the present date, the Board's Regional Director should submit to me a revised specification consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[12]

SUPPLEMENTAL ORDER

The Respondent, Coos-Bend, Incorporated, d/b/a The Sawmill Restaurant & Lounge, North Bend, Oregon, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall consistent with this supplemental decision make the required payments to the Hotel, Restaurant and Beverage Employees Trust on behalf of the employees named in Appendix A of the backpay specification[13] and any other employees who since 31 March 1986 have been employed by Respondent on whose behalf Respondent is obligated to contribute, plus liquidated damages of 10 percent of delinquent contributions and interest thereon at 12 percent per annum.

31 March 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND CRACRAFT

On 6 November 1986 Administrative Law Judge Richard J. Boyce issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a brief and an answering brief. The General Counsel filed cross-exceptions and a brief and a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Southwest Gas Corporation, Tucson, Arizona, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Hector O. Nava, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Roy E. Potts, Esq (Overton, Lyman & Prince), of Los Angeles, California, for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD J. BOYCE, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was tried in Phoenix, Arizona, on 9 and 10 September 1986.[1] The charge was filed on 5 May 1986 by Construction, Building Materials and Miscellaneous Drivers Local Union No. 83, an affiliate of International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America (Union). The resulting complaint issued on 13 June, was amended during the trial, and alleges that Southwest Gas Corporation (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act) about 1 May 1986 by "promulgat[ing], maintain[ing] and enforc[ing] a rule prohibiting union solicitation during working hours," and by "issu[ing] a verbal warning to its employee, Edwin S. Fine," pursuant to that rule and because of Fine's union activities.[2]

I conclude below, after an examination of the relevant evidence and applicable legal principles, that Respondent violated the Act substantially as alleged.

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a public utility engaged in the distribution and sale of natural gas. That it is an employer engaged in and affecting commerce within Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act is undisputed.

II. LABOR ORGANIZATION

The Union is a labor organization within Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED MISCONDUCT

A. Evidence

Fine is one of about 60 customer service technicians working out of Respondent's Tucson operations center. He has been with Respondent for about 8 years, the last 5 in his present position.

In March and April 1986, Fine approached several labor organizations about seeking to represent the customer service technicians in Respondent's Apache Division.[3] The Apache Division covers southern Arizona, and includes the Tucson facility and those in such other localities as Bisbee, Casa Grande, Douglas, and Globe. The Union was receptive to Fine's overtures, mounting an organizational drive in April with him as chairman of the organizing committee.

The morning of 23 April, while walking from the parking lot to the service technicians' ready room at the Tucson operations center, Fine crossed paths with Ed Morgan, a service technician out of Globe. The two once had worked together and, in Fine's view, were friends. Morgan was attending a line locater school at the Tucson facility, and was on his way to the parking lot preliminary to going out for field instruction. Fine told him about the aborning organizational effort and asked for his telephone number, explaining that organizers were needed in the "outlying areas." Globe is about 100 miles from Tucson. Morgan gave his number, then the two went their separate ways. The encounter lasted no more than a minute or two.

[2] Sec. 8(a)(1) prohibits an employer from "interfer[ing] with, restrain[ing], or coerc[ing] employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in Section 7" of the Act. Sec. 7 guarantees employees "the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations . . . and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection . . . ."

[3] The service technicians had been represented by Local 1116, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, until that union was decertified in 1982—a result Fine had worked to achieve.

A day or two later, according to Morgan, he mentioned the encounter to his supervisor in Globe, Riley Doss. Doss told him, so Morgan recounted, that he "couldn't discuss it with [Morgan] at all," but that, if Morgan "wanted to make a memo as to what happened . . . that was up to [him]." Morgan's purpose in talking to Doss, he testified, "was . . . more trying to find out what was going on than anything. . . . [A]ll I did was simply make the statement that there was some talk about a union, and I wanted to know about what was going on."

Morgan continued that he did not feel he had been "harassed" by Fine, and that he had no "intention at all" of complaining about Fine or causing him to receive a warning.

Following his conversation with Doss, and after discussing the matter with "the wife," Morgan supplied Doss with this memorandum:

> I was in Tucson, attending a school for line location at the Operation Center. On April 23, at approximately 8:50 a.m., I was going to my vehicle when I was confronted by Ed Fine, a service tech. He explained that he was currently involved with organizing a union at Southwest Gas (The Teamsters) and that he would like my home phone number so that he and a union rep could contact me because it was necessary to get the support of the other districts. I gave him the office number and he said he need[ed] my home phone. About this time, Jeff Layton walked by and said he needed to see me and Ed Fine walked away saying he would see me later. I have not seen or talked to Ed since.

The document, undated, is in Morgan's writing and, he testified, was prepared at home. The Jeff Layton mentioned in it is a Tucson customer service supervisor and Fine's immediate superior.

Morgan's memo to the contrary, Fine testified that their meeting occurred several minutes before the 8 a.m. start of his workday and that Layton was nowhere to be seen. Two others, Mike McGuire, a service technician, and Mark McLaughlin, a construction technician attending class with Morgan, likewise testified that they saw Fine with Morgan before 8 a.m., and that they did not see Layton. Morgan testified consistently with his memo, and Layton's testimony concerning his presence and the timing of the incident mirrored Morgan's.

Whatever Fine's status, Morgan technically was "on the clock" at the time of their encounter, his class having convened about 7 a.m. The record contains no evidence, however, that the encounter interfered even slightly with Morgan's school activities, or that it caused any other kind of work-related disruption.

On 29 April, according to Blake Down, Apache Division vice president, he had a telephone conversation with T. N. (Burr) Brackeen, superintendent of customer service, in which.

> Mr. Brackeen relayed all the particulars of the incident to me and said that they intended to have Mr. Layton . . . administer a verbal warning [to Fine] because of union activities on working time; and I concurred.

Brackeen particularized. per Down, that Morgan "had been approached by Mr. Fine, who had solicited matters pertaining to union organization"; and that Morgan,

> When he got back to Globe, indicated to his supervisors that this had happened to him and [he] was not particularly happy about it, and he was told, if you will put your complaint down in writing, which he did.

Down testified that his conversation with Brackeen lasted "probably five minutes"; and that, before concurring in the warning, he took pains to determine when the incident occurred, "to be sure that it was during working time and not before work, during coffee break, lunch hour, and so forth." Brackeen "indicated there was no question about [the time] whatsoever," according to Down.

Down testified that he is "involved pretty much in any disciplinary procedures." He enlarged: "[I]n most cases, it's more of an informational type thing, but I have the option to say, 'Wait a minute, let's take a second look.'"

On 30 April, Layton recounted, Brackeen showed him Morgan's memo and directed him "to have a meeting with Mr. Fine and tell him that this is a verbal warning for soliciting the union during company working time." This, according to Layton, was his first "intimation" that Fine "had been complained about." Asked if he had perceived Fine to be doing anything improper when he came upon the underlying encounter, Layton testified:

> At that time, I could not perceive anything that was more than a greeting. That's not something that warrants a verbal warning at all, sir. It would be like saying hello to the employee as he went by.

Next asked if he mentioned to Brackeen that he had been a bystander during a portion of the encounter, Layton first testified that he "possibly did say that [he] had saw them greeting each other," later averring that he was "pretty certain that [he] did."

On 1 May, shortly before 8 a.m., Layton told Fine that he and Brackeen wanted to meet with him before he began his "daily routine." Fine asked why, to which Layton said he thought Fine knew "what it was about." When Fine appeared at Layton's desk about 8 a.m., Fine repeated the question and Layton said the meeting was "due to [Fine's] union activities." Fine asked if he could have "another representative" with him in that event. Layton replied that that was not necessary; that "it was just a verbal-warning meeting" and not "any big deal." Fine then said he was going to bring in a tape recorder from his truck, which he did. after which the two, without Brackeen, met in Brackeen's office. Layton told Fine that Brackeen was absent because of a "miscommunication."

Layton announced at the start that "the NLRB has regulations that govern" the conduct of employees as well as employers, and that "it has been brought to our attention that we have got . . . a complaint from a technician that you were soliciting for the union during company hours."

Layton continued that "it is against the NLRB rules to do it during company hours." Fine protested that he "didn't do it." Layton countered: "I've got a written complaint. OK?" Fine presently remarked that he was "extremely aware of the law," to which Layton rejoined, "Then tell me what the law is, then, so I can . . . understand what you heard." Fine answered: "Like you say, I cannot solicit for the union on company time nor on company property. I cannot pass propaganda on company time nor on company property. In other words, when I'm at work, I'm at work." Layton said, "That's correct."

Layton shortly acknowledged that he is "not an expert" on the law in the area, but that he did know union solicitation "can't be done on company time" and that he "need[ed] to make sure that" Fine realized that. Fine said that he did, but that he wanted to know the identity of his "accuser." Layton replied that Respondent's human resources coordinator, Susan Henning, had that information.

Fine repeated that he had not solicited "on company time." Layton came back that Respondent had > . . . to make sure that you work during working hours . . . and that the union activities are done on your time and the person that you are soliciting, you know, their own time, not during company time, not interrupting work schedules.

Fine interjected that he "agreed wholeheartedly," and Layton went on: "[I]t's kind of like a verbal information warning situation or whatever, however you want to call it. . . . It's to the point it could get into disciplinary action if we get more complaints."

Fine again proclaimed his innocence—"[I]f somebody has said that I have solicited them on company time on company property, they are totally incorrect." The only thing he had done "on company time," he went on, was to inform employees of union meetings, and that was not done "in such a manner to let it interfere with [his] work schedule, either." Layton said he did not "know even if that is a violation"; Fine said he did not know, either, but would "like to find out"; and Layton iterated that the NLRB "has strict guidelines as to what can be done, not only by the company but by the employee."

Later in the exchange, Layton remarked:

> We might have to take disciplinary action . . . if this is a justified complaint. And . . . if it's a justified complaint, then we need to, you know . . . . If it continues from this point on . . . . We might have to take further disciplinary action, and I don't think that you're really into that, as well as us.

Layton took notes during the meeting, even asking Fine to repeat certain remarks, "to try to get as much of what his feelings were about it . . ., so that that could also be conveyed to management or to [himself] later."

After the meeting, relying on his notes, Layton prepared this memorandum:

> To: FILE
> From: Jeffrey O. Layton
> Date: May 1, 1986
> Subject: Verbal Warning and Advisory Meeting/Ed Fine
> I had a meeting with Edwin Fine on May 1, 1986 at 8:40 a.m. to advise him that management has received a written complaint from a Service Technician. This complaint stated that Ed was soliciting for the teamsters union during working hours.
> I advised Ed that the National Labor Relations Board has rules which govern both the company and union actions; and solicitations for the union during working hours violates those rules. I explained to Ed this was a verbal warning, but further disciplinary action would be taken if he continued solicitations during workings hours.
> Ed explained that he was very aware of the N.L.R.B. requirements and he did not want to jeopardize his job. He said the only thing he has done during working hours is to advise other employees of union meetings, not realizing he was doing anything wrong. That if advising fellow employees of union meetings was a violation he would like to know.
> Ed stated that he still thinks Southwest Gas is a good company; but in the past when complaints were made about management people the problem improved for a while, then the problem management figure returned to their old ways.
> Ed feels that employee human rights are being violated and the union may be able to correct the problems if the company can not. He hates to see the situation come to this-with the union; but has very strong feelings about what is happening to employees. He stated many are afraid they will lose their jobs if they complain.

Layton testified that this memo was placed in a desk file, but not in Fine's personnel file. It was not shown to Fine.

Respondent has no generally announced prohibition against solicitation.[4] Indeed, it long has tolerated, even encouraged, a multitude of solicitation activities on its premises during worktime—charitable fund raising (Junior Achievement, Girl Scouts, United Way), sports pools, the selling of wares by employee to employee, etc. Conceding that Respondent is "more restrictive" of union activity than of these others, Down testified that the latter "engender a spirit of cooperation within the company" and that support of charitable causes "bring[s]

[4] By memorandum dated 3 March 1981, Respondent rescinded a rule entitled "Solicitation on Company Premises" out of concern that it "unlawfully restrict[ed] employees' rights to discuss and distribute information on organizational or representational matters." The memo stated in part: "The Company never intended to enforce, and never has enforced the rule in such a way as to prevent solicitation on non-working time (for instance, during breaks and lunch time, or before or after starting or quitting time), or to interfere with distribution of literature in non-working areas[, but] . . . to remove any ambiguity or confusion which [the rule] may have inadvertently caused, that rule is rescinded in its entirety . . . ."

the company a tremendous amount of credibility in the community," whereas "union organizing activities [are] the exact opposite," breaking down "all the cooperative feelings that you have between employees, between departments."

Under Respondent's four-step disciplinary system, Fine would be subject to a written warning should he transgress again within a year of the first offense, and to probation and then discharge in the event of third and fourth offenses within that year.

Brackeen, although the decision-maker as concerns the warning, did not testify. Neither did Morgan's Globe supervisor, Doss.

B. Conclusions and Reasons

Whether Fine's encounter with Morgan happened after Fine's clock-in time, Respondent's later-communicated rule curtailing union solicitation by Fine violated Section 8(a)(1) as alleged, necessarily tainting the concomitant verbal warning, as well.

The bases for these conclusions are:

1. The limits on solicitation, as articulated by Layton, are invalidly broad.

"[A] rule is presumptively invalid if it prohibits solicitation on the employees' own time," and a ban against soliciting during "working hours," as distinguished from "working time," comes within the adverse presumption. Our Way, Inc., 268 NLRB 394, 394–395 (1983). See also Consolidated Edison Co., 280 NLRB 338 (1986); Perth Amboy Hospital, 279 NLRB 52 (1986); Essex International, 211 NLRB 749 (1974). Layton couched Respondent's prohibition in terms not only of "working hours," but two equivalents, "company hours" and "company time." Additionally, he endorsed Fine's formulation that he was not to solicit "on company time nor on company premises." The adverse presumption thus obtains, and the record contains no overriding evidence that such a rule is necessary to maintain production or discipline, or serves some other legitimate interest. See Brigadier Industries Corp., 271 NLRB 656, 657 (1984); Wm. H. Block Co., 150 NLRB 341, 342–343 (1964).

2. Apart from its excessive breadth, the rule is "invalid on its face because it is directed solely against union solicitation." C.O.W. Industries, 276 NLRB 960 (1985). See also Montgomery Ward, 269 NLRB 598, 599 (1984); Paceco, 237 NLRB 399, 401 (1978).

3. Beyond the rule's unwarranted breadth and facial infirmities, Respondent's warning of Fine over the fleeting exchange with Morgan, while allowing and even encouraging a plethora of other, far more intrusive solicitation activities during worktime, demonstrates that the rule is disparately and hence unlawfully enforced against union solicitation. Brigadier Industries Corp., supra at 657; Wm. H. Block Co., supra at 343.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) about 1 May 1986, as alleged, by communicating a rule that curtails union solicitation in an overly broad and discriminatory manner, and by issuing a verbal warning to Edwin S. Fine to enforce that unlawful rule.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

The Respondent, Southwest Gas Corporation, Tucson, Arizona, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Communicating, maintaining, or enforcing a rule that discriminatorily prohibits any employee from talking about or soliciting on behalf of Construction, Building Materials and Miscellaneous Drivers Local Union No. 83, an affiliate of International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, or any other labor organization, during "working hours," "company hours," or "company time," or on "company premises."

(b) Issuing a verbal warning to, or otherwise disciplining or discriminating against, any employee to enforce such a rule.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Remove from its records, wherever situated, all evidence of and reference to the unlawful verbal warning given to Edwin S. Fine about 1 May 1986, and notify him in writing that this has been done and that the warning will not be used as a basis, in whole or part, for future personnel action against him.

(b) Rescind the rule communicated about 1 May 1986 that discriminatorily prohibits employees from soliciting on behalf of Local Union No. 83 during "working hours," "company hours," or "company time," or on "company premises."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT communicate, maintain, or enforce a rule which discriminatorily prohibits any employee from talking about or soliciting on behalf of Construction, Building Materials and Miscellaneous Drivers Local Union No. 83, an affiliate of International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, or any other labor organization, during "working hours," "company hours," or "company time," or on "company premises."

WE WILL NOT issue a verbal warning to, or otherwise discipline or discriminate against, any employee to enforce such a rule.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL remove from our records, wherever situated, all evidence of and reference to the unlawful verbal warning given to Edwin S. Fine about 1 May 1986, and WE WILL notify him in writing that this has been done and that the warning will not be used as a basis, in whole or part, for future personnel action against him.

WE WILL rescind the rule communicated about 1 May 1986 that discriminatorily prohibits employees from soliciting on behalf of Local Union No. 83 during "working hours," "company hours," or "company time," or on "company premises."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 10 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Benjamin Schlesinger issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed cross-exceptions and a brief in opposition to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In concluding that the complaint should be dismissed, we rely solely on the judge's conclusion that the Respondent's refusal to issue Fischbach a withdrawal card did not violate Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act, and find it unnecessary to decide whether the complaint is time-barred by Sec. 10(b). We agree with the judge that Teamsters Local 579 (Northern Conveyor), 274 NLRB 100 (1985), is distinguishable from the instant situation. In that case, the Board found that the Respondent's discipline of an individual, who had obtained a withdrawal card, for crossing a picket line violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A). In so finding, the Board noted, inter alia, that the language of the Respondent's withdrawal card and its bylaws on its face equated withdrawal status with resignation, that nothing in the bylaws or card informed an employee on withdrawal status of possible discipline for crossing a picket line, and that any ambiguity created in this situation was construed against the Union. Northern Conveyor did not find, however, that an employee on withdrawal status was, in fact, in all situations to be considered a resigned employee. It found, rather, that when certain union documents appeared to equate withdrawal with resignation and could reasonably lead an employee on withdrawal status to believe that he could cross a picket line free from union discipline, then any ambiguity whether the union might lawfully discipline the employee for engaging in such conduct subsequent to withdrawal would be resolved against the union, the author of the documents. But here there is no ambiguity and Fischbach did not rely on the language in the documents to his detriment. He was simply denied a withdrawal card; he was not denied the opportunity to resign. Indeed, in seeking the withdrawal card he had no intention of resigning. He wanted the card so that he could work in another locality and join another local of the International without paying a new initiation fee. We find no Sec. 7 rights were restrained by the Respondent's refusal to give him such a card. In sum, we find the Respondent's actions did not violate Sec. 8(b)(1)(A).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and the complaint is dismissed.

Paul Bosanac, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Frederick Perillo, Esq. (Goldberg, Previant, Uelmen, Gratz, Miller & Brueggeman, S.C.), of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for Respondent.
Robert B. Fischbach, of Gages Lake, Illinois, Charging Party, pro se.

DECISION

FINDINGS OF FACT AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

BENJAMIN SCHLESINGER, Administrative Law Judge. Charging Party Robert B. Fischbach attempted to obtain a withdrawal card from his union, Respondent Teamsters Local Union No. 579, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen & Helpers of America.[1] Respondent's refusal to give him one prompted the issuance of a complaint alleging that Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the National Labor Relations Act, 29 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.[2]

Jurisdiction is conceded. Fischbach was employed by L.C.L. Transit Company (Employer), which is an interstate freight carrier in Elkhorn, Wisconsin. During the year preceding 20 February 1986, the Employer derived gross revenues in excess of $50,000 from the transportation of freight and commodities from Wisconsin to points located outside Wisconsin. I conclude, as Respondent admits, that the Employer is an employer engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. I also conclude, as Respondent admits, that Respondent is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

The Essence of the Dispute

Fischbach had been a member of Respondent from 6 February 1973 and had served as a steward from 1979–1984. On 1 August 1984 he engaged in an argument with Brendan Kaiser, Respondent's secretary-treasurer and business agent, about the transfer of coverage of medical benefits to a different insurance carrier, causing Fischbach to pay more for dental care for his daughter. Fischbach also complained that the officers of another local of the International had "robbed" him of 3 years of pension credit with one of his former employers. The argument became heated; Fischbach lost his temper and, among other things, he charged that "all Teamsters are crooked bastards," and he told Kaiser in vile terms where he could put his "fucking insurance."

Just as Fischbach lost his temper, so did Kaiser, who sent a letter to all the Employer's employees about 2 August 1984, complaining of Fischbach's defamatory statements; advising the employees to quit their jobs and find out what it was like to work in a nonwork shop ("The bitchers won't have a complaint about health insurance, the changing of health insurance, pension plans, etc., because there won't be any, and if there is any, it will be solely at the discretion of the Employer"); and accusing Fischbach of making "derogatory, disrespectful remarks about me, my predecessors and other Local Union officials where he had been a Teamster member," of being insubordinate, and of failing to "render full allegiance," in violation of Respondent's bylaws.

Kaiser asked the employees to choose between Respondent and Fischbach. If the majority of employees was dissatisfied with Respondent, it would file a disclaimer of representation with the Board. ("This will remove the Union from the obligation to represent you. Yes, you will be without a union, a contract, a health insurance plan that you now are in (paid for by the Company), and a pension plan.") "After that you are on your own," he wrote, or the employees could "[f]ile charges against the dissident members for violation of the Teamsters Local Union No. 579 By-Laws and the International Brotherhood of Teamsters Constitution, Article 19." If they are found quilty, they can be "reprimanded, fined, suspended for a period of time or expulsion'"; and "[w]ithout membership either through suspension or expulsion the member is unable to work . . . on this job because" the Employer could employ only Respondent's members.

So the choice, Kaiser wrote, was up to the employees:

> If the majority are pleased with the way your Local Union has represented you, then I suggest that you reply as previously requested. Further, that if the majority is satisfied then I suggest that you talk to the dissidents and urge them to make written retraction and apologize to the Secretary-Treasurer of this Local Union. If the dissidents fail to take this opportunity, there will be charges filed against the problem members.

On receipt of this letter, Fischbach called Kaiser twice, but Kaiser failed to answer his calls. Fischbach then retained an attorney, William A. Pangman, who, on 8 October 1984, with Fischbach, filed internal union charges against Kaiser for his alleged interference with Fischbach's right to "express any views, arguments, or opinions," as guaranteed by Respondent's bylaws and the Landrum-Griffin Act. Kaiser countered with his own internal union charges against Fischbach, dated 10 October 1984, alleging that he was "disrespectful in words and actions" to Kaiser and made "defamatory statements."

A number of the Employer's employees grew weary of this dispute and requested Kaiser to come to the Employer's premises and resolve his differences with Fischbach. Kaiser came about 12 November and met with Fischbach, who said that he was contemplating another job in Illinois, that he "would get out of [Kaiser's] hair [and] settle our differences so [Fischbach] could have [his] withdrawal card." Kaiser said that Fischbach did not have to leave and that the dispute could be resolved if he would write an apology. As a result, Fischbach sent the following letter to Kaiser that evening:

> This is a letter of apology to Brendan F. Kaiser and Teamsters Local Union No. 579, the board of directors and other brothers members of the Union, Local Number 200, Southeast area pension fund for any disrespectful words and action that I had said. There will be no more in the future.

That apology, handwritten by Fischbach's daughter, but signed by Fischbach, did not satisfy Kaiser, who wrote Fischbach on 18 December 1984, as follows:

> I am writing you in response to the Executive Baord of Teamsters Local Union No. 579 position on December 15, 1984.
> The Executive Board agreed with my request to rescind and expunge the pending charges if the following steps are followed without exception:
> 1. That a typed letter, which is notarized, from you to Teamsters Local Union No. 579 making the same apology as you did in the handwritten one. (Copy enclosed).
> 2. That a letter of retraction and apology is sent to Teamsters "General" Local No. 200's Secretary-Treasurer, Raymond "Red" Fularczyk, typed and notarized by you.
> 3. That a letter of retraction and apology of any misstatements (because of lack of facts) by you about the Central States, Southeast and Southwest Areas Pension Fund be sent to the Fund, typed and notarized by you.
> 4. That your attorney, Pangman, send a letter of retraction on the charges against Secretary-Treasurer Brendan F. Kaiser to Secretary-Treasurer Brendan F. Kaiser and to Joint Council No. 39 Secretary-Treasurer Raymond "Red" Fularczyk, and that the case is settled.
> 5. A carbon copy of all correspondence sent to all of the above-mentioned parties also to be sent to Teamsters Local Union No. 579 Secretary-Treasurer Brendan F. Kaiser.
> 6. Upon receipt of all requested correspondence Secretary-Treasurer Brendan F. Kaiser will rescind and expunge all charges against Brother Robert Fischbach.
> We all must work together with due respect for each other, in order for our organization to survive the elements of today.

On receipt, Fischbach telephoned Kaiser and complained that his letter did not reflect what Kaiser had previously asked Fischbach to write. Fischbach said that he had carried out his part of the agreement and Kaiser had reneged. Fischbach further stated that he had already obtained his job in Illinois, that he was leaving, and that he refused to engage in any more writing or arguing. In the first week of January 1985[3] he gave notice to the Employer that his last day of employment would be 15 February. On 28 January, Fischbach went to the credit union, withdrew his money, and closed his account; and then went next door to the Respondent's office and asked for the forms necessary to obtain a withdrawal card. After he filled them out, Kaiser walked by. Fischbach told him that he was leaving and had just completed the application for a withdrawal card. Kaiser said that the card was not going to be given to him because "you didn't do what I said," and because Fischbach was still employed and was not eligible for withdrawal until he left his employment.

On 16 February, Fischbach mailed the following letter to Respondent:

> This is a formal request for my withdrawal card from Local 579. It was denied by you and I was also told by my steward, Bob Achilli, that you would not give it to me. My request was filled out in January, 1985, in writing and my dues are paid to date in full.

He received no reply; indeed, Kaiser denied that he ever received it. Fischbach then retained Pangman to obtain the withdrawal card. Pangman called Kaiser on 4 June and told him that Fischbach was no longer working for the Employer, that he had received notices about arrearages of dues,[4] and that he was entitled to receive his withdrawal card. Kaiser replied that Fischbach knew what he had to do, that it was all set forth in his letter of 18 December. Pangman said that he had understood that Fischbach had already apologized and had delivered his request for a withdrawal card. Kaiser said that he would forward to Pangman the 18 December 1984 letter. Kaiser did so on 10 June, stating in an accompanying letter that Fischbach had filled out a withdrawal card application while employed by the Employer and that: "He was informed that he could not get a withdrawal card while being employed and would not be given a withdrawal card until he complied with the 12–18–84 disposition on his membership with the pending charges." Kaiser reaffirmed that he had not received any timely withdrawal request and further stated: "When Mr. Fischbach complies as requested and pays his dues up through the month in which he complies with clearing his membership status, and makes proper application for a withdrawal card, at that time he will be issued a withdrawal card from" Respondent.[5]

An Explanation of Certain Credibility Findings

When Fischbach applied for a withdrawal card on 28 January, his application was premature under the International's constitution, which mandated that the card could be granted only to a memeber who was no longer employed. Fischbach testified that on 28 January Kaiser told him only that the card was being denied because he did not apologize as he requested in the 18 December 1984 letter. In my findings above, I have discredited Fischbach's testimony, finding that Fischbach, although truthful and credible, recalled many incidents in generalities, whereas Kaiser had a thorough and believable recall of the details of his confrontations with Fischbach. Furthermore, I find that Fischbach sent the February letter to Respondent formally requesting a withdrawal card only as a result of Kaiser's advice on 28 January that Fischbach could obtain a withdrawal card only when he ceased his employment, and that Fischbach was advised further that he had to pay his dues to the date of that application (as required by Respondent's bylaws and the international's constitution). Otherwise, there appears to be no reason that would have prompted Fischbach to send the letter in February, after he had quit his employment, and to specifically mention in the letter that his dues had been fully paid.

It also appears that Respondent was put on notice that Fischbach planned to quit his employment on 15 February; and the question is whether Respondent should have delayed the granting of his application until 16 February, without any further written notice by Fischbach. Indeed, Respondent could have checked with the Employer to ensure that Fischbach had in fact left the Employer's employ, as he said he was going to, and, on validating Fischbach's claim, issued the desired card. If there had been no further communications in this proceeding, and if the unfair labor practice charge herein had been timely filed, there might be justification to hold that Fischbach's application of 28 January sufficed and put the Union on notice that he was quitting on 15 February and that the withdrawal card was to be issued when he quit.

In any event, I am persuaded that Fischbach sent a followup letter on 16 February renewing his request of 28 January. I reject Kaiser's testimony that Respondent did not receive that letter. I find that Kaiser's personal animosity to Fischbach affected his truthfulness. Contrary to his statements and letters, Kaiser testified that Fischbach would not have had to apologize to obtain his card, to wit: "I couldn't have withheld a withdrawal card from him if he had come [sic] in and followed the procedures. We wanted this [apology] in our files because he promised us he would do that" and "We wanted that but we couldn't have held him to that." I find this belated explanation false. Kaiser was irrationally impelled to deny Fischbach his rights and was willing to do anything in order to avoid giving out a withdrawal card to one who, he believed, had impugned his integrity and the integrity of his organization.

I, therefore, find that he tailored his testimony to deny receipt of Fischbach's February letter. I reject Respondent's claim that Fischbach did not prepare the letter and did not send it. As stated above, I found Fischbach sincere, candid, and believable. The letter is consistent with Kaiser's earlier advice to Fischbach that the 28 January application was untimely and that the application had to be made only after Fischbach had left his employment. In light of his numerous other requests to obtain the withdrawal card, there is no cogent reason Fischbach

[4] Under date of 22 May, the Union sent a form letter to Fischbach confirming that he had paid dues through March; stating that he was in arrears for April and May, and that, if he had terminated his employment, he should request a withdrawal card; and notifying him that "Dues must be paid through the month that you request a withdrawal card in."

should have attempted to prepare the February letter as a ruse to prove that he did apply for a withdrawal card. The lack of Respondent's address on the letter is of no consequence. Clearly, Fischbach knew the address, as shown on all the other correspondence introduced in this proceeding. Indeed, Fischbach visited Respondent's office on 28 January, as Kaiser conceded. Surely, Fischbach knew Respondent's address, and I credit his testimony that he addressed the envelope containing the February letter and sent it to Respondent.

Discussion of the Applicable Law

The General Counsel's argument in favor of finding a violation relies on a prior Board decision involving Respondent and is succinct:

> The proviso to Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act states that a labor organization shall have the right ". . . to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership. . . ." Notwithstanding the 8(b)(1)(A) proviso, the Supreme Court in Patternmakers League v. NLRB, 119 LRRM 2928 (1985), held that a labor organization could not fine individuals, who tendered their resignations during a strike and returned to work, pursuant to a rule restricting the right to resign from membership. In Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porsche-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984), the Board held that any restrictions placed by a union on its members' right to resign are unlawful.
> [T]he Board has held that Respondent's by-laws and its International's constitution contain provisions which render a withdrawal tantamount to a resignation. Teamsters Local No. 579 (Northern Conveyor Manufacturing Corporation), 274 NLRB 100 (1985), fn. 1. . . . Accordingly, since it has been found that, as written, Respondent's by-laws and the International's constitution equate withdrawal status with resignation, any restrictions Respondent placed on a member's right to withdraw must be considered in light of the rules governing a member's right to resign.
> In his letter to Pangman, dated June 10, 1985, Kaiser states Fischbach was told he would not obtain a withdrawal card until he complied with the demands of the December 18, 1984 letter, at which time the pending charges would be dropped. In Sheet Metal Workers Local 73 (Safe Air, Inc.), 274 NLRB 374 (1985), the Board held that the mere maintenance of a constitutional provision that, inter alia, prohibited resignation during the pendency of internal charges was unlawful. Therefore, Respondent's reasons for refusing Fischbach's request for a withdrawal card, i.e., the pendency of internal union charges, and failure to comply with the December 18, 1984 letter, are unlawful. Additionally, Kaiser's insistence that Fischbach pay his dues through the month in which he requested a withdrawal card would also run afoul of the Board's ruling that Respondent can place no restrictions on the right to resign. Machinists Local Lodge 1414, supra. Thus, Respondent cannot insist on any dues payment as a condition to obtaining a withdrawal card.

In Teamsters Local 579 (Northern Conveyor), 274 NLRB 100 (1985), Respondent fined a member who had previously withdrawn from Respondent for crossing Respondent's picket line. The member claimed that he should not have been subject to discipline because he was not a "card-carrying member" and did not feel that he "belonged to the union, because [he] was on a withdrawal status." The Board agreed, stating in footnote 1:

> In agreeing with the judge that the Union unlawfully disciplined Vierck, we rely solely on the language on the withdrawal card and the Union's bylaws which on its face equated withdrawal status with resignation. The withdrawal card obtained by Vierck stated that the holder "has withdrawn in good standing from membership" and refers to an individual on withdrawal status as an "ex-member." Similarly, the union bylaws state that a member who obtains a withdrawal card "shall be considered to have voluntarily withdrawn from membership in the Local Union."
> Nothing in either the bylaws or on the card informed an employee on withdrawal status of possible discipline for crossing a picket line and, in fact, the language in the bylaws and card could reasonably lead Vierck to believe that he could cross the picket line without being disciplined by the Union. Any ambiguity created in this situation is construed against the Union. Accordingly, we find that by disciplining Vierck, the Union violated Sec. 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

Accordingly, for the purposes of determining the right of a withdrawn member to cross a picket line, the Board held that a member had such a right and could not be fined or threatened with a fine, especially because "the language of the withdrawal card and the Union's bylaws . . . equated withdrawal status with resignation" and the member was "reasonably [led] to believe that he could cross the picket line without being disciplined by . . . the Union." But the instant proceeding is neither a union discipline case nor a proceeding involving a constitutional clause limiting the right of a union member to resign nor a proceeding involving a member's resignation from a union. It is a case involving Fischbach's request for a withdrawal card, not for the purpose of crossing a picket line, but to transfer at some future time to another affiliate of the International.

It should be clear by now how the Board regards a union member's right to resign. Section 7 of the Act grants an employee the right to refrain from union activity. Anything that interferes with or restricts that right is illegal, except for a lawful union-security provision. Thus, the cases cited by the General Counsel demonstrate that a labor organization may not discipline a resigned member or otherwise restrict the right to resign from membership in any way by limiting that right to certain periods of time, such as "if offered in anticipation of charges being preferred against [the member], during the pendency of any such charges or during a strike or lockout." Sheet Metal Workers Local 73 (Safe Air), 274 NLRB [illegible] (1985).

There is, however, no statutory provision which requires a labor organization to grant to a member the privilege of obtaining a withdrawal card. There is no statutory provision which requires a labor organization to charge no initiation fees to a former member who resigned from the union. The granting of a withdrawal card by Respondent permits a member to sever his or her relationship with the Respondent—to pay no dues and receive no benefits or rights as a fully paid member—and to rejoin as a full member without paying the $100 initiation fee required of other employees, but previously paid by the "withdrawn" member.

The Board held in Northern Conveyor only that the withdrawal card and Respondent's bylaws "equated withdrawal status with resignation." It did not hold that an application for a withdrawal card was the same as a resignation. Furthermore, the Board found a violation in Northern Conveyor only because the member was reasonably led to believe that his crossing of a picket line would not lead to discipline.[6] But Fischbach was subjected to no misunderstanding. He did not intend to resign. Cf. Machinists Local 758 (Menasco, Inc.), 275 NLRB 755 fn. 15 (1985), and accompanying text. He desired to obtain a withdrawal card so that he could work in Illinois and join another local of the International without paying a new initiation fee. Nominally, of course, by obtaining a withdrawal card, Fischbach would lose essentially all of his rights as a member of Respondent, but he would maintain the right of not being required to pay an initiation fee a second time.

In granting him that right, Respondent may, pursuant to the proviso in Section 8(b)(1)(A), enact rules with regard to the retention of membership under a withdrawn status. Respondent contends that it is reasonable to enact a rule not to grant a withdrawal card to one who is still working. I agree. The fundamental basis for withdrawing from a local labor organization is that the employee is no longer working within the local's jurisdiction. Otherwise, the employee can continue to work while being listed as a withdrawn member and not being liable to pay dues to the union. There may be some justification for Respondent not to permit a member to take advantage of its benevolent practice of granting withdrawal cards when the member is subject to internal union discipline. But, whether reasonable or not is not for the Board to judge. Under the Act, Congress has left to Respondent the right to adopt rules regarding the retention of membership; and as long as there has been no contention by the General Counsel, no less showing, that Section 7 rights were restrained or coerced, that should end this matter.[7]

There is, however, one other point that ought to be considered, that is, Respondent's contention that the instant proceeding is barred by Section 10(b) of the Act. I have found above that Fischbach was denied a withdrawal card on 28 January. Further, his renewal of the application for the card on 16 February was not responded to, which may be understood as yet another denial. Both those dates were more than 6 months prior to the date, 26 September, when the unfair labor practice was filed. The General Counsel argues that the denial was a continuing violation and the denial was renewed by Pangman on 4 June and reaffirmed by Kaiser on 10 June.

I have reviewed all the authorities cited by the parties and find indistinguishable Roofers Local 106 (Midwest Roofing), 202 NLRB 851 (1973), in which a union member was expelled from the union prior to the applicable 10(b) period, but applied for membership within the statutory period, and the application was denied based on the earlier and allegedly unlawful expulsion. The Board reversed the administrative law judge's finding that the charge was timely:

> We do not adopt the Administrative Law Judge's conclusion with respect to Respondent's refusal to readmit [the employee] to union membership. However illegal Respondent's initial expulsion of [the employee] from membership may have been, that occurred . . far beyond the 10(b) period. No timely charge was filed with respect thereto. The Charging Party may not nullify the effects of the 10(b) bar by thereafter reapplying for membership, and then filing a charge based on Respondent's more recent action, since this action was in essence merely a reaffirmation of Respondent's earlier, time-barred conduct. We therefore find no violation in Respondent's refusal to admit [the employee] to membership.

Fischbach has done almost the very same thing. Denied a withdrawal card in January and February, he should have filed a charge in July, or possibly August, because his dues were paid up in February. He did not and instead contacted Pangman who asked Kaiser in June why he had refused to grant Fischbach his withdrawal card in January and February. Kaiser answered with the same reasons he had previously given. Pangman's June request was merely a renewal of Fischbach's requests made earlier in the year. To paraphrase the Board's language quoted above, Kaiser merely reaffirmed Respondent's earlier, time-barred conduct, and Fischbach may not nullify the effects of the 10(b) bar by reapplying for the withdrawal card and questioning the earlier, time-barred refusals. Accordingly, even if I had found that the Union violated the Act by its conduct in January and February, Section 10(b) bars the finding of [6] No finding was made by the Board that any provision of the Union's bylaws or International's constitution was unlawful on its face. In Safe Air, decided by the Board 11 days after it decided Northern Conveyor, the Board ordered expunged constitutional provisions which restricted the right to resign. The Board did not do so in Northern Conveyor and the complaint herein does not allege that any provision of Respondent's bylaws or the International's constitution is unlawful on its face.

[7] Of course, although it may be argued that Kaiser's actions were reprehensible, the Board is not the adjudicator of Fischbach's rights under Respondent's bylaws or under the free speech provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

any violation. Teamsters Local 595 (Certified Grocers), 218 NLRB 1286 (1975).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[8]

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 25 November 1986 Administrative Law Judge Thomas E. Bracken issued the attached supplemental decision. Only the Respondent filed exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, JMC Transport, Inc. and Russell Broaddus III d/b/a R-B Rentals, a sole proprietorship, Jeffersonville, Indiana, their officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall jointly and severally take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] In finding that Russell Broaddus III d/b/a R-B Rentals is jointly and severally liable with JMC Transport, we rely on our holdings in Southeastern Envelope Co., 246 NLRB 423 (1979), and Commissary of the Great Race Pizza Shoppes, 277 NLRB 1175 (1985).

Deborah R. Grayson, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Russell Broaddus III, of Louisville, Kentucky, for the Respondents.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

THOMAS E. BRACKEN, Administrative Law Judge. On 28 September 1984, the National Labor Relations Board issued its Decision and Order in this case, concluding, inter alia, that Respondent JMC Transport, Inc. (JMC) had violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, by discharging Lemuel Marina on 5 November 1981. (272 NLRB 545.) In its decision, the Board ordered JMC, inter alia, to offer employee Lemuel Marina immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equal position, and make him whole for any loss of earnigns he may have suffered by reason of the Respondent JMC's unfair labor practices against him. On 12 November 1985, the Court of Appeals for the Sixth circuit entered its judgment granting enforcement of the Board's decision, 776 F.2d 612 including the backpay provisions of the Board's Order. Respondent JMC's request for a hearing en banc was denied and, on 8 January 1986, the court of appeals issued a mandate to enforce its judgment.

On 6 JUne 1986, the Regional Director for Region 9 issued an amended backpay specification and order rescheduling hearing, alleging that Marina was due a certain sum as backpay and also alleging the premises which resulted in the calculation of such sum. Answers were duly filed by JMC and Russell Broaddus III d/b/a R-B Rentals, a Sole Proprietorship in (R-B Rentals) denying the specifications' accuracy in various respects. Although admitting that backpay began 5 November 1981, Respondent JMC denied that it owes any backpay beyond 1 February 1982, alleging that it converted to a system of independent contractors at this time. JMC also admitted that the computations of the specification concerning average weely earnings, interim earnings, expenses, and totals are mathematically correct. JMC denied that R-B Rentals is a single employer with, and/or alter ego, and/or successor employer to JMC.

The answer filed by R-B Rentals denied each and every allegation of the specification, inlcuidng a denial that R-B Rentals is a single employer with, and/or alter ego, and/or successor employer to JMC.

A hearing was held before me on 31 July 1986 in Louisville, Kentucky. All parties appeared and were afforded full opportunity to be heard, to examine and cross-examine the witness,[1] and to present evidence.

On the entire record[2] in this case, from my observation of the witness and his demeanor, and after due consideration of the brief filed by the General counsel and the brief filed by Respondent, I make the following findings

I. THE ISSUES

The main issue to be determined in this proceeding is whether R-B Rentals is a single employer with, and/or alter ego, and/or successor employer to JMC so as to impose liability jointly on JMC and R-B Rentals for the backpay obligation incurred by JMC as a result of JMC's unfiar labor practices. Respondents contend, as previously stated, that there is no relationship between JMC and R-B Rentals, whether it be termed single employer, alter ego, or successor.

The other primary issue is whether the gross backpay period extends to the date of closure of JMC on 30 November 1985. The amended backpay specification provides that Marina be compensated as if he had worked

[1] Russell Broaddus III was called by the General Counsel as her witness, and was the sole witness to testify. Broaddus, a layman, entered his appearance at the commencement of the case, for both JMC and R-B Rentals.

[2] Broaddus filed a brief on behalf of both Respondents. Subsequently, on 19 September 1986, the General Counsel filed a motion to disregard portions of Respondents' brief, with a memorandum in support of motion to disregard portions of Respondents' brief. No opposition has been submitted to the motion. On consideration of the matter and the lack of opposition, I find the General Counsel's motion to be meritorious, and it is granted. The motion is marked as G.C. Exh. 41, and the memorandum in support thereof is marked as G.C. Exh. 42, and are received into evidence.

continuously for JMC and/or R-B Rentals from the time of his illegal discharge on 8 November 1981 throughout 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, and until 30 November 1985, when JMC went out of business. According to the backpay specification, the General Counsel asserts that the total amount of backpay due Marina from the Respondents after deduction of interim earnings is $47,516.98.

Respondent JMC further contends that in any event its liability for backpay terminated on 1 February 1982, when it converted its operation to a system of using independent contractors to haul its freight.[3] Pursuant to JMC's contention it would owe Marina $4,055.92.[4]

II. BACKGROUND[5]

In December 1978 or 1979 Broaddus first purchased a tractor and, within several months thereafter, purchased a trailer, which he leased to other parties to carry their freight. His first customers were the House of Nelson and Kentucky Liquor and Wine. Thereafter, sometime prior to June 1980 Broaddus secured another customer, Willett Distilling Company. The House of Nelson used up to two tractors and two trailers for 6 months or a year. Broaddus testified that sometime in 1980 the name R-B Rentals first came into use, to designate the business entity that Broaddus used in the renting of tractors and/or trailers. R-B Rentals was a sole proprietorship, and was owned and operated by Broaddus who was its only officer. Its only other office employee for its 5-year life was a part-time bookkeeper.

In about 1981, Broaddus hired a mechanic to perform maintenance work on his tractors and trailers. In 1984, he had from two to four mechanics who performed repairs on R-B Rentals equipment as well as on the equipment of other truck owners.

On 1 July 1980[6] JMC was incorporated to engage in the business of transporting freight and commodities under a certificate from the Interstate Commerce Commission, within the 48 States of the continental United States. Broaddus was the incorporator of JMC, its president, and a member of the board of directors. He initially contributed $5000 to $10,000 to its operating capital. Stewart Koch contributed $20,000 and John David Willett contributed a smaller amount. The stock was initially divided as follows: Broaddus 80 percent, Koch 10 percent, and Willet 10 percent. In 1982 Broaddus owned 90 percent of JMC stock and Koch owned 10 percent. For the fiscal years endings 30 June 1983 and 1984, ownership was as follows: Broaddus 66.67 percent, Koch 19.05 percent, George Hughes 9.52 percent, and DeAnna Owens 4.76 percent.

The other officers of the corporation at its inception were Kenneth Schweitzer, vice president, and Koch, secretary-treasurer. Schweitzer also served as general manager until the summer of 1981 when he was replaced by DeAnna Owens.

According to Broaddus, JMC had major customers, including General Electric, Reynolds Metals, Kroger, and many distilleries. It also had several customers that it serviced throughout its entire existence, including the distilleries.

III. FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. Single Employer

The legal principles to be applied in determining whether two separate employers constitute a single employer are well settled. The controlling criteria are: (1) interrelation of operations; (2) common management; (3) centralized control of labor relations; and (4) common ownership. Bacchus Wine Cooperative, 251 NLRB 1552 (1980); B & P Trucking, 279 NLRB 693 (1986). The Board has stressed the first three of these factors, in particular the presence of control of labor relations, because these factors tend to show operational integration. However, no one of these factors is controlling, nor need all of the "controlling criteria" be present. Single-employer status, for purpose of the Act, depends on all the circumstances of the case and is characterized as an absence of an "arm's length relationship found among unintegrated companies." Blumenfeld Theatres Circuit, 240 NLRB 206, 215 (1979), enfd. 626 F.2d 865 (9th Cir. 1980).

1. Interrelation of operations

Throughout the 5-year existence of JMC it operated out of of a leased flat, concrete building at 1719 Potter's Lane, Jeffersonville, Indiana. This building consisted of offices on the westside and a 1-1/2 bay garage on the eastside. JMC had six offices with one of these occupied by President Broaddus. The general manager occupied one office,[7] and the bookkeeper[8] occupied a third office. The dispatcher and permit clerks each occupied an office, and apparently several clericals occupied the sixth office. Its mail was received at P.O. Box 2163, listed on some of the exhibits as being in Jeffersonville, and in other exhibits as being in Clarksville, Indiana.[9]

The only office of R-B Rentals consisted of one rented room in the same building that housed JMC's offices at 1719 Potter's Lane. Broaddus testified that "the room wasn't very large" and described it as the bookkeeper's office.[10] When Broaddus was asked if there were only

[3] During the course of the hearing, the term independent contractors was seldom used to describe a class of drivers who drove for JMC. In its place, the witness and the General Counsel constantly used the term owner-operators. As the evidence will show, these drivers did not own, and were not buying, a tractor, but were in fact lessees who paid a rent to Broaddus for the tractor at so much per mile.

[4] The net backpay for the last quarter of 1981 is $2,693.13, and the net backpay for January 1982 would be one-third of the $4,088.34 shown on the specification, resulting in the amount of $4,055.92.

[5] Broaddus' testimony as to facts was often preceded by the statement "I believe." Sometimes he relied on "I don't believe." He frequently gave events took place some 6 or 7 years prior to his testimony in this case. In the main I have credited his testimony concerning events, but not his conclusionary statements.

[6] Broaddus asserted in his opening statement that the date of incorporation was about 1 June 1980. However, JMC's Small Business Corporation Tax Returns for 1982, 1983, and 1984 reports the date as 1 July 1980.

[7] Kenneth Schweitzer was the original general manager but left in April 1981. He was succeeded by DeAnna Owens, who left in 1984, at which point Broaddus assumed the duties of general manager.

[8] Ann Douglas was the original bookkeeper, followed by Wanda Hayelup, and then Mildred Kindeman at unknown intervals.

[9] Jeffersonville and Clarksville are two small towns located directly across the river from Louisville, Kentucky, and are contiguous to each other, Rand McNally Road Atlas 1985.

signs that indicated that this bookkeeper's office was an office for R-B Rentals, the owner replied that he did not think so. Broaddus originally kept its books and later they were kept by an outside bookkeeping firm. Subsequently, Norma Veron became its bookkeeper in a part-time capacity and was R-B Rentals' only office employees.

R-B Rentals' mail was also received at P.O. Box 2163, the same one used by JMC. R-B Rentals and JMC letterheads each used this box as its address. JMC also used it as its address in its 1982, 1983, and 1984 Indiana tax returns. (G.C. Exhs. 5, 6, 7.) After a mechanic was hired in 1981, and R-B Rentals commenced to repair and maintain tractors and trailers, it used as its garage the one and one-half bay in the same building that contained JMC's six offices.

a. The tractor-trailers used to haul JMC's freight

After its incorporation in July 1980, as soon as it started to operate, JMC immediately leased equipment[11] from Broaddus. The record does not show how much equipment was leased in 1980 by Broaddus to JMC or anyone else. Broaddus did provide, under subpoena, a lease dated 24 June 1981, from Russell Broaddus III to JMC that covered five tractors. However, the date of the leases did not begin on 24 June, but began on the "Commencement Date" shown on schedule A of General Counsel's Exhibit 12. The terms for the first tractor listed on this schedule, a Kenworth (7), and the second listed tractor, a Mack, began on 20 January 1981. The third tractor on the list had a term beginning 2 May 1981, with the final two tractors having a commencement date of 22 July 1981. All were for a period of 3 years.

On 3 January 1984 Broaddus apparently entered into a long-term lease with JMC for nine tractors.[12] Threee of the tractors leased under this 1984 agreement, the 1979 model Peterbilts, 9, 11, and 12, had also been leased in the 1981 lease agreement. The remaining six tractors, unit numbers 13–18 were all 1981 Peterbilts. General Counsel's Exhibit 11, a list of JMC's equipment, shows as of January 1985 that Broaddus tractors 7, 9, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, and 18 were still leased to JMC. Also leases to JMC at this time were six tractors owned by owner-operators. The record does not indicate if the periods of lease for these tractors of the owner-operators were for a trip, a month, or any other period.

In response to the General Counsel's same subpoena for copies of all lease agreements between JMC and R-B Rentals for trailers, Broaddus produced none for 1980, 1981, 1982, and for the first 10 months of 1983. He did produce a one-page "Lease Agreement" dated 1 November 1983, effective until cancellation, that was signed by Owens as JMC' representative, and by Broaddus as lessor. (G.C. Exh. 10.) This agreement covered the leasing of five 1982 Utility refrigerated trailers, and five 1983 Fruehauf dry trailers. JMC's equipment list of January 1985 shows that JMC continued to lease the same five Fruehauf trailers, and one of the refrigerated trailers. The other four reefers had been sold by Broaddus in the intervening years. The 1985 list of equipment also showed that JMC had leased 10 trailers from Evans Leasing, 5 from Koch, and 6 from Rentco. There is nothing in this record to show whether these trailers leases with Evans Leasing, Koch, and Rentco were for a trip, a month, or any other period of time.

Outside of JMC, the only customer that Broaddus rented trailers to, over a substantial period of time, was Willett Distillery. This was for the storage of goods, not the transportation of goods, as is shown by the following questions and answers:

> Q. What was—following June of 1980, in what form did you do business with Willett and House of Nelson?
> A. Willett used quite a few of my trailers for storage.
> Q. How long after 1980 did they do so?
> A. I guess several years because we had a continuing relationship with them. We hauled whiskey, full barrels of whiskey for them, empty barrels, finished product, case goods, whatever you want to call it. And they used the equipment for storage.[13]

Thus in 1984 and early 1985, JMC was the primary, if not the sole, lessee of Broaddus' tractors and trailers. Broaddus admitted that from August 1985 until JMC's closing, R-B Rentals leased equipment only to JMC.

b. The truckdrivers used by JMC to deliver its freight

In the 5 years that JMC hauled freight for customers, the drivers of the tractor-trailers were placed in the seat of those tractors through five different processes. After JMC's incorpotation in 1980, it hired drivers who then became standard, regular employees on the payroll of JMC. In response to the General Counsel's subpoena JMC was unable to produce payroll records to show the names and dates of employment of any of these initial drivers.[14] However, in 1982, JMC decided to use owner-operators to deliver its freight, although the record does not disclose who made this decision or why. Broaddus testified that he met one-on-one with JMC's drivers and explained to them how they cold become "owner-operators." He explained that they were leasing equipment from him as the owner, and that they would in turn pay him under the terms of a lease agreement, so such per mile for rental of the truck.[15]

[11] When Broaddus used the term "equipment" he was referring to tractors and trailers jointly or tractors only.

[12] G.C. Exhs. 13A thru I are one-page documents, on letterheads of JMC, and are captioned, "Appendix A, Long Term Equipment Lease." However, no such lease was offered into evidence. These nine documents are signed under the caption "JMC Transport Inc. Carrier," by DeAnna Owens, and under the caption "contractor" by Broaddus.

[13] Broaddus' answers in the above colloquy point up the interrelationship of the two entities. His statement that Willett used "quite a few of my trailers" obviously refers to his sole proprietorship, R-B Rentals. In his very next answer, when he stated "We haul whiskey," he is obviously referring to the corporation he controls, JMC.

[14] Broaddus testified that there was about 10 or 12 drivers at the time of Marina's discharge in November 1981.

[15] Two lease agreements between Broaddus and Terry Cathay were received into evidence. G.C. Exh. 21 was for a 45-day lease, with Cathay payng a rental of 10 cents per mile. The other lease agreement was for 1 year, with Cathay paying as rental 13 cents per mile.

Broaddus denied that he told these drivers how they would be paid by JMC stating that they had to deal with JMC about that. The record does not indicate who explained to these drivers how they would be paid by JMC after they became owner-operators, or if such an explanation took place. The drivers did sign lease agreements with JMC, for which they were to be compensated by receiving either 68 percent of the base gross revenue, plus 14 cents per mile, or 75 percent, depending on the type commodities they were hauling.[16] Broaddus testified that a majority of the drivers who leased his tractors and drove for JMC were former employee drivers for JMC. This system by which JMC used owner-operators to deliver JMC's freight lasted from 1 February 1982 to 8 September 1983.

Broaddus testified that JMC's experience with owner-operators was not financially successful for JMC because of the tremendous turnover among drivers.[17] General Counsel's Exhibit 18 readily illustrates this turnover. Thirty-five individual drivers' names are set forth therein as having driven nine different tractors for JMC as owner-operators during this 19-month period. Not one single tractor was driven by only one owner-operator during this period as Broaddus testified is the usual practice. Tractor 11 had eight different drivers, 16 had six, and tractors 10, 12, and 17 had five different drivers each. One driver, Terry Cathay, drove three different tractors during this period.

At this point in time, JMC adopted its third arrangement for securing drivers to deliver its freight, through the medium of leased truckdrivers from Transport Contractors Inc. (Transport). Broaddus denies that when JMC became dissatisfied with its use of owner-operators, that JMC talked to Transport about the furnishing of drivers, but testified that R-B Rentals had done so. I do not credit Broaddus' testimony regarding this issue, based on the following correspondence between Transport and JMC. By letter dated 29 August 1983, Transport wrote to Broaddus, as follows:

> Mr. Russell Broaddus III
> (President)
> J.M.C. Transport Incorporated
> 1719 Potters Lane
> Jeffersonville, IN 47130

The first sentence read as follows:

> To follow up on our conversation last Thursday and after consultation with Mr. Bill Tatter, we have agreed the drivers can be provided by our firm at 29.6 cents/mile.

The final sentence concluded:

> Thank you for your consideration and we hope to be doing business with your firm within the near future. G.C. Exh. 30A.

Attached to the letter was a typed four-page proposed agreement, the first paragraph of which read as follows:

> THIS AGREEMENT made and entered into by and between TRANSPORT CONTRACTORS, INCORPORATED, hereinafter referred to as "Lessor," and JMC TRANSPORT, INCORPORATED, hereinafter referred to as "Lessee" on this 6th day of September, 1983.

The signatory parties to the agreement were typed on page 4 as follows:

> Transport Contractors, Incorporated
> By _____
> Position President
> JMC Transport, Incorporated
> By _____

Significantly, the firm name JMC Transport was marked out on both page 1 and page 4 of the proposed agreement, and in both places was inserted in its stead "R-B Rentals." The final signature on this executed agreement was that of Russell Broaddus, stating as his position, "Owner." No contract was produced by Respondents to show that R-B Rentals was going to provide JMC with these drivers that Transport was leasing to R-B Rentals, and I draw the reasonable inference that there was none. I also do not credit Broaddus' testimony that JMC did not talk to Transport about the furnishing of drivers, based on the agreement as prepared and understood by Transport, which plainly shows that Transport understood it was dealing with JMC, when it talked to Broaddus.

From 21 September 1983 until 12 March 1984, R-B Rentals supplied drivers to JMC that had been supplied to it by Transport. I have prepared below a list of the leased that Transport provided R-B Rentals who were in turn provided to JMC.[18] I have also inserted thereon the periods for which five of these referred drivers formerly drove as owner-operators for JMC.[19] Two of these drivers, Arnold and McCoy, made the transfer of their employment status on the very day they ceased to be owner-operators. Williams had an interval of 2 days and Carter 7 days. Three of the Transport drivers, Ashly, Lloyd, and Williams drove less than 2 months, when they were placed on the extra board. Thus during this 5-month period, basically eight drivers, five of whom had previously been owner-operator drivers, delivered the freight of JMC to the same customers as they had formerly delivered to, and used the same tractors they previously drove.

[16] G.C. Exh. 23 has attached thereto apps. A and B which are equipment lease forms between terry Cathay as "contractor" and JMC as "carrier." They were signed, on behalf of JMC, by DeAnna H. Owens, vice president, on 12 March and 13 April 1982 respectively.

In March 1984 Broaddus decided that the expense to R-B Rentals for securing drivers from Transport was too great, so he terminated that agreement. He then decided "to hire drivers and lease them on as owner-operators," and place them on the R-B Rentals payroll. Broaddus did not have to launch an extensive search for drivers. Five of the seven persons who had driven R-B Rentals tractors pulling trailers loaded with JMC freight in February 1984, drove from Broaddus in the following month of March.[20] Broaddus also identified three other drivers from the same file, and all eight of these named drivers are set forth in column 1 below.

Broaddus did supply R-B Rentals payroll journal for the months of August through December 1984, so that the names of the R-B Rentals persons who drove JMC trucks for this period are known. They are set forth in column 2 below. This column shows that five of the men supplied by Transport were now driving JMC tractors as leased drivers from R-B Rentals. The column also shows the names of five other drivers who Broaddus testified also drove tractors during this period. Column 3 sets forth the drivers on R-B Rentals' payroll who drove for JMC in the period of 15 March 1985 through 9 August 1985.[21] It shows that three drivers employed by R-B Rentals in 1984, Carter, McCoy, and Nelson, also drove for it during this time period. Five additional drivers were hired by R-B Rentals during this period.

In August 1985, the employer of the drivers changed again, this time to once more become employees of JMC as they had been in 1980. Broaddus testified that R-B Rentals had a change of operation at this time. When asked what circumstances led to this change of operations, he replied, "I laid off a bookkeeper and since I had no bookkeeper, I decided to let JMC take over the drivers." Column 4 below shows that all seven of the drivers employed by R-B Rentals in the previous 5 months were now on the JMC payroll driving the same equipment as they previously drove. It is also to be noted that Kenneth McMichael was placed on JMC's payroll at this time. McMichael had an extensive employment record with R-B Rentals as its mechanic.

JMC and delivered its freight throughout JMC's 5-1/2-year existence. Nine of the 10 to 12 JMC employee drivers of 1980, leased R-B Rentals trucks as alleged owner-operators in 1982–1983. Five of the six JMC owner-operators became employees of Transport in 1983–1984, who referred them to R-B Rentals, who in turn provided them to JMC as drivers. From March 1984 to August 1985, six of the eight former Transport drivers continued to drive from R-B Rentals after it severed its agreement with Transport, and in the last 4 months of its existence JMC retained and employed all the drivers who had just previously been on the payroll of R-B Rentals. That the men who drove its trucks were of the utmost importance, indispensable to JMC, need not be argued, for without these drivers, JMC could not carry out its basic mission, to deliver freight for its customers.

The record is crystal clear that there was an interrelation of operations between JMC and R-B Rentals. Both entities used the same office building and the same business address. Although JMC's business was the transportation of miscellaneous freight over long distances, it started in business, and ended in business, without ever owning a single tractor or trailer. Nor did it need to own any equipment. R-B Rentals garage and parking lot were immediately adjacent to JMC's office and dispatcher, and its tractors and trailers were at the instant call of JMC. R-B Rentals furnished almost exclusively the tractors and trailers that JMC used to haul its freight, and supplied the leased drivers except for the first and last year when JMC employed its own employee drivers. JMC and R-B Rentals operated in tandem, with each dependent on the other for its survival.

2. Common management

Broaddus started JMC as its president, chief financier, chairman of the board of directors, and its driving force in its short-range and long-range management. Although JMC had a position titled general manager, this general manager reported to Broaddus at least once a day, on any subject that was pertinent to the running of the business. Such subjects included personnel, safety, and equipment.

Broaddus and the general manager had the power to hire and fire. However, before the general manager could hire an employee, he would discuss with the president whether a new employee was needed. If the discharge of an employee involved a difficult decision, Broaddus also would be consulted prior to the final decision.[22]

The general manager supervised the office staff, which consisted of the permit clerk, bookkeeper, and secretary, but did not supervise the larger part of its staff, the truckdrivers. Schweitzer was the general manager from 1 July 1980 to about September 1981, when he was replaced by DeAnne Owens, the bookkeeper. Owens served as general manager until February 1984, when she also left the employ of the Company. Broaddus testified he then took over the duties of the general manager, and served as such until JMC ceased doing business.

Outside of Broaddus' dominating management of JMC and R-B Rentals, the major link of common management was the dispatcher. The dispatcher was an employee of JMC, but he supervised all truckdrivers, whether they were employees of JMC, Transport, R-B Rentals, owner-operators. As Broaddus testified the dispatcher was considered as part of management and had the authority to take a driver of a truck when out on the road, and replace him with a relief driver. His duties consisted of dispatching the drivers to deliver their loads, directing them to pick up freight, securing loads for drivers when they were back hauling, and sending advances to drivers when they were out on the road. Every driver when out on the road had to call in to the dispatcher every day between 8 and 10 a.m., as well as when he was unloaded, or had an equipment failure.

Dispatchers came and went at varying intervals of time. Kenneth Schweitzer first handled the duties of a dispatcher, and was replaced by DeAnna Owens. After Owens came Thomas Denman, Tom Hayes, "Betty," and George Epperson. Epperson served as the dispatcher until the termination of JMC's business.

As the sole management official, and sole full-time office employee of R-B Rentals, Broaddus clearly directed and managed the entire operation of this sole proprietorship. As president of JMC, Broaddus made the bid decisions as to where to secure its equipment, the type tractors and trailers to use, as well as from what source it would secure drivers for its equipment.

It was Broaddus who decided that JMC, in its initial operations, would hire its own employees to drive the tractor-trailers that delivered its freight. It was Broaddus who decided in February 1982 that JMC would use owner-operators to haul its freight. When JMC decided to secure drivers from Transport, it was Broaddus who discussed the details of the agreement with the general operations manager of Transport. It was also Broaddus who decided to sever his contract with Transport and to put drivers on the payroll of R-B Rentals. Finally, it was Broaddus who made the decision, in August 1985, to take the drivers off the R-B Rentals payroll and let them once again be employees of JMC, and be carried on its payroll.

Broaddus' activities, as well as those of the dispatchers and general managers, ensured that there was an effective common management of two companies, and I so find.

3. Centralized control of labor relations

The record is also clear and consistent that Broaddus controlled the labor relations at JMC by his overseeing of its operations and personnel, and by his direct involvement in personnel decisions. As previously stated, Broaddus was consulted by the general manager before a new employee would be hired, and he made the decision to discharge Marina.

The day-to-day supervision of the drivers remained the same whether they were carried on JMC's payroll, R-B Rentals' payroll, or Transport's payroll, or were called owner-operators. The JMC dispatcher had identical authority to send the drivers out to deliver freight to whatever consignee or destination the dispatcher chose. Likewise he had the authority to order them to pick up freight when returning to the terminal instead of deadheading back. The same company policy pamphlet that had been issued in 1981 as work rules to company employees, was issued to each succeeding driver, no matter what payroll he was on,[23] and he was bound by these rules. Also, each driver who hauled JMC's freight, no matter on whose payroll, received a copy of the Interstate Truck Drivers handbooks with its many work regulations, and was told its contents were a part of company policy.

As the sole owner and manager of R-B Rentals, with only one part-time office employee, it is evident that Broaddus controlled the labor relations of R-B Rentals. However, R-B Rentals had very few employees to be covered by its labor relations policies. The truckdrivers it supplied to JMC, whether as owner-operators or leased employees, were under the direct supervision of JMC's dispatcher and bound by the rules and regulations contained in JMC's manual and its interstate handbook. Outside of its part-time bookkeeper, the only other employees it had, were mechanics. For most of its existence, R-B REntals only had one mechanic, with the exception being in 1984 when it had four mechanics.

I find that the evidence is overwhelming that there was centralized control in the labor relations of JMC and R-B Rentals.

4. Common ownership

The evidence is clear that there was substantial common ownership of JMC and R-B Rentals by Broaddus. Broaddus was the incorporator of JMC and its dominant stockholder during the 5 years of its existence. As an indicia of his control no check could be issued without his signature. Although over the life of the corporation he drew only $3000 in salary, his individual tax return for 1983 shows that he received $34,186.40 in interest income from JMC. This interest was earned on money loaned by Broaddus to JMC.[24]

However, JMC was obviously not in sound financial condition as early as 1983, when Broaddus came personally to its aid. Broaddus pledged his house as security for a loan, and in return the Liberty National Bank granted JMC a loan in the amount of $121,000 payable on demand. Broaddus also personally pledged $20,000 to the Westfield Company, a bonding company, so that it would be guaranteed payment of up to $20,000 for advances made to drivers while they were out on the road. There is nothing in the record to indicate that any of the minority stockholders made any personal contributions to JMC's survival, and I infer there were none.

The ownership of R-B Rentals is uncontradicted, as Broaddus was its sole owner. As to the signing of checks, the same policy was followed as that at JMC, with Broaddus being the only person authorized to sign checks on behalf of R-B Rentals. The record does not indicate what compensation Broaddus was to receive, whether on a weekly or yearly basis, from his leasing of tractors and trailers to JMC or anyone else. His 1983 individual tax return reports that he received $152,056 in rent income for that calendar year. The same tax returns for 1984 and 1985 do not show any rental income but do show that Broaddus used depreciation of the assets of R-B Rentals to lower his individual tax liability. (G.C. Exhs. 16 and 17).

From the above it is evident that substantial common ownership resided in Broaddus as the majority owner of JMC and the sole owner of R-B Rentals.

It is readily evident that there was an absence of an arm's-length relationship between JMC and R-B Rentals. The two companies had adjacent offices with no distinguishing sign to let the public know that there were two different companies. They used the same post office box and address. They transferred drivers backs and forth from JMC's payroll to R-B Rentals' payroll at the command of Broaddus. Broaddus leased his tractors and trailers to JMC, signing the leases as owner of R-B Rentals, while the person he dealt with for JMC, Owens, was an employee hired by Broaddus, and subsequently discharged by him. When Broaddus dealt with the general managers or dispatchers of JMC it is obvious that they, as employees, were not able to deal with him as equal bargainers.

Under all the facts and circumstances of this case, I find therefore that because there was a closely knit interrelation of operations between JMC and R-B Rentals, that there was common management, a centralized control of labor relations, and common ownership, that JMC and R-B Rentals constitute a single employer within the meaning of the Act. Carson Cable TV, 275 NLRB No. 201 (Aug. 20, 1985) (unpublished), enfd. 795 F.2d 879 (9th Cir. 1986); Soule Glass & Glazing Co., 246 NLRB 792 (1979), enfd. in relevant part 652 F.2d 1055 (1st Cir. 1981); Midlands Express, 236 NLRB 619 (1978). I further find that R-B Rentals is jointly and severally liable with JMC for the unfair labor practice of JMC. Since R-B Rentals constitutes a single employer with JMC, R-B Rentals was properly named in the backpay specification even though it was not named in the underlying procedure. NLRB v. Deena Artware, 361 U.S. 398, 402 (1960).

B. Alter Ego

In determining whether R-B Rentals is the alter ego of JMC as contended by the General Counsel, a number of factors must be considered, although no one of which, taken alone, is determinative. Crawford Door Sales Co., 226 NLRB 1144 (1976); Alpine Construction Corp., 276 NLRB 415 (1985). These factors include: common management and ownership, common business purpose, nature of operation, supervision, common premises and equipment, and common customers.

[23] On 3 September 1981 JMC issued to each of its employee drivers a 3-page single-spaced document on JMC stationery that was captioned "Company Policy, Instructions to Drivers." This document contained 33 rules that the drivers had to abide by in order to drive for JMC. G.C. Exh. 14.

[24] The record does not disclose the basis for Broaddus' receipt of the $34,186.40. He did testify that he contributed $400,000 to $500,000 to JMC over the life of the Company. The record does not indicate if he received interest on this contribution or if he was ever repaid in part or in full.

As set forth in sections III,A,2 and III,A,4 above, the first two factors of common management and ownership clearly exist, and need not be reviewed here.

However, I do not find the third factor, common business purpose, to be present in this case. JMC's business purpose was to pick up goods and commodities of customers with its trucks and deliver that freight to consignees throughout the 48 States as a common carrier. R-B Rentals' purpose was to lease its tractors and/or trailers to customers, and to maintain and repair this equipment so as to be in good operating condition for leasing.

The next factor, nature of operation, is a troublesome one. It is true that the operation of the two companies was coordinated, but I do not find that this sufficiently bridges the different natures of their respective businesses. JMC was an interstate common carrier of miscellaneous freight operating under the authority of the ICC. R-B Rentals was an owner of tractors and trailers any one of which could be leased by any carrier, company, or individual who wanted to lease such equipment. I therefore do not find that the nature of operations of the two companies was the same.

However, I do find that there was common supervision at the two companies as set forth in detail in sections III,A,2, and III,A,3 above. The overriding domination of Broaddus for both R-B Rentals and JMC was present on a daily basis. In addition, the dispatcher of JMC supervised the drivers furnished by R-B Rentals with the same degree of power and authority as he exercised over clearly JMC employees.

I also find that common premises and equipment were used by the two companies. JMC and R-B Rentals used the same building for their adjacent offices. R-B Rentals used the garage bays situated in the same building as JMC's offices to perform repairs and maintenance on its tractors and trailers. The equipment used by JMC for the great majority of the 5-1/2 years of its existence came almost solely from R-B Rentals.

Concerning the last factor, common customers, I do not find that the General Counsel has produced sufficient evidence to meet her burden of proof. Broaddus testified that JMC had 16 major customers.[25] However, the record only discloses two customers who were served by both JMC and R-B Rentals, and they were Willett Distributing Company and the House of Nelson. I therefore do not find that JMC and R-B Rentals shared common customers.

Inasmuch as there was no common business purpose between JMC and R-B Rentals, the nature of operations was different, and the customers were vastly different, I do not find that there were sufficient common factors between JMC and R-B Rentals that would require that R-B Rentals be considered an alter ego of JMC. I conclude therefore that R-B Rentals was not an alter ego of JMC.

C. Successorship

The General Counsel also contends in her brief that R-B Rentals should be held jointly liable with JMC on the basis that it is a successor to JMC. The General Counsel's opening explanatory words concerning this theory are as follows:

> The Board has held that one who acquires and operates the business of any employer found guilty of unfair labor practices in basically unchanged form under circumstances which charge him with notice of unfair practice charges against his predecessor should be held responsible for remedying his predecessor's unlawful conduct.

The brief then goes on to cite the case of Perma Vinyl Corp., 164 NLRB 968 (1967), enfd. sub nom. United States Pipe & Foundry Co. v. NLRB, 398 F.2d 554 (5th Cir. 1986). I agree with the General Counsel's legal theory but find it inapposite to this case. In the case cited above, U.S. Pipe did purchase Perma Vinyl's facilities and business. The General Counsel does not allege that R-B Rentals purchased JMC, nor could she, but vaguely contends that R-B Rentals "acquired"[26] JMC. I do not find that R-B Rentals acquired JMC in any manner, at anytime. The General Counsel apparently contends that R-B Rentals acquired a portion of JMC's business in October 1983, when R-B Rentals provided JMC with six drivers who had formerly driven for JMC as owner-operators, and also provided the tractor-trailers for them to drive. The General Counsel goes on to elucidate this theory as follows:

> Thus, R-B Rentals was a successor to that portion of the JMC business which had employed company drivers and had utilized the equipment of Russell Broaddus until August 1985 when the drivers were again placed on the JMC payroll.

In support of this proposition the General Counsel cites two cases, the first being Fab Steel Co., 231 NLRB 372, 378 (1977), enfd. 587 F.2d 689, 695 (5th Cir. 1979). However, in that case Fab Steel, the successor, was a clearcut purchaser of one of the seven plants of the seller, Mosher Steel Company, including the purchase of the plant's machinery, equipment, and inventory. The second case cited, Saks Fifth Avenue, 247 NLRB 1047 (1980), enfd. in relevant part 634 F.2d 681 (2d Cir. 1980), is also inapposite. That case involved a unit of employees employed by Gimbels to perform alterations on women's clothing owned by Saks. At this worksite they were represented by a union. The work was done for Saks in Gimbels' building pursuant to a subcontract with Gimbels. Saks subsequently secured its own building and terminated its alteration contract with Gimbels. Gimbels then discharged all 18 employees, and Saks hired 16 of the 18 employees and set up its own alteration department in its own building. When the former bargaining agent requested Saks to bargain, Saks refused to do so. The Board found that Saks was a successor employer

[26] According to Black's Law Dictionary, 5th Edition, the meaning of acquire is: "To gain by any means, usually by one's own exertions; to get as one's own; to obtain by search, endeavor, investment, practice, or purchase; receive or gain in whatever manner; come to have. In law of contracts and descents, to become owner of property; to make property one's own."

and therefore must recognize and bargain with the Union.

It is obvious in the instant case that R-B Rentals in no way compares with Saks, or JMC with Gimbels. When Saks commenced performing alterations in its new building with its own employees, Gimbels was completely divorced from any relationship with Saks. But when R-B Rentals provided six drivers in October 1983, JMC in no way disappeared from the scene, or altered its operation in any manner, but continued to pick up and deliver freight for its customers exactly as it had from its inception in 1980.

In Saks the Board stated: "the Board has held that in determining successorship, the keystone is whether there is substantial continuity of the employing industry."

Clearly, there was no continuity of the work formerly done by JMC, by R-B Rentals after R-B Rentals supplied the six drivers in 1983. JMC's general manager and its six office employees continued to perform their office duties in behalf of JMC's role as a common carrier in the trucking industry, without any control by R-B Rentals. The dispatcher continued to dispatch the drivers to pick up and deliver freight all in the name of JMC not R-B Rentals. Broaddus continued to solicit business for JMC and remained in overall control of its operation.

I find and conclude that R-B Rentals had never taken over the control of JMC's business, that it was not a successor of JMC and that it is not under the successor theory, responsible for remedying JMC's unlawful discharge of Marina. Premium Foods, 260 NLRB 708 (1982); Contract Carrier, 258 NLRB 353 (1981).

D. Gross Backpay Period

An administrative law judge considering conflicting backpay formula arguments must determine the most accurate method of determining backpay amounts. East Wind Enterprises, 268 NLRB 655 (1984); J. S. Alberici Construction Co., 249 NLRB 751 (1980). Coupled with this obligation, however, is the longstanding and fundamental principle that uncertainties will be assessed against the wrongdoer. NLRB v. Miami Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 360 F.2d 569 (5th Cir. 1966). The General Counsel contends that the backpay period terminated on 30 November 1985, the date JMC ceased doing business.

Respondent JMC in its answer agrees that the backpay period began 5 November 1981, the date of Marina's discharge, but insists that it ended 1 February 1982, the date JMC converted to a system of independent contractor drivers. It is true that in February 1982, JMC did change its method of providing drivers for the tractors it leased, by switching from employee drivers to a modified type of owner-operators, a procedure JMC used for the next 19 months. But this was only the second of five procedures used by JMC to provide drivers for its tractors. It in turn was followed by two different methods of using leased drivers, with the fifth and final procedure being a return to the original 1980 procedure of JMC, having its own employees drive the tractor-trailers.

Assuming arguendo that the so-called owner-operators were independent contractors excluded from protection under the act, Respondents are still liable for backpay, under the holding of the Supreme Court in Golden State Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 414 U.S. 168 (1973). In Golden State the respondent contended that the discriminatee, a discharged driver salesman, was not entitled to any backpay from the time it converted its delivery system from driver-salesman to distributors, who were independent contractors. The Supreme Court noted with approval that the court of appeals[27] had rejected this contention as follows:

> However, it is undisputed that when Baker was discriminatorily discharged he was an ordinary employee. The Act's remedies are not thwarted by the fact that an employee who is within the Act's protection when the discrimination occurs would have been promoted or transferred to a position not covered by the Act if he had not been discriminated against. NLRB v. Bell Aircraft Corp., 206 F.2d 235 (2d Cir. 1953).

Marina's status with JMC is clearly analogous with that of the driver-salesman in Golden State. In February 1982, when JMC commenced using owner-operators, all but one of these had been JMC employee drivers. JMC presented no objective evidence that would show that Marina would not have been offered the same opportunity to lease a tractor as these former JMC employee drivers.

Admittedly, it is ambiguous whether Marina, absent his unlawful discharge, would have continued to drive for JMC and R-B Rentals. But other drivers, similarly situated, did continue to drive for JMC until its closing.[28] Driver Joe McCoy, originally a driver employee of JMC, continued to drive JMC's tractors for the next 5 years until JMC ceased doing business. Willie Carter, first employed as an owner driver in March 1983, also continued to drive the tractors used by JMC until the date JMC closed its doors.

Respondent has failed to establish its affirmative defense that it would not have employed Marina but for his unlaful discharge. That Marina was a competent over-the-road driver is reflected in the two previous trips JMC had assigned to him, just prior to his discharge. Both trips were obviously very long hauls, from Kentucky to California and back, and were made successfully by Marina.

I find that because other similarly situated drivers were retained to operate the tractors used by JMC to pull its trailers throughout the backpay period, the ambiguity of whether Marina would have also been retained must be construed in his favor. Boilermakers Local 27 (Daniel Construction), 271 NLRB 1038 1984); Kansas Refined Helium Co., 252 NLRB 1156, 1157 (1980).

In light of the foregoing findings and conclusions, and on the entire record considered as a whole, I make the following recommended[29]

[28] Cathay, his driving partner, was signed to two leases by R-B Rentals, the last one being for a period of 1 year.

[29] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

ORDER

The Respondent, JMC Transport, Inc., its successors or assigns, and Russell Broaddus III, d/b/a R-B Rentals, a sole proprietorship, shall jointly and severally, pay to Lemuel Marina $47,516.98, plus interest to be computed in the manner set forth in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977), and Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980),[30] with appropriate deductions for taxes required to be withheld under Federal and state laws.

Bentley-Jost Electric Corporation and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 494, AFL–CIO. Case 30–CA–9266

6 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 12 January 1987 Administrative Law Judge Robert W. Leiner issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions, supporting brief, and answering brief, and the General Counsel filed cross-exceptions, supporting brief, and answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.[1]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Bentley-Jost Electric Corporation, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] We deny as unnecessary the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial provision in our Order.

Paul Bosanac, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Russ R. Mueller, Esq., of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for the Respondent.
Neal F. Rosenberg, Business Manager, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for the Union.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

ROBERT W. LEINER, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on 13 November 1986, on the General Counsel's 15 August 1986 complaint,[1] alleging in substance that following the Union's request for information regarding the relationship of Respondent Bentley-Jost Electric Corporation to another employer, Respondent, in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), failed and refused to fully respond to the Union's request. In response to the General Counsel's complaint, Respondent filed a timely answer, dated 20 August 1986, in which it admitted certain allegations, denied others, and denied the commission of any unfair labor practices.

At the hearing, all parties were represented by counsel, were given full opportunity to call and examine witnesses, submit oral and written evidence, and to argue orally on the record. At the close of the hearing, the parties waived final argument and elected to file posthearing briefs which have been carefully considered.

On the entire record, including the briefs, and taking into account the uncontradicted and credited testimony of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. RESPONDENT AS STATUTORY EMPLOYER

As a result of stipulations and concessions at the opening of the hearing, there is no dispute that Bentley-Jost Electric Corporation, a Wisconsin corporation with an office and place of business in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, is an electrical contractor in the building and construction industry. It is a member of the National Electrical Contractors Association-Milwaukee Chapter, N.E.C.A., Inc. (NECA or Association), an association of employers in the building and construction industry existing for the purpose, inter alia, of representing employer-members in negotiating and administering collective-bargaining agreements with the Union. It is admitted that in the past calendar year, a representative period of its business operations, Respondent received goods, products, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from other enterprises in Wisconsin which enterprises received the goods, products, and materials directly from points outside the State of Wisconsin. Respondent admits and I find that, at all material times, on the basis of the above "indirect inflow" of goods and materials, it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE UNION AS STATUTORY LABOR ORGANIZATION

Respondent admits and I find that at all times International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 494, AFL–CIO (the Union), had been, and is, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.[2]

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Respondent for 20 years has been and is an industrial and commercial electrical contractor, performing either as prime or subcontractor, in four counties in and around the Milwaukee, Wisconsin area. As noted, Respondent is a member of NECA whose Milwaukee Chapter has 87 employers, and normally employs between 10 and 15 full-time employees including supervisors. The Union, in bargaining NECA, represents about 1000 electrical employees in the four-county area in and around Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

[1] The Union's underlying unfair labor practice charge was filed and served on Respondent on 1 July 1986.

[2] Respondent also admits that Louis J. Jost Jr., at all material times, has been, and is, Respondent's president and a supervisor within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act and an agent of Respondent within the meaning of Sec. 2(13) of the Act. Jost is Respondent's chief operating and executive officer.

At the hearing, Respondent conceded that, at all material times, it had been a signatory to and bound by successive collective-bargaining agreements between NECA and the Union, the latest of which is for the period 1 June 1985 to 31 May 1988 (G.C. Exh. 2). Respondent also admitted that the Union is the statutory collective-bargaining representative for employees covered in the contract unit, admittedly an appropriate unit,[3] and asserted that the only issue in the case was the substantive issue, presented hereafter, relating to the lawfulness of its failure and refusal to give certain information to the Union.

The General Counsel presented three witnesses (including Louis J. Jost Jr., Respondent's president). Respondent chose to rest on the evidentiary record as presented by the General Counsel and to rely on the legal defenses propounded by Respondent in its pleadings, again at the hearing, and further specified in its timely brief. I find that the evidence raises no material issues of fact, that the witnesses testified credibly, and that the case presents only a legal issue.

Donald L. Statza, a Local 494 business representative, whose duties include the enforcement of the Union's collective-bargaining agreements, first heard of the existence of Specialty Trades, Inc. in 1985 and learned that it was in the electrical contracting business in the Milwaukee area. Specialty Trades, Inc. is not a signatory to any collective-bargaining agreement with the Union and, in particular, is not a signatory to the Association agreement which binds Respondent.

Respondent's president, Jost, admitted that he had heard of Specialty Trades, Inc., but declared that there was no corporate connection between Respondent and Specialty Trades, Inc. He testified that he knew that Specialty Trades, Inc. was located in and worked out of a house owned by one Charles Schmitt on 53d Street in Milwaukee; that it was a nonunion operation engaged in the business of plumbing, heating, and electrical contracting, with the electrical work being of the same type as performed by Respondent. Jost also admitted that another location for Specialty Trades, Inc. is an answering service called Jost Management Services, Inc., which is located in Respondent's office (Tr. 43); and that although Specialty Trades, Inc. had been in operation for about 2 years and performs the same type of electrical work as Respondent (Tr. 44), it is not in competition with Respondent according to his "memory" (Tr. 52).

Jost further testified that he has a son Brian Jost and a brother Robert Jost; that Respondent's office clerical, Phyllis Sommers, had been Respondent's clerical for 6 to 8 years until a 1985 merger of six employing companies (all controlled by or involving members of the Jost family) which merger resulted in the creation of Jost Management Services Inc. Sommers is the office clerical for the merged company.

[3] Sec. 2.05 of the current collective agreement, inter alia, provides: "The . . . transfer by an individual employer of any work . . . to any person . . . not recognizing the IBEW or one of its Local Unions . . . will be deemed a material breach of Agreement." (G.C. Exh. 2.)

In addition, Jost testified that David Nowicki, a former electrical inspector for the city of Greenfield, Wisconsin, is a supervisory electrican who acquires construction permits for Specialty Trades, Inc.; and that Specialty Trades does not pay Nowicki a salary but remunerates him in the form of occasional gratuities, otherwise unspecified in the record.

Sometime in November 1985, Union Representative Statza, reading a local newspaper ("Daily Reporter") that carries reports of the granting of electrical permits in municipalities in and around Milwaukee, discovered that Specialty Trades, Inc. had been issued a construction permit in the nearby community of Wauwatosa, Wisconsin. He obtained a copy of the permit (G.C. Exh. 14), found that David Nowicki was the supervisory electrician who obtained the permit for Specialty Trades, and that the permit showed a telephone number, presumptively the telephone number of Specialty Trades. When union agent Statza dialed the number, he discovered that it was a telephone answering service. The telephone answering service notified him that Specialty Trades had both canceled the answering service and directed the answering service to refer any problem to Bentley-Jost.

Thereafter, in April 1986, when Union Agent Statza continued his investigation and discovered a Specialty Trades permit application in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, there was a different telephone number thereon (G.C. Exh. 15). He called that phone number, and a woman answered the phone on behalf of "S.T.I." When Statza asked for Schmitt, the woman said that she would get him, but Statza did not continue the conversation. Statza thereafter sought to discover from a Bentley-Jost employee the situs of that telephone number (645–6988) and was told that the phone bearing that number was in Respondent's office.

In further search for the identity of Specialty Trades, Inc., Statza found that a Wauwatosa application for an electric contractor license (G.C. Exh. 7) was filed in behalf of Specialty Trades, Inc. and signed by Louis J. Jost Jr., as "Treas." [sic] of Specialty Trades, Inc. Jost admitted that the signature was his. Jost, as above noted, is president of Respondent.

Statza's continuing investigation disclosed an electrical permit for a job submitted by Louis Jost, on behalf of Bentley-Jost, to perform contracting work at a bank (Mitchell Savings and Loan) in Greenfield, Wisconsin (G.C. Exh. 8). Statza sought and obtained the permit after he visited the bank jobsite in order to discover who was actually doing the electrical work. He discovered on the job a box containing light fixtures with the name "Specialty Trades" marked on the box. When Statza visited the job again, he found Charles Schmitt on the job. Schmitt said that he was "Specialty Trades" and that Specialty Trades had the job. The permit, as above noted, was issued to Bentley-Jost. He said that his brother and another worker were the only workers on the job.

Statza also found that Specialty Trades, Inc. had filed an application for an electrical license in Milwaukee sometime after August 1985 with Brian Jost being the secretary of the applicant (G.C. Exh. 12). He also discovered that Phyllis Sommers, Respondent's office clerical, was notarizing permit applications for electrical contract work for both Specialty Trades, Inc. and Respondent (G.C. Exhs. 7, 12, and 13).

In light of this information, Statza sent for the State of Wisconsin articles of incorporation of both Specialty Trades, Inc. and Bentley-Jost (G.C. Exhs. 9, 10, and 11). The documents disclose no apparent relation between the two corporations.

On the morning of 28 April 1986, Statza and another union agent traveled by car to Schmitt's Speciality Trades' 53d Street address in Milwaukee. They observed a man leave the house, drive to Wauwatosa, and stop at a jobsite where a pizza parlor was being remodeled. At the jobsite, they took pictures of persons on the jobsite (G.C. Exhs. 17, 18, and 19). Present on the jobsite that morning were Respondent's president, Louis Jost, and his brother, Jim Jost.

On 19 May 1986, Union Business Manager Neal F. Rosenberg wrote to Respondent the following letter (G.C. Exh. 3), attached to which was a questionnaire of 44 questions concerning Respondent's and Specialty Trades' business, suppliers, officers, directors, and employees:

> It has come to our attention that your company is, or may be, in violation of its collective bargaining agreement with this union, by reason of the operations by your company or its principals, of another company called Specialty Trades Inc. hereafter referred to as Company B, or by the performance of work which would otherwise be performed by your company. Specifically, we believe that there is or may be violation of Article II, Sections 2.01 and 2.05; Article IV, Section 4.02; Article VI, Wages; Article VIII, Sections 8.01 and 8.02; Article IX; Article X; Article XI, Sections 11.01 and 11.06 of the Milwaukee Division Inside Wireman Agreement and possible other articles.

> Company B is presently performing the same services that were previously performed by your company with your employees. In addition, we believe that there is a connection between your company and Company B either financially or through management personnel, or both, and we believe that the object of creating Company B was to circumvent the provisions of our collective bargaining agreement.

By letter of 29 July 1986 (G.C. Exh. 4), and an accompanying answer sheet, Respondent's attorney Mueller answered the Union.[4] In particular, in the answer sheet, Respondent denied that Bentley-Jost performed any work on Specialty Trades, Inc.'s products or jobs or that Specialty Trades, Inc. performed any work on Bentley-Jost's jobs. It provided three other pieces of information with regard to Specialty Trades: it named Specialty Trades' supervisor as Charles Schmidt [sic]; it denied that any of its supervisors performed work for Specialty Trades or that any of Specialty Trades supervisors performed work for it; and finally, it denied that any of its managerial personnel were ever employed by Specialty Trades or that any of Specialty Trades' managerial personnel were ever employed by Respondent. With regard to the three dozen other questions put by the Union to Respondent, Respondent noted, for example, that it performed estimating work for Specialty Trades, Inc. (question 22); but on other questions such as (question 33) the identity by job titles or craft positions of the number of employees employed by Specialty Trades, the persons who bid for Specialty Trades (question 28), Specialty Trades Sources of credit (question 11), bank (question 4), accountant (question 6), and where it kept its books and records (question 5), Respondent failed to answer.

On 6 August 1986, the Union replied:

> Your letter of 29 July 1986 is clearly an inadequate response to the questions which we had previously sent to you requesting information necessary to carry out our duty as the collective-bargaining representative. It is clear you are merely continuing your violation of the National Labor Relations Act.

In response to this union accusation, Attorney Mueller, on 11 August 1986 wrote:

[4] The covering letter to Attorney Muller's response is:

Dear Mr. Rosenberg:

Enclosed herewith is a separate document on which information is given on behalf of Bentley-Jost Electric Corp. to the Questionnaire, which you submitted with your May 19, 1986 letter to the Company, in connection with the grievance stated in that letter.

Your Questionnaire asks questions regarding "Company B" and your letter of May 19, 1986, identifies this as "Specialty Trades, Inc.". The information given on the enclosed regarding Specialty Trades, Inc. is based on information and belief and is indicated by "[Company B]". Any information not given for Specialty Trades, Inc., is because such is considered of a confidential nature to that separate corporation and the information is independent from that which relates to the operations of Bentley-Jost Electric Corp. In other words, the information that is given concerning Specialty Trades, Inc. is based on direct business dealings.

You may wish to contact Mr. Richard Jacklin, 5401 Chateau Drive, #1 Rolling Meadows, Illinois, President, Specialty Trades, Inc., relative to the requested information that is not provided by the enclosed.

Unless I hear from you soon to the contrary, this reply will be considered as having fulfilled your request for information with regard to the stated grievance.

Very truly yours,
Russ R. Mueller

This is in reply to your 6 August 1986 letter relative to the Company's attempt to satisfy the Union's request form information in connection with the grievance identified in your letter of 19 May 1986.

Your reply to the information submitted to you by my letter of 29 July 1986, "is clearly an inadequate response" cannot be further considered unless you explain why you consider that to be so.

Very truly yours,

R. Mueller

By 1 July 1986, the Union had filed the instant unfair labor practice charge.

A. Positions of the Parties

In short, the General Counsel and the Union take the position that the record here discloses that the Union had gathered sufficient evidence to provide it with an objective basis for believing that Respondent, in violation of contract prohibitions, was diverting unit work and that such evidence provided the necessary legal "trigger," linking its request for information to Respondent's relationship to work performed by nonunit employees. Pence Construction Corp., 281 NLRB 322 (1986); Davis Acoustical Co., 280 NLRB 1432 (1986); Walter N. Yoder & Sons v. NLRB, 754 F.2d 531 (4th Cir. 1985).

Respondent, apparently not abandoning its 29 July written defense of the "confidential nature" of the information it possessed regarding Specialty Trades, also defends on the proposition that the obligation to furnish information in these cases is a product of the collective-bargaining process. As such, Respondent argues that whatever the knowledge acquired by the Union with regard to the operations of Specialty Trades, Inc., such knowledge remains irrelevant because the Union, in support of its grievance, never notified Respondent of the facts supporting the Union's conclusion that Respondent was violating the collective-bargaining agreement. On this basis, Respondent concludes that the General Counsel has failed to prove the "triggering" mechanism: to make relevant the requested information to some necessity that such information be given to the Union. Respondent further contends that its letter of 29 July 1986 to the Union, answering some of the Union's questions, was both a product of the collective-bargaining process and a demonstration of Respondent's good faith in answering the Union's questions. The secondary defense is that, in any event, Respondent satisfactorily answered the Union's request form information based on any obligation created by the preliminary information supplied by the Union; and that any statutory obligation for Respondent to further reply must be based on further union information to trigger Respondent's further duty to supply other information.

Nothing in the record, including Respondent's correspondence and argument, indicated that Respondent did not possess the requested information or construed the Union's 44-question questionnaire as a demand for irrelevant material. Indeed Respondent not only answered some of the questions put to it by the Union but initially defended its failure to further answer questions principally on the ground that the information was "confidential."

With regard to an employer's obligation to furnish information to the employees' collective-bargaining agent, concerning the alleged diversion of unit work in violation of a collective-bargaining agreement in cases when, as here, it is alleged that the nonunion (employer) recipient of the transferred work is in some way related to the transferring employer, the Board's rules may be found in cases such as Pence Construction Corp., supra; Davis Acoustical Co., supra; Washington Materials v. NLRB, 803 F.2d 1333 (4th Cir. 1986); NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432 (1967); and Associated General Contractors of California, 242 NLRB 891 (1979), enfd. 633 F.2d 766 (9th Cir. 1980). These rules establish an employer's obligation to furnish the Union the requested information if there is a probability that such information is relevant and will be of use to the union in fulfilling its statutory duties and responsibility as the employees' exclusive bargaining representative. The Union's informed administration of the contract, including protection and preservation of unit work (a mandatory subject of bargaining), as here, is such a statutory duty in addition to any contract prohibitions against transfer of unit work. Cf. Southern Nevada Builders Assn., 274 NLRB 350 (1985).

The Board, in determining relevancy of the requested information, uses a liberal discovery-type standard. Information regarding terms and conditions of employment of unit employees represented by the Union is presumptively relevant. Where the information, as here, concerns employees or operations other than those represented by the union, i.e., Specialty Trades, Inc., there is no such presumption. Ohio Power Co., 216 NLRB 987 (1975), enfd. 531 F.2d 1381 (6th Cir. 1976). In this latter situation, the burden is on the union to establish relevance of the requested information.

Here, as in Pence Construction, the General Counsel and the Union assert that the information gathered by Union Representative Donald L. Statza (and reported to Union Business Manager Neal Rosenberg) provided an objective, factual, and reasonable basis for believing that unit work was being diverted from Respondent, thus fulfilling the Union's burden of establishing the relevancy of the information requested.

B. Discussion and Conclusions

I am indebted to the analysis of Judge Cullen in Pence Construction Corp., supra. As noted therein, the union had the burden of showing the relevancy of nonunit information, but the burden is not an exceptionally heavy one. The information requested need not necessarily be dispositive of the issues between the parties. It must only have some bearing on it. Pfizer, Inc., 268 NLRB 916, 918 (1984). The employer's obligation, in short, is to furnish information that has a probable or potential relevance to the union's "performance of its duties and obligations" because a broad discovery rule is crucial to full development of the role of collective bargaining contemplated by the Act. Pence Construction Corp., supra, citing cases. There must be "informed administration" of the collective agreement by the union. Ibid., citing Safeway Stores, 252 NLRB 1323 (1980).

In cases involving the unlawful diversion of work, whether in involving an alter ego, subcontracting, or merely tranferring or diverting unit work, the burden on the union is to establish the relevancy of the requested information as an aid to contract administration including contract violation. The right of the union to "informed" contract administration is a statutory, not a mere contract, right. Southern Nevada Builders Assn., 274 NLRB 350 (1985).

The proof necessary to "trigger" the employer's obligation to furnish information relating to work transfer in alleged violation of the contract is not such as to establish that, in fact, there was unlawful diversion of the work, but merely that the Union "had a reasonable belief that enough facts existed to give rise to a reasonable belief that" there was an unlawful diversion of work away from unit employees. Pence Construction Corp., citing Walter N. Yoder & Sons, 754 F.2d 531, 536 (4th Cir. 1985), enfg. 270 NLRB 652 (1984). Further, it is clear from Pence Construction, that there need not be a pending grievance pertaining to the alleged contract violation in order to trigger the employer's obligation to surrender the requested information. In the instant case, however, the Union, citing Respondent's alleged violation of specific contract provisions protecting unit work, formally made a grievance out of its demand. The obligation to supply information extends not only to information to support the Union's decision whether or not to file or process a grievance, but, as above noted, to that which is necessary for the "informed administration" of a collective-bargaining agreement.

Although the present facts do not necessarily show either the existence of a single-integrated unit of employees employed by Respondent and Specialty Trades, Inc. or that Specialty Trades, Inc. was established or exists to unlawfully divert work out of Respondent's unionized unit, the Union did submit preponderant credible evidence, through the testimony of Donald Statza, and the record shows (based in part on the admissions of Louis Jost Jr.) that Respondent is a constituent part of Jost Management Service, Inc.; that Specialty Trades, Inc. is physically located in Jost Management Services, Inc.; that Specialty Trades, Inc. maintains a telephone answering service wherein Jost Management answers for Specialty Trades, Inc. using a Jost Management clerical; that Specialty Trades, Inc. makes applications for licenses and permits through Respondent's president, Louis Jost Jr. as Specialty Trades' treasurer and Brian Jost (son of Louis Jost Jr.); that Specialty Trades (Schmitt) and its employees were found at the Mitchell Saving and Loan jobsite, in Greenfield, Wisconsin, where the electrical job permit was issued not to Specialty Trades but to Respondent; and yet materials on the job were in the name of Specialty Trades, Inc. In addition, the union agents followed a person apparently in the employ of Specialty Trades Inc. to a Specialty Trades, Inc. jobsite and there found Respondent's president Louis Jost Jr. and Jim Jost, Respondent having allegedly no corporate or business relationship to Specialty Trades, Inc. As a prima facie matter, the evidence clearly shows, at least, an intermixing or confusion of bidding, corporate officials, production materials, and employees between Respondent and Specialty Trades, Inc.

Because Specialty Trades, Inc. admittedly performs electrical contracting work of the same nature as Respondent, I conclude that the Union, on the above evidence, had a reasonable basis for its belief that Respondent, in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement, might well be diverting work from unit employees employed by Respondent to employees of Specialty Trades, Inc. who are not covered by any collective-bargaining agreement with the Union. Thus, the record shows sufficient evidence linking possible Respondent contract violation work diversion to the Union's 19 May questions concerning the relationship of the two employers.

C. Respondent's Defenses

Although filing of the grievance is not a condition precedent to obligating the employer to supply relevant information, Pence Construction Corp., supra, and although Respondent does not deny the potential relevance of the propounded questions (many of the same questions propounded and found relevant in Davis Acoustical Co., supra), it does defend on the ground that the Union failed to adequately notify Respondent of the facts on which the Union sustained its "reasonable basis for believing" that Respondent was in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement.

Neither logic nor case precedent demonstrates that the Union, in triggering Respondent's obligation to supply information, is required to divulge to the Employer the information on which it bases its "reasonable basis for believing." Although it is true that some cases, e.g., Davis Acoustical Co., show that the Union communicated with the employer the facts of apparent work diversion which its investigation divulged, there is no such indication in Pence Construction Corp. In that case, as here, the factors do not necessarily establish that the employer was unlawfully diverting work to another entity. The only necessary condition is that the evidence provided the Union with a reasonable basis for its belief, expressed here in a letter to the Respondent, that Respondent was diverting erstwhile unit work, thereby violating the collective-bargaining agreement. I conclude that the Board, not Respondent, is the arbiter of whether the Union's evidence supports the "reasonable belief."

The Board appears to hold, in Pence Construction, that there must only be a reasonable basis for the union's conclusion, conveyed to respondent, that respondent was violating the collective-bargaining agreement. The union's correspondence with the employer, as in the instant case, showed no disclosure of evidence on which the union based its reasonable belief; rather, as in the instant case, the communication of the union to the employer alleged only specific contract violations and merely alleged, as in the instant case, the employer's purpose of evading the obligations of collective-bargaining agreement. To rule otherwise, that the union must supply evidence, I find, would make respondent, rather than the Board, the arbiter of whether the union's belief of the existence of a contract violation had a "reasonable basis," which is the Board's standard in Pence Construction. Were there an obligation, as Respondent insists, for the Union to supply Respondent with initial information, and thereafter, further information after Respondent's intermediate reply, before the Union could establish a "reasonable basis" for its belief of a contract violation, not only would Respondent, rather than the Board, become the arbiter of the Union's reasonable belief, but Respondent would become exclusive goal-keeper in a cat-and-mouse game: each time the Union would submit evidence to Respondent, Respondent would decide whether it was sufficient to initially trigger and, thereafter, to further trigger Respondent's obligation to further supply information. Neither the Act, nor logic, nor the case law permit such a dilatory procedure. Moreover, such a procedure would support continued delay (a) in having the Union decide whether to file, or, as in the instant case, proceed to further process, a contract grievance; and (b) in permitting continued intermediate diversion of unit work which might ultimately be in violation of the contract and the Act. Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203 (1964). Such a procedure would undermine the express contrary policy of NLRB v. Acme Industrial Co., 385 U.S. 432, 438–439 (1967): to require the employer to convey to the union the information necessary to promptly evaluate the merits of the union's grievance in order to sift our unmeritorious claims.

In addition, Respondent's formal response of 29 July 1986 to the Union's 19 May 1986 questionnaire interposes not a denial of the relevancy of the questions, but only an assertion that the answers are of a "confidential nature" to the operations of that "separate corporation." In fact, Respondent's response answers some of the Union's questions. Respondent's partial answer on the merits implicitly denotes, in my judgment, an admission of both the Union's need to know and the prima facie relevance of the questions in the questionnaire.

Furthermore, Respondent's naked plea of "confidentiality" itself, absent a denial of relevance, serves to excite the Union's interest with regard to possible unlawful diversion rather than to quiet it. In the absence of an explicit denial of relevance, I separately conclude that Respondent's partial answer, joined to a defense of "confidentiality," per se is independent supporting evidence of relevance of the Union's questions even in the absence of other proof.

I conclude, therefore, that the Union has supplied evidence beyond mere suspicion and surmise, Southern Nevada Builders Assn., 274 NLRB 350 (1985), and under Pence Construction has demonstrated sufficient evidence to support its burden of proof regarding the relevance of its request for information concerning nonunit employees and operations, Ohio Power Co., 216 NLRB 987 (1975). It has proved a reasonable basis for its belief (whether or not ultimately true) that Respondent was diverting unit work in violation of the collective-bargaining agreement. Such proof is further strengthened by (a) Respondent's partial answer; and (b) Respondent's plea of confidentially. That evidence, together with its 19 May 1986 letter to Respondent alleging a violation of the collective-bargaining agreement and an unlawful evasion thereof, was sufficient to support the Union's burden of proof demonstrating that the requested information was relevant and essential to the performance of the Union's obligations as the collective-bargaining representative to process its grievance and to administer the collective agreement. I am therefore constrained to conclude that Respondent, by failing to produce the requested information, violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged.[5] In reaching this conclusion, I necessarily find no merit in Respondent's argument that the material is "confidential" and therefore need not be produced. I have found no case threatening an employer's claim of the relationship between itself and an alleged recipient of unlawful work diversion as being "confidential." Indeed, as above noted, I have found the plea of confidentiality to be further evidence supporting the Union's reasonable belief of work diversion. Although the Board, in case of trade secrets, has established a protective mechanism, in the face of a Union's otherwise lawful demand for information which might cause harmful disclosure, Kelly-Springfield Tire Co., 266 NLRB 587 (1983), there is no reason to believe that a procedural device protecting an employer's trade secrets can relate to an employer allegedly engaged in unlawfully diverting work. In any event, the facts of record fail to show prima facie secret material to be protected.[6] Cf. NLRB v. Jaggars-Chiles-Stovall, 639 F.2d 1344 (5th Cir. 1981).

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. By failing or refusing to provide the Union, in writing, with the information requested in the Union's letter and questionnaire of 19 May 1986, Respondent has unlawfully refused to bargain with the Union and has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.
4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, it is recommended that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the purposes of the Act. This affirmative action will include the grant of the requested information and the posting of the usual notice.

---

[5] Pence Construction, supra; see also Washington Materials v. NLRB, 803 F.2d 1333 (4th Cir. 1986).

[6] To the extent Respondent argues (Br. 12) that the Union should seek the information from Specialty Trades, Inc., the issue is whether Respondent is obliged to surrender the information, not Specialty Trades. In addition, cases such as American Cyanamid Co., 129 NLRB 683 (1960), cited by Respondent, are distinguishable. Here, the Union is not seeking Respondent's records—merely answers. In the instant case, Respondent refused to fully answer the Union's questions.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[7]

ORDER

The Respondent, Bentley-Jost Electric Corporation, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 494, AFL–CIO by refusing to furnish the Union with the information, in writing, requested in the Union's letter and questionnaire of 19 May 1986.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act

(a) Forthwith furnish the Union with the information requested in its letter and questionnaire of 19 May 1986.

(b) On request, bargain collectively in good faith with the Union with regard to wages, hours, and other terms and conditions of employment of employees in the appropriate unit specified in the collective-bargaining agreement between Respondent and the Union which agreement runs for the period of 1985 through 1988.

(c) Post at its office and other facilities in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[8] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 30, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[7] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[8] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain collectively with International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 494, AFL–CIO by refusing to furnish the Union with the information requested in the Union's letter and questionnaire of 19 May 1985.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL furnish the Union with the information requested in its letter and questionnaire to us of 19 May 1986.

Park-Ohio Industries, Inc. and International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America (UAW) and its Local No. 91. Cases 8–CA–12702, 8–CA–17148, and 8–CA–17394

7 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 30 July 1981 the Board issued a Decision and Order in Case 8–CA–12702, in which it found that Respondent Tocco Division (Tocco) of Park-Ohio Industries, Inc. (Park-Ohio) had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by transferring certain work formerly performed by employees represented by the Union from its plant in Cleveland, Ohio, to its plant in Boaz, Alabama, without affording the Union an opportunity to bargain over the decision to transfer. Park-Ohio Industries, 257 NLRB 413 (1981). The Board ordered Tocco to cease and desist from unilaterally transferring unit work, to reinstitute the transferred work at its Cleveland plant, to bargain over the decision to transfer, and to reinstate with backpay the unit employees who had lost their jobs because of the unlawful transfer. The Sixth Circuit enforced the Board's Decision and Order. Park-Ohio Industries v. NLRB, 702 F.2d 624 (1983). A controversy having arisen over the amount of backpay due, the Regional Director for Region 8 issued a backpay specification and notice of hearing on 19 August 1985. The backpay proceeding is still pending.

On 4 November 1983 the Union filed a charge in Case 8–CA–17148. As amended on 15 March 1984, the charge alleges that Respondents Tocco and Ohio Crankshaft and Camshaft Division of Park-Ohio Industries, Inc. (Ohio Crankshaft)[1] violated Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to provide relevant information and refusing to bargain over Park-Ohio's decision to relocate the Tocco Division.

On 27 February 1984 the Union filed a charge in Case 8–CA–17394 against Ohio Crankshaft. As amended on 15 March and 25 April 1984, the charge alleges that Ohio Crankshaft discriminatorily discharged nine named employees in violation of Section 8(a)(3),[2] and violated Section 8(a)(5) by refusing to provide relevant information to the Union concerning the discharges in question. On 30 April 1984 the Acting Regional Director issued an order consolidating cases and a consolidated complaint in Cases 8–CA–17148 and 8–CA–17394, alleging violations of Section 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act. The complaint was amended on 9 May 1984. No hearing has been held on the consolidated complaint in those two cases, and the matter is still pending before the Region.

On 4 November 1983 the Union filed a charge in Case 8–CA–17148–2, alleging that Ohio Crankshaft had acted in concert with the Village of Newburgh Heights, Ohio, to enforce a local ordinance against union members in such a way as to interfere with their Section 7 rights.[3] The Union and other plaintiffs also filed an action in Federal district court seeking, among other things, to have the ordinance declared unconstitutional. The Regional Director deferred processing of the charge pending the court's decision. On 27 February 1986 the district court issued a written opinion declaring the ordinance unconstitutional. Davis v. Village of Newburgh Heights, 642 F.Supp. 413 (N.D. Ohio 1986).

Following the entry of the court's decision, Ohio Crankshaft entered into an informal settlement agreement, executed by the Union and the Regional Director as well as Ohio Crankshaft, in which Ohio Crankshaft agreed to post and comply with a notice promising not to engage in the acts that were the subject of the charge in Case 8–CA–17148–2. The settlement agreement was on a standard Board form. The only additions, apart from the name of Ohio Crankshaft and the case number, were a nonadmission clause and the statement that "It is understood and agreed by and between the parties to this Agreement that the General Counsel reserves the right to introduce any and all evidence concerning the instant charge in other matters hereafter litigated." The Regional Director approved the settlement on 17 April 1986.

On 21 October 1986 Park-Ohio moved for summary judgment in Cases 8–CA–12702, 8–CA–17148, and 8–CA–17394, alleging that under the Board's settlement bar rule, those cases may not be litigated because they were pending when the Regional Director approved the settlement agreement in Case 8–CA–17148–2. On 30 October 1986 the Board issued an order transferring proceeding to the Board and Notice to Show Cause in the three pending cases, directing the General Counsel and the Union to show cause why the motion should not be granted. Both the General Counsel and the Union filed memoranda opposing the motion. Park-Ohio filed a reply, and the General Counsel filed a response.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on the Motion for Summary Judgment

Under the "settlement bar rule" enunciated in Hollywood Roosevelt Hotel Co.,[4] and followed consistently thereafter,[5] a settlement agreement disposes of all issues involving presettlement conduct unless earlier violations of the Act were unknown to the General Counsel and not readily discoverable by investigation, or specifically reserved from the settlement by the mutual understanding of the parties.[6] Park-Ohio contends that neither of the exceptions set forth above is applicable in this proceeding, and therefore that Cases 8–CA–12702, 8–CA–17148, and 8–CA–17394 should be dismissed because they were pending before Region 8 when the Regional Director approved the settlement agreement in Case 8–CA–17148–2.

The General Counsel and the Union oppose the Motion for Summary Judgment in Case 8–CA–12702 (the backpay proceeding), contending that Park-Ohio's proposed extension of the settlement bar rule to compliance cases is unprecedented.[7] They argue that the rule never was intended to cover situations in which unfair labor practices have been found, and where the only questions remaining concern compliance with a Board order.

The General Counsel and the Union also oppose granting summary judgment in the two pending unfair labor practice cases. They contend that the clause in the settlement agreement reserving the right to introduce evidence concerning the charge in Case 8–CA–17148–2 in future litigation is a clear reservation of the right to litigate the pending cases. They also argue that it is plain from the circumstances of the settlement that the agreement was intended to encompass only Case 8–CA–17148–2, and not the other pending cases. In support of their position they point out that only Case 8–CA–17148–2, and only Ohio Crankshaft, are mentioned anywhere in the agreement, and that the notice posted pursuant to the settlement agreement refers only to matters contained in the charge in Case 8–CA–17148–2. They also urge that it is simply unbelievable that the Regional Director or the Union would have agreed to dismiss pending cases involving potential restoration of transferred work and significant amounts of backpay, in which the Regional Director had found merit and issued a consolidated complaint, in return for Ohio Crankshaft's posting a notice in settlement of a completely unrelated charge. Accordingly, the General Counsel and the Union contend that the foregoing circumstances, combined with the clause in the settlement agreement reserving litigation rights, establish that the parties mutually understood that they were specifically reserving the other pending cases from the settlement.

We shall deny the Motion for Summary Judgment.

Concerning the backpay proceeding in Case 8–CA–12702, we agree with the General Counsel and the Union that the settlement bar rule was not intended to encompass such actions. Indeed, as set forth in Hollywood Roosevelt Hotel, the rule "bars subsequent litigation of presettlement conduct alleged to constitute unfair labor practices."[8] It was not meant to preclude compliance litigation where unfair labor practices already have been found by the Board, and we so hold. Accordingly, the portion of the motion addressed to the backpay proceeding is dismissed with prejudice.

We also deny, but without prejudice, the portion of the motion addressed to the pending unfair labor practice cases. We reach this result because, on the limited record before us, we are unable to determine whether the parties to the settlement agreement in Case 8–CA–17148–2 mutually intended to reserve from that agreement the issues in the other pending cases. If such was their intent, the litigation of those cases would not be precluded.[9] At this point, however, the intent of the parties is unclear. For example, we disagree with the contention of the General Counsel and the Union that the language in the settlement agreement reserving litigation rights is unambiguous evidence that the parties intended to reserve the right to litigate those cases. The language refers instead to "other matters hereafter litigated." We find the quoted language—which could be interpreted either as referring only to the litigation of charges that may be filed in the future, or also to the litigation of pending charges—inherently ambiguous.

Additional ambiguity as to the parties' intentions arises from the fact that the charges in the various cases involve two separate divisions and facilities of Park-Ohio. Thus, whereas Cases 8–CA–17148–2 and 8–CA–17394 involve only Ohio Crankshaft, Case 8–CA–17148 apparently is concerned chiefly with events at the Tocco Division. Moreover, as the General Counsel and the Union point out, only Ohio Crankshaft (and not Tocco) is named as a charged party in the settlement agreement. It is unclear, then, whether the settlement agreement was intended to cover only Ohio Crankshaft, or to include Tocco as well.

Ambiguities such as those discussed above raise substantial and material questions of fact concerning the intended scope of the settlement agreement that should be determined at a hearing. We therefore deny the portion of the motion addressed to Cases 8–CA–17148 and 8–CA–17394, without prejudice to the introduction at the hearing of evidence tending to establish the intent of the parties in arriving at the settlement agreement.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 9 April 1985 Administrative Law Judge Jay R. Pollack issued the attached supplemental decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Applicant filed cross-exceptions, a supporting brief, and a brief in answer to the General Counsel's exceptions.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

In his initial decision in this case, the judge recommended the dismissal of the complaint allegations which alleged that the Respondent-Applicant had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by failing to notify the Union of its decision to lay off all unit employees in May 1982, and by thereafter assigning nonunit employees to perform the bargaining unit work and subcontracting out such work without giving notice to, or bargaining with, the Union.[3] On the question of the lack of layoff notification, the judge found that the Respondent-Applicant had provided the Union with proper notice as required under the contract. The judge also found that the Respondent-Applicant's unilateral decision to subcontract out the bargaining unit work and to assign such work to nonunit employees was not unlawful under the Board's holding in Westinghouse Electric Corp., 150 NLRB 1576 (1965).[4] No exceptions were filed to the judge's decision and it was subsequently adopted by the Board in an unpublished order dated 13 December 1983.

The Applicant then filed the instant application for an award of attorney's fees and expenses under the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA) and, following an evidentiary hearing, the judge issued the attached supplemental decision. In that decision, the judge found, and we agree, that the General Counsel was substantially justified in issuing the complaint and proceeding to hearing in this case.[5] The record in this regard reveals that following the filing of the charge by the Union, the General Counsel obtained information from union officials and employees, in the form of affidavits and written statements, which supported its assertion that the Applicant unilaterally laid off all bargaining unit employees, subcontracted out the bargaining unit work, assigned unit work to nonunit employees, and negotiated directly with an employee, instead of with the Union, concerning his terms and conditions of employment, in an attempt to undermine the Union's representative status and to establish a nonunion shop.

Following receipt of the Union's evidence, the General Counsel sought to obtain a statement of position from the Applicant concerning the above allegations and, with this in mind, met with its president and owner, Sakae Fujimoto, and its labor consultant, Michael McGuire. Although it was afforded a full and fair opportunity to fully state its position and to provide the General Counsel with any and all evidence it had in support thereof or which might otherwise have a bearing on the issues raised by the charge, the Applicant provided the General Counsel only with an affidavit from Fujimoto responding solely to the "direct dealing" allegation, and did not provide a written statement of its position concerning the other allegations despite promising to do so. Instead, the Applicant, through

[1] The Applicant also filed a "Seventh Motion to Amend EAJA Application for Fees and Expenses," and a motion, with accompanying memorandum, to augment the record to include an exhibit attached to its answer to the General Counsel's exceptions, and to correct its answering brief. In view of our decision, we find it unnecessary to rule on the Applicant's motions.

[2] The General Counsel asserts, in essence, that the judge's findings of fact and conclusions of law, particularly in regard to the Applicant's net worth statement, are the result of bias. After a careful examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that the General Counsel's assertion is without merit.

In view of the finding herein that the General Counsel was substantially justified in issuing the complaint and continuing to litigate the underlying unfair labor practice proceeding through the filing of a posttrial brief to the judge, we find it unnecessary to pass on the General Counsel's contention that the Applicant failed to comply with the Board's Rules and Regulations in its application for fees and expenses.

[3] The judge, however, found merit to the complaint allegation that the Respondent-Applicant violated Sec. 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act when it bargained directly with an employee, rather than with his Union, over the employee's terms and conditions of employment, and issued an order directing it to cease and desist from engaging in such conduct.

[4] The Board in the Westinghouse case held that an employer's failure to notify and bargain with a union over such a decision will not violate the Act if the employer can show that its decision (1) was motivated solely by economic considerations, (2) comported with its customary business operations, (3) did not vary significantly in kind or degree from an established past practice, (4) had no demonstrable adverse impact on unit employees, and (5) the union had an opportunity to bargain over the decision in prior bargaining sessions. The judge found that the Applicant's decision in this case satisfied all the above criteria.

[5] We believe that Congress, in reviewing the Equal Access to Justice Act, 5 U.S.C. § 504 (1982), as amended by Pub. L. No. 99-80, 99 Stat. 183 (Aug. 5, 1985), did not alter, but merely clarified the definition of "substantially justified." "Substantially justified" means more than "mere reasonableness." H.R. Regs. 99-120, p. 9.

McGuire, orally expressed its belief that its unilateral decision to subcontract out the unit work and to assign nonunit employees to perform that work was not unlawful because its contract with the Union did not prohibit it from doing so and because, in its view, the Union waived its right to object to its actions by failing to obtain, during recent contract negotiations, a restriction on that conduct in the contract. However, at no time during the precomplaint investigation did the Applicant assert, or present evidence to show, that the Union was properly notified of the layoff before it went into effect, and that its unilateral decision to subcontract out the bargaining unit work and to have unit work performed by nonunit employees during the layoff was motivated by economic considerations, accorded with its usual method of operations, and was consistent with an established past practice. As the judge correctly notes, that evidence, which the Applicant had in its possession prior to the hearing, was withheld from the General Counsel during the investigation and not produced until the Applicant presented its rebuttal evidence on the fourth day of hearing. In view of the Applicant's apparent failure to cooperate fully with the General Counsel's investigation of the case, the General Counsel had no alternative but to rely on the limited information obtained during that investigation in determining whether or not to issue a complaint. On the basis of that information, it was not unreasonable for the General Counsel to infer that the Applicant's conduct, as described in the charge, was unlawful. For this reason and as previously stated, we conclude, in agreement with the judge, that the General Counsel was substantially justified in issuing the complaint and in proceeding to a hearing in this case.

However, we do not agree with the judge that the General Counsel was required to stop prosecuting the case after the Applicant produced evidence on the fourth day which demonstrated that it had a past practice of subcontracting and of assigning nonunit employees to perform unit work during layoffs, that the Union had acquiesced in that practice, and that its actions in this regard were motivated solely by economic considerations. Although the introduction of that evidence clearly had the effect of weakening the Government's case against the Applicant, the General Counsel was nevertheless under no obligation to withdraw its case at that point since the General Counsel could not have known, prior to the issuance of the judge's decision, what, if any, weight he would give to the Applicant's documentary evidence and the testimony of its witnesses vis-a-vis that produced by the General Counsel.[6] More importantly, the judge's finding that the Applicant had a valid defense under the Board's Westinghouse decision was not based solely on the documentary evidence produced by the Applicant on the fourth day but rather rested also on his decision to resolve certain conflicts in testimony in the Applicant's favor.[7] For example, in concluding that the Applicant's assignment of unit work to nonunit employees, after laying off all unit employees, was consistent with an established past practice, the judge found it necessary to reject Fujimoto's testimony that such assignments of work occurred only when unit employees were unavailable to perform such work due to absenteeism. In rejecting Fujimoto's testimony in this regard, the judge was also implicitly rejecting the testimony of Union Representative Sid Lampley and employee Kevin Kekahuna that was corroborative of Fujimoto's testimony on this issue. Clearly, had such testimony been credited, it would have been supportive of the General Counsel's position on this crucial question. Likewise, the judge's finding, that the Union had been afforded an opportunity to bargain over the Applicant's decision to subcontract out bargaining unit work and to assign such work to nonunit employees, was based in part on his crediting Fujimoto's and McGuire's testimony over Lampley's testimony on this issue. The judge's comment, that no reasonable attorney could have expected to prevail on this issue on the basis of Lampley's testimony, has no relevance here since it is the trier of fact, and not the General Counsel, which must determine whether a particular witness' testimony is worthy of belief or should be discounted.

In view of the above facts, we conclude that the General Counsel was substantially justified in continuing to litigate the case to the close of hearing and in filing a posttrial brief with the judge. Accordingly, we shall dismiss the Applicant's application for an EAJA award.

ORDER

It is ordered that the application of the Applicant, Leeward Auto Wreckers, Inc., Honolulu, Hawaii, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act is dismissed.

[6] In this regard we note that following the close of the General Counsel's case-in-chief, the Applicant moved for dismissal of the complaint. The judge, however, denied the motion and, in doing so, expressed his reservation only concerning the merits of the "direct dealing" allegation which, as noted, he found to be meritorious.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

(Equal Access to Justice Act)

JAY R. POLLACK, Administrative Law Judge. I heard this case under the Equal Access to Justice Act, Pub. L. 96–481, 94 Stat. 2325 (EAJA) and Section 102.43 of the Board's Rules and Regulations in trial at Honolulu, Hawaii, on November 27 and 28, 1984. The case arose as follows:

On November 10, 1983, I issued a decision in which I concluded that Leeward Auto Wreckers, Inc. (the Respondent and the Applicant) had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act), by bargaining directly with an employee concerning wages, benefits, and other conditions of employment, and bypassing United Steelworkers of America, AFL–CIO, CLC (the Union) as the exclusive bargaining representative. More importantly, I dismissed the central allegations of the complaint that the Applicant had: (a) unilaterally laid off bargaining unit employees without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union; (b) unilaterally transferred work to supervisors and other nonbargaining unit employees without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union; and (c) unilaterally subcontracted out bargaining unit work without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union. No exceptions were filed to my decision and, on December 13, 1983, the Board issued an unpublished order adopting my findings and conclusions.

Thereafter, on January 12, 1984, the Applicant filed with the Board an Application for fees and expenses pursuant to the Equal Access to Justice Act, Pub. L. 96–481, 94 Stat. 2325, and Section 102.43 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, and a motion to withhold confidential financial information from public disclosure. On January 15 the Board referred this matter to me for appropriate action. The Applicant seeks legal fees and expenses in the amount of $47,040.28, as of March 27, 1985. The General Counsel contends, in substance, that the Applicant is not an eligible party under EAJA; that the Applicant is not a prevailing party; that the position of the General Counsel was substantially justified; that special circumstances make the granting of an award unjust; and that the fees and expenses claimed are in excess of what could reasonably be awarded in this case.

On consideration of the entire record in this supplemental proceeding, including the record in the underlying unfair labor practice case, and the briefs of the parties, I make the following findings and conclusions.

I. THE APPLICANT'S ELIGIBILITY

Section 504 of EAJA limits eligibility to, inter alia, a corporation, partnership, association, or organization whose net worth did not exceed $5 million and who had no more than 500 employees at the time the adversary adjudication was initiated.[1] Section 102.43(g) of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides:

> (g) The net worth and number of employees of the applicant and all of its affiliates shall be aggregated to determine eligibility. Any individual, corporation, or other entity that directly or indirectly controls or owns a majority of the voting shares or other interest of the applicant, or any corporation or other entity of which the applicant directly or indirectly owns or controls a majority of the voting shares or other interest, will be considered an affiliate for purposes of this part, unless such treatment would be unjust and contrary to the purposes of the Equal Access to Justice Act (94 Stat. 2325) in light of the actual relationship between the affiliated entities. In addition, financial relationships of the applicant other than those described in this paragraph may constitute special circumstances that would make an award unjust.

The Applicant's records indicate that at the time of the issuance of the instant complaint, January 31, 1983, it employed less than 15 employees and had a net worth of less than $1 million.[2] The record reveals that during the normal course of its business the Applicant delivered, without charge, certain auto parts to Ace Towing Service, a business owned and operated by Hisako Fujimoto, wife of Sakae Fujimoto, the Applicant's president and sole stockholder. However, neither the Applicant nor Sakae Fujimoto owns voting shares or any other interest in Ace Towing Service, and neither Ace Towing Service nor H. Fujimoto owns voting shares or any other interest in the Applicant.[3] The amount of moneys involved with the auto parts given by the Applicant to Ace Towing Service would not affect the Applicant's eligibility under EAJA. In any event, the combined net worth of the Fujimotos, and all their businesses, Ace Towing Service, Leeward Auto Wreckers, and Fujimoto Trucking, falls far below the EAJA eligibility standards. Accordingly, I find that the Applicant is an eligible party under EAJA.

The Applicant contends that it is "engaged in a highly competitive business in which it must bid for contracts from the County of Honolulu but that public disclosure of [its] confidential financial position could undermine [its] capacity to compete for work." The General Counsel asserts that the Applicant "has failed to show that public disclosure is not required in the public interest." Based on the evidence of the Applicant's financial position already in the underlying unfair labor practice case, the competitive nature of the Applicant's business, and the fact that the Applicant falls so deeply below the eligibility requirements, I find that further disclosure is not required in the public interest. I, therefore, grant the Applicant's motion to withhold from public disclosure the net worth exhibit filed with the application. However, I note that the granting of this motion is not determinative of the availability of the documents under the Freedom of Information Act. See Section 102.147(g)(2) of the Board's Rules.

[2] The Applicant's net worth was arrived at by using the cost of acquisition rather than the depreciated value of assets listed in the net worth exhibit. See W. C. McQuaide, Inc., 270 NLRB 1197 (1984); Stucco Stone Products, 270 NLRB 1195 (1984).

II. PREVAILING PARTY

Under Section 102.143(b) of the Board's Rules, a prevailing party is a respondent in an unfair labor practice case "who prevails in that proceeding, or in a significant and discrete substantive portion of that proceeding, and who otherwise meets the eligibility requirements" for an award under EAJA.

The complaint, as amended, alleged in substance that the Applicant violated Section 8(a)(5) of the Act and, derivatively, Section 8(a)(1) by engaging in the following conduct: (1) about May 1, 1982, laying off bargaining unit employees without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union; (2) about July 1, 1982, transferring bargaining unit work to supervisors and nonbargaining unit employees, without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union; (3) about June 1, 1982, subcontracting out bargaining unit work without prior notice to or bargaining with the Union; and (4) about October 4, 1982, directly dealing with an employee concerning rates of pay and other conditions of employment and, in that manner, bypassing the Union as the exclusive bargaining representative.

As stated earlier, I dismissed the first three allegations and found a violation with respect to the fourth. The first three allegations, if found meritorious, would have required a remedy of reinstatement and backpay for at least some bargaining unit employees. During the unfair labor practice hearing, the parties engaged in good-faith negotiations in an attempt to settle the case. However, negotiations broke down over cost items. The General Counsel succeeded in proving only one separate and distinct allegation. That allegation, direct dealing, did not involve an economic remedy but solely the posting of a notice. It was clearly not the central issue in the case and ranked last in significance of the issues presented.

The central issues in the case involved the alleged unilateral use of subcontractors and supervisors to perform bargaining unit work. The Applicant prevailed on these issues as well as the issue of the alleged unilateral layoff. Comparing the allegations of the complaint with the result obtained by the Applicant, I find the General Counsel's argument that the Applicant was not a prevailing party to be without merit.

The General Counsel's contention that because I found a violation of Section 8(a)(5) the Applicant did not prevail in a significant and discrete substantive portion of the proceeding is at odds with the express language of the Board's Rules. The Board's Rules are designed to prevent the Government from including in a valid complaint additional allegations that are not substantially justified. The position urged by the General Counsel would permit the Government to throw into a complaint any and all allegations involving the same section of the Act without justification and still escape the provisions of EAJA. The Board's Rules are designed, in accordance with EAJA, to require substantial justification for each significant and discrete substantive portion of the complaint. Of course, there are times when allegations are so entwined that they cannot be subjected to separate analysis under EAJA. However, that clearly is not the case here.

The General Counsel relies on the unreported case of Okeh Caterers, JD–(SF)–34–83, to support his argument that the Applicant was not a prevailing party. First, the case has no precedential value because no exceptions were filed and thus the Board adopted pro forma the judge's decision. Second, the facts are so clearly distinguishable that the case is of no value in the instant proceeding. In Okeh Caterers, Administrative Law Judge Jerrold Shapiro, in dismissing an EAJA claim involving an allegation that an employer illegally solicited employees' grievances, noted that the solicitation allegation was "part and parcel" of a further meritorious allegation that the employer had illegally interrogated employees. Thus, Judge Shapiro reasoned, "it was necessary for Respondent to . . . defend against this allegation of illegal interrogation" and he found that "it would be inequitable to award Respondent expenses for litigating the solicitation of grievances allegation even if the General Counsel had no reasonable basis in law for including it in the complaint."

In the instant case, the layoff, transfer of bargaining work, and subcontracting were not part and parcel of the direct dealing allegation. If the General Counsel only alleged the meritorious direct dealing allegation, the Applicant would not have had to defend the other allegations. Moreover, I have no doubt that the case would have settled if only the direct dealing allegation had been alleged. To defend the direct dealing case, the Applicant would have had to cross-examine one General Counsel witness and offer testimony of one of its own witnesses. Such a trial would have lasted less than 1 day. To litigate the three central allegations of the complaint required 6 days of trial (4 full and 2 partial days of trial). In addition to an increase in the number of witnesses, there was a necessity for documentary evidence not required for litigation of the direct dealing violation. Further, there would have been no monetary risk to the Applicant if only the direct dealing violation had been alleged. The direct dealing allegation might have been part and parcel of the central allegations (layoff, subcontracting, and supervisory performance of work) but the reverse is not true. The central allegations were not part and parcel of the direct dealing allegation and the General Counsel needed separate and distinct justification for their inclusion in the complaint.

III. SUBSTANTIAL JUSTIFICATION

EAJA provides that an administrative agency award to a prevailing party certain expenses incurred in connection with an adversary adjudication, unless the agency finds the position of the Government is "substantially justified." Although EAJA is silent on the meaning of the "substantially justified" standard, the Board has held the test is one of reasonableness. When the Government can show that its case had a reasonable basis both in law and fact, no award will be made. Enerhaul, Inc., 263 NLRB 890 (1982), revd. 710 F.2d 748 (11th Cir. 1983); Shellmaker, Inc., 267 NLRB 20 (1983). The Government is not required to establish that its decision to litigate was based on a substantial probability of prevailing. Wolf Street Supermarket, 266 NLRB 665 fn. 1 (1983); Hamel Forest Products, 270 NLRB 1078 (1984). EAJA was not intended to stifle the reasonable regulatory effects of Federal agencies. Wyandotte Savings Bank v. NLRB, 682 F.2d 119, 120 (6th Cir. 1982). Similarly, EAJA was not intended to deter the Government from advancing in good faith a close question of law or fact. Shellmaker, supra; Derickson Co., 270 NLRB 516 (1984). Further, EAJA was not intended to foreclose the Government from exploring novel or close questions of law. Thus, EAJA provides that the Government should not be held liable where "special circumstances make the award unjust." The legislative history of EAJA explains the purpose of the "safety valve" of special circumstances.

> This "safety valve" helps to ensure that the Government is not deterred from advancing in good faith the novel but credible extensions and interpretations of the law that often gives the courts discretion to deny awards where equitable considerations dictate an award should not be made. [S. Rep. 96–253, 96 Cong., 1st Sess. at 6; H. Rep. 96–1418, 96 Cong., 2d Sess. 11, reprinted in 1980 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 4984, 4990.]

The Board has utilized a case-by-case approach in analyzing EAJA cases. It has interpreted the reasonableness standards in such a manner as to not interfere with the General Counsel's vigorous enforcement of the labor laws. Shellmaker, supra, and Derickson Co., supra (close questions of law and fact); Iowa Parcel Service, 266 NLRB 392 (1983) (a novel but credible extension and interpretation of the law); Charles H. McCauley Associates, 269 NLRB 791 (1984) (a credibility question which was ultimately decided against the General Counsel); and International Maintenance Systems, 267 NLRB 1136 (1983) (failure of the applicant to cooperate in the precomplaint investigation). Since October 1, 1981, the Board has granted an award in only one EAJA case, Debolt Transfer, 271 NLRB 299 (1984). In that case, the General Counsel's position was characterized as "betting on a long shot."

In the instant case, the General Counsel argues that his "decision to issue complaint and proceed to trial fall well within permissible standards for government action." The General Counsel argues that the Applicant's successful defense regarding its past practice of subcontracting and using supervisors to perform bargaining unit work "was not 'developed' nor even apparent until well into trial. [The Applicant] failed to raise the defense at any stage of the investigation, pre-trial period or in the pleadings." Thus, the General Counsel argues that "the Regional Director was justified in issuing complaint and going to trial based on the facts available to him prior to the hearing."

The Applicant argues that the General Counsel was on notice that the issues of subcontracting and management performance of unit work were fully negotiated during contract negotiations and that the Union failed to exact a concession on those matters. Further, the Applicant argues that the General Counsel was on notice that a prior history of subcontracting and management performance of unit work existed on the ground that the bargaining that took place revealed the past practices and that such bargaining would not have occurred in the absence of such past practices. The Applicant argues that "General Counsel cannot argue substantial justification 'based on the facts available to him prior to the hearing' . . . where [the Applicant] put the General Counsel on notice that the Union adamantly sought to prohibit, by contracted amendment, subcontracting and management performance of unit work, and where the General Counsel's own agents were aware of those matters and discharged the General Counsel's case."

The Applicant presented evidence that prior to the issuance of the underlying complaint, it cooperated with the Regional Director's investigation of the underlying unfair labor practice charge. According to Michael McGuire, a labor consultant who represented the Applicant during the times material to the complaint allegation, he informed the Board investigator "that there could be no refusal to bargain violation regarding transfer of bargaining unit work because the Union conceded those issues during our negotiations." The General Counsel presented evidence from the investigator that McGuire had urged the following defenses: (1) that there was no prohibition against subcontracting in the contract executed by the parties; (2) that there was no clause in the contract that prohibited managerial employees from performing unit work; (3) that the issue of the subcontracting and management personnel performing unit work was presented to the Union and that the Union waived any right to claim a violation of the Act because the contract did not prohibit such practices; and (4) that the Board should defer to the grievance and arbitration processes of the bargaining agreement under its Collyer doctrine.[4]

Apparently, McGuire did not inform the investigator that the Applicant had a past practice of subcontracting and using management personnel to perform unit work nor did McGuire present any evidence of such past practices. That evidence was not offered in the record until the fourth day of trial.[5]

The legal principles which controlled the outcome of the instant case came from the Board's decision in Westinghouse Electric Corp., 150 NLRB 1574 (1965). In Westinghouse, the Board, in holding that an employer did not violate Section 8(a)(5) and (1) by failing to notify and consult with the union before subcontracting work, stated at 1576:

[5] Jared Jossem, the Applicant's trial attorney, testified that he did not see the canceled checks showing such past practices until the second day of trial.

> Thus, it is wrong to assume that, in the absence of an existing contractual issue, it is a per se unfair labor practice in all situations for an employer to let out unit work without consulting the unit bargaining representative. As the Supreme Court has indicated in broader context, even where a subject of mandatory bargaining is involved, there may be "circumstances which the Board could or should accept to excuse or justify unilateral action."

In Westinghouse, the Board based its dismissal on these factors: Consistency with past practices and normal method of operation, absence of a demonstrated adverse effect on the unit employees, and ability of the union to have negotiated about this type of practice during past negotiations. See New Orleans Board of Trade, 125 NLRB 1258, 1259 (1965).

The facts and reasoning that caused me to dismiss the General Counsel's allegations were as follows: The Respondent, motivated solely by economic concerns, laid off its entire work force. Respondent had insufficient current assets to meet its current liabilities. Moreover, its customer, Hawaiian Western Steel, also laid off its employees and ceased purchasing from Respondent. Although nonunit personnel performed work for Respondent, none of these persons were paid and there is insufficient evidence that there existed a sufficient amount of work to permit the recall of any employees. During the four periods of layoff in 1981, Respondent's managerial and nonunit employees performed bargaining unit work. Although none of the 1981 layoffs involved a complete shutdown, managerial employees did perform work usually performed by unit employees. Also during the 1981 layoffs, subcontractors, independent contractors, nonunit employees, and employees hauled cars for Respondent on a piece rate basis. Thus, Respondent's transfer of the work to nonunit personnel and independent contractors was consistent with its past practice and normal method of operation. Further, the evidence reveals that the Union had knowledge of such past practices as it specifically demanded that such practices cease. The Union proposed contract language to end these practices, but faced a staunch refusal by Respondent. Finally, the Union reluctantly conceded to Respondent's position and withdrew its contract proposals. Thus, the evidence establishes that the Union had an opportunity to bargain about the performance of bargaining unit work by nonunit personnel and acceded to Respondent's demand to continue its past practices. Respondent's unilateral actions initially had no adverse impact on the unit employees. It was the economic layoff and not the transfer of work that caused the employees to lose work opportunities. However, at some later stage there apparently would have been sufficient work to allow the recall of some employees but for the transfer of work. However, this effect of Respondent's action differs only in degree from what took place during the layoffs in 1981. The Union had its opportunity to bargain in January 1982 to prevent such a recurrence but acceded to Respondent's position. It appeared to me that the General Counsel was seeking by way of this complaint that which the Union was unable to obtain in negotiations. Under all of these circumstances, I found that the Applicant had not violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint. See Rochester Telephone Corp., 190 NLRB 161, 164 (1974); see also General Electric Co., 240 NLRB 703, 708 (1979).

I found the case relied on by the General Counsel to be inapposite: Talbert Mfg. Co., 264 NLRB 1051 (1982); Garland Distributing Co., 234 NLRB 1275 (1978); and Whitehead Bros. Co., 263 NLRB 895 (1982). In the Talbert case, the foremen performed production work during a layoff, which work was of a type and extent they had not previously done. Further, the employer and union had bargained about the question of foremen doing bargaining unit work and had reached tentative agreement on a proposal that would have prohibited foremen from doing the work they did during the layoff. In the Garland case, the transfer of work to a nonunit employee violated an express provision of the existing collective-bargaining agreement. In Whitehead Bros., the subcontracting of work was inconsistent with past practice and the union had no opportunity to bargain about the subject in prior negotiations. As discussed above, the facts of the instant case required a determination that no violation of the Act had been established.

I found that the General Counsel had not sustained his burden of proof regarding the layoff allegation for the following reasons:

> Uncontradicted evidence reveals that Respondent gave notice of the layoff to the Union steward. Such notice comported with the contract requirement that notice of large scale layoffs be given to the Union Unit Committee.[6] Although the contract required 30-day notice, the General Counsel failed to establish that the notice was less than 30 days or otherwise was insufficient to give the Union a reasonable opportunity to bargain over Respondent's decision. Moreover, the undisputed evidence offered by Respondent reveals that in May, shortly after the layoffs, Respondent discussed these matters with Union Representative John Rusen. Rusen agreed to contact Respondent over possible accommodations to allow Respondent to recall the employees. However, Rusen did not further pursue the matter. In any event, the General Counsel has failed to establish that Respondent did not give the Union an adequate opportunity to bargain over the layoff or the effects of the layoff, as alleged in the complaint. Accordingly, I shall recommend that this allegation of the complaint be dismissed.

[6] The General Counsel argues that Respondent did not prove that the Union steward was part of the Union Unit Committee. Obviously, the General Counsel has the burdens of proof reversed.

Based on the record before me, it was clear that the Applicant had a valid defense. Thus, the General Counsel argues that his complaint was substantially justified "based on the information in possession at the time" the complaint issued. Based on the lenient standard used by the Board, the instant complaint would be found by the Board to be substantially justified when issued. However, during the litigation it become apparent that the Applicant had a valid defense and the complaint was groundless about the allegations at issue. Notwithstanding the existence of a controlling defense, the General Counsel continued to pursue this litigation.

In Spencer v. NLRB, 712 F.2d 539 (D.C. Cir. 1983), the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in discussing the Government's obligation to accede to the other party as soon as it becomes apparent that its litigation stance is not substantially justified, stated:

> It seems clear that, if the government does not immediately accede to the plantiff's demand, but instead initially opposes his claims and then at some later stage (e.g., in a pre-trial settlement) surrenders, the United States will be liable for attorneys' fees regardless of which theory is applied. Under such circumstances, not only will the government have acted unreasonably, but it will have adopted (at least briefly) a litigation position lacking substantial justification. For strong indications of Congress' intent that fees be awarded under these circumstances, see H.R.Rep. No. 1418, supra note 20, at 11; S.Rep. No. 253, supra note 20, at 7. But see Alspach v. District Director Of Internal Revenue, 527 F.Supp. at 229 (finding the litigation position of the IRS to have been "substantially justified" when it initially resisted a clearly meritorious suit to enjoin it from collecting a tax, but surrendered 1 month after it had located and reviewed the taxpayer's file). The only question open to serious dispute is whether the government should be obligated to pay fees when it surrenders at the very outset of litigation. [Id., at 555–556 fn. 58].

The Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in Environment Defense Fund v. Watt, 722 F.2d 1081, 1086 (2d Cir. 1983), agreed with the District of Columbia Circuit's view in Spencer v. NLRB:

> We find it incumbent upon the government to abandon its opposition to the other party as soon as it becomes apparent that its litigation stance is not substantially justified. See Ellis v. United States, 711 F.2d 1571, 1576–1577 (Fed. Cir. 1983).[6]

[6] We would thus agree with the analysis of the government's litigation position in Operating Eng'rs Local Union No. 3 v. Bohn, 541 F.Supp. 486 (D. Utah 1982). In that case, plaintiffs sued to enjoin performance of work under a road construction contract which stated incorrect wage rates. Nine days later, defendants agreed to modify the contract, and a formal modification was approved the following month. On grounds that "[o]nce the action was filed, the government acted almost immediately to concede all the substantive relief plaintiff sought," id. at 496, the court found the government's litigation position to be substantially justified. We do not, as discussed supra, express any view on that court's interpretations of the word "position."

In Tyler Business Services v. NLRB, 695 F.2d 73, 75–76 (4th Cir. 1982), the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit in applying EAJA to proceedings both on the agency level and on judicial review stated:

> The House report on the Act states that in regard to review of agency adjudications, the government must "make a positive showing that its position and actions during the course of the proceedings were substantially justified."[9] The report states this standard should also apply in reviewing the government's position in judicial proceedings.[10] For example, the government's preliminary decision to institute an administrative proceeding may not justify an award of attorney's fees. This circumstance, however, would not preclude an award, if at subsequent stages of the administrative process or upon judicial review it appears that the government's position at these levels of litigation was not substantially justified.

[9] H.R. Rep. No. 1418, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 13 (1980), reprinted in 1980 U.S. Code Cong. & Ad. News 4992 (Emphasis added).

The Tyler case was cited with approval by the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in Natchez Coca-Cola Bottling Co. v. NLRB, 750 F.2d 1350 at 1352 (5th Cir. 1985).

The General Counsel contends that the Board has rejected the view of the circuit courts and that I am bound by the Board's decision unless and until reversed by the United States Supreme Court. The General Counsel cites International Maintenance supra, for this proposition. However, the International Maintenance case simply did not address the issue presented here. In International Maintenance, the administrative law judge held that the General Counsel was substantially justified in issuing the unfair labor practice complaint because there existed a close question of law and fact concerning the supervisory status of an employee and because the General Counsel had proffered prima facie evidence regarding the alleged discriminatory discharge of two employees. The judge further recommended a rule that failure to cooperate fully in the investigatory stages of an unfair labor practice case would be per se sufficient to deny an application under the "special circumstances" safety valve. The Board, however, expressly declined to enact such a rule:

> Nor do we find it appropriate to enact a rule, as suggested by the administrative law judge, that would automatically bar an applicant from receiving benefits under the Equal Access to Justice Act for failing to cooperate in the investigatory stages of an unfair labor practice proceeding. [Id. at 1136 fn. 2]

The issue presented here, whether the Government must abandon its position when it becomes apparent that its position is not substantially justified, was never discussed by either the administrative law judge or the Board in the International Maintenance case.

As a last resort, the General Counsel argues in his posthearing brief that had I resolved credibility disputes in his favor he would have prevailed and thus, he was substantially justified under Board law. It is true under Board cases the General Counsel has avoided EAJA awards when credibility resolutions were ultimately decided against the General Counsel. See, e.g., SME Cement, 267 NLRB 763 (1983); Barrett's Interiors, 272 NLRB 527 (1984). However, that portion of the instant case that involved a credibility resolution, the testimony of Sid Lampley, union representative, on which the General Counsel attempts to rely, was a dispute which no reasonable attorney could expect to be resolved in the General Counsel's favor.[6] Sid Lampley, the General Counsel's witness, had no bargaining notes, and no explanation for the resolution of the bargaining impasse. All Lampley did was deny the testimony of the Applicant's witnesses, but was unable to offer any affirmative evidence of what occurred. Under these circumstances, the testimony of Respondent's witnesses, buttressed by bargaining notes, had to prevail over Lampley's testimony. More importantly, based on the record evidence, the General Counsel would not have prevailed even if Lampley's vague testimony had been credited. The Applicant did not need to prove that the Union waived its right to bargain over these changes but only that the Union had an opportunity to do so. The General Counsel's witnesses admitted that the Union attempted to obtain language prohibiting such practices and did not obtain the desired contract language.

IV. SPECIAL CIRCUMSTANCES

The General Counsel contends that because Respondent failed to bring pivotal facts to his attention during the precomplaint investigation under the "special circumstances" safety valve no award should be granted.

During the EAJA proceedings, the Applicant established that following the close of the unfair labor practice hearing, the Applicant's trial attorney wrote the Acting Regional Director attempting to settle the case. In this letter, dated July 21, 1983, the attorney set forth the weakness of the General Counsel's case and prepared a settlement that reflected those matters. On August 25 the Regional Attorney wrote a reply in which he stated that the Applicant should have made its evidence available prior to the issuance of complaint. He further indicated that the proposed settlement was acceptable to the Regional Office but would not be approved without the Union's concurrence.

Notwithstanding the evidence disclosed at trial, and the review of this matter by the Regional Attorney, the General Counsel continued to prosecute the case.

As previously noted, the Board in International Maintenance declined to enact a rule that an applicant failed to cooperate in the investigative stages of an unfair labor practice proceeding be automatically barred from an award under EAJA. However, the failure of the employer in International Maintenance to offer certain evidence in the investigation of that case affected the denial of an EAJA award. In that case the General Counsel was substantially justified in proceeding to complaint and trial based on the evidence of the charging party. In Danzansky-Goldberg Chapels, 272 NLRB 903, 906 (1984), the judge emphasized the importance of the Respondent's cooperation, commenting that:

> It is that cooperation that has made some of the issues raised by the EAJA application so close. The issues in this proceeding would have been much easier to resolve—in the General Counsel's favor—if during the General Counsel's investigation of the charges, the Company had withheld information from him regarding the basis for its behavior.

It is not inconsistent with the policies of EAJA to disallow costs for expenses incurred because the respondent-applicant did not cooperate in the precomplaint investigation. It is reasonable to assume that the government would not have prosecuted the case if it had known litigation would be unsuccessful. Thus, it follows that a respondent-applicant should not be rewarded for costs that it incurred solely as a result of its own litigation strategy, i.e., choosing to go to litigation rather than cooperating in the investigation. However, a respondent-applicant's failure to cooperate or failure to fully cooperate in the investigation does not absolve the Government of all responsibility. The Government must still be substantially justified at all stages of the proceeding, i.e., the Government must withdraw its opposition to the respondent-applicant when the Government's position clearly becomes frivolous, unreasonable, or groundless. Thus, the Board cases of International Maintenance and Danzansky-Goldberg are reconcilable with the court cases of Spencer v. NLRB, E.D.F. v. Watt, and Tyler Business Services.

The issue becomes whether the Government should be assessed costs ab initio because it did not withdraw immediately or whether costs should accrue as of the day it became clear that the Government's position was frivolous, unreasonable, or groundless. In my view, the best policy would be to commence costs as of the day it became clear that Government's position was groundless, if the Government did not withdraw within a reasonable period of time. If the Government withdrew within a reasonable period of time, no costs should be assessed. It is reasonable to allow the Government some time to carefully consider the evidence and make a reasoned determination about whether to withdraw or proceed. If the Government withdraws within a reasonable period of time, the costs seem attributable to the respondent-applicant's failure to cooperate in the investigation rather than the Government's litigation position. However, if the Government continues to proceed it is no longer justified and should be billed for costs. Assessing costs ab initio would not in my view encourage proper governmental action any better than assessing costs as of the day it became clear that the Government's position was no longer substantially justified. To award costs ab initio

[6] My credibility resolution reads as follows:

> The above recitation of facts is based on the credited testimony of McGuire and Fujimoto. Although Lampley denies such an exchange took place, he could give no other explanation for the breakoff in negotiations or the subsequent change resulting in a contract. Further, Lampley had only a vague recollection of the negotiations and no notes from which to refresh his memory. McGuire was a much more reliable witness regarding negotiations and had bargaining notes which he used to refresh his memory. Finally, admissions in the testimony of Alensonorin [Union president] corroborate McGuire's version of these events.

would, however, encourage respondent-applicants not to cooperate in the investigation. In the instant case, I am not willing to infer that the Government would have prosecuted the case even if it was aware of the respondent-applicant's defense prior to trial. Finally, the rule proposed herein, in my view, would encourage a respondent to attempt good-faith settlement negotiations, in which its defenses may be revealed, rather than waiting to present them at trial.

I believe the special circumstances doctrine aids the General Counsel to the extent that costs should not be assessed until it became clear, during the trial, that the Government's position was no longer justified. Special circumstances, however, do not absolve the General Counsel from costs for continuing to prosecute the case and filing a posttrial brief, after it became clear that the Government's position was frivolous, unreasonable, or groundless.

To the extent that my decision appears in conflict with that of the courts in Spencer v. NLRB and E.D.F. v. Watt, I note that both those decisions dealt with the question of an applicant that had to sue the Government in order to obtain certain relief. Here the Government sued the applicant in part because the applicant did not make the Government aware of its defense until sometime during the litigation. Thus neither Spencer nor Watt presented the issue of what effect the applicant's failure to cooperate in the precomplaint investigation should have on an award under EAJA. For the reasons expressed above, I find that granting an award from the date that it became clear the Government's position was no longer justified is consistent with the rationale of the Spencer and Watt cases, i.e., to award prevailing private parties the fees they incurred in combatting unreasonable arguments advanced by the Government, while denying fees incurred in defeating substantial arguments. Cf. Goldhaber v. Foley, 698 F.2d 193, 197 (3d Cir. 1983) (holding that EAJA must be interpreted so as to charge the Government with that portion of the expenses attributable to its unjustifiable positions). See also Ellis v. U.S., supra at 1576.

V. THE ISSUES TO WHICH THE APPLICANT DID NOT PREVAIL

The General Counsel alleges that the award should be reduced because the Applicant did not prevail concerning the direct dealing allegation. Further, the General Counsel seeks to reduce any award because the Applicant was unsuccessful in urging certain defenses that were applicable to both the successful and unsuccessful portions of the case.

An applicant may not be compensated under EAJA for fees and expenses incurred in litigating matters in which the Government's position was substantially justified, as it would contravene the purposes of EAJA to require the Government to bear the expense of defending its reasonable positions. Matthews v. U.S., 713 F.2d 677, 684 (11th Cir. 1983); Goldhaber v. Foley, supra.

In Hensley v. Eckerhart, 461 U.S. 424, 435–436 (1983), the United States Supreme Court addressed the question of whether a partially prevailing plaintiff may recover fees for time spent on unsuccessful claims. The Court held that the Congressional intent to limit awards, under the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act of 1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1988,[7] to prevailing parties, requires that unrelated claims be treated as if they had been raised in separate lawsuits, and therefore no fee may be awarded for services on the unsuccessful claims. In situations where a lawsuit cannot be viewed as a series of discrete claims, however, the court "should focus on the significance of the overall relief obtained by the plaintiff in relation to the hours reasonably expended on the litigation." A plaintiff's attorney who obtains "excellent results" is entitled to a "fully compensatory fee." This normally will include all hours expended in the litigation and should not be reduced "simply because the plaintiff failed to prevail on every contention raised in the lawsuit."

Further the Court stated:

> There is no precise rule or formula for making these determinations. The district court may attempt to identify specific hours that should be eliminated, or it may simply reduce the amount to account for the limited success. The court necessarily has discretion in making this equitable judgment. This discretion, however, must be exercised in light of the considerations we have identified. [Id. at 436–437.]

Applying the Hensley principles to this case, the Applicant is clearly not entitled to fees for time spent on the direct dealing allegation on which it was unsuccessful. The Applicant has reduced its claim for an award by a factor of 10 percent to account for this portion of the case. The trial time expended on this issue occurred prior to the time for which I am granting the award, i.e., prior to the date at trial on which the Applicant's exculpatory evidence was offered. In view of this fact and the relatively small amount of time devoted at trial (and, therefore, in the transcript) and the brief to this allegation, the 10-percent reduction appears reasonable.

The Applicant denied jurisdiction in its answer to the complaint. The Applicant's defense as to jurisdiction extended the time necessary for trial. However, that occurred prior to the period for which an award is being granted. Therefore, no further reduction in the award is necessary.

The Applicant unsuccessfully urged that the case be deferred pursuant to the Board's policy enunciated in Collyer Insulated Wire, supra. The Applicant's Collyer defense was unsuccessful. That defense was applicable to both the prevailing and unprevailing allegations of the complaint. It would have been a valid defense to the allegations on which the Applicant prevailed. It was not valid regard the allegation on which the Applicant did not prevail. However, if only the direct dealing charge was alleged against the Applicant, it is highly probable the Collyer defense would not have been raised. It was not unreasonable for the Applicant to raise the Collyer defense with regard to the allegations on which it prevailed. If the direct dealing allegations had not been included in this case, or if the direct dealing allegation had not been sustained, deferral to arbitration would have been a meritorious defense. Further, considering the Applicant's high degree of success, the award of fees should not be diminished because of a defense reasonably asserted, but not responsible for the ultimate successful outcome of the case. Thus, I will not reduce the award based on the Applicant's failure to prevail on its Collyer defense.

[7] Although the case involved the Civil Rights Attorney's Fees Awards Act, the Court said that the standards established are "generally applicable" in any case where Congress has authorized an award of fees to a prevailing party. See fn. 7.

VI. REASONABLE FEES AND EXPENSES

Pursuant to Section 102.145(c) of the Board's Rules, the judge shall consider the following factors in determining the reasonableness of fees:

(1) If the attorney, agent, or expert witness is in practice, his or her customary fees for similar services or, if an employee of the applicant, the fully allocated cost of the services.

(2) The prevailing rate for similar services in the community in which the attorney, agent, or expert witness ordinarily performs services.

(3) The time actually spent in the representation of the applicant.

(4) The time reasonably spent in light of the difficulty or complexity of the issues in the adversary adjudication proceeding.

The customary fees of Jared Jossem, the Applicant's lead attorney and trial attorney was $125 per hour. Jossem's time was computed at $75 per hour for purposes of the EAJA application pursuant to the Board's Rules. The customary fee for Perry Confalone, a law clerk and now an attorney, was computed at $65 an hour and later $75 an hour. The rates billed for the attorneys appear to conform to the prevailing rates in Honolulu, Hawaii, where they practice. The Applicant has submitted records establishing the actual time spent in the underlying proceeding and in the EAJA prosecution. The General Counsel takes issue with the reasonableness of the time and expenses.

The Applicant seeks total fees and expenses of $47,040.28.[8] That amount is a result of the deduction of certain fees attributable to the unsuccessful defense of the direct dealing allegation (on which the General Counsel prevailed) and certain charges attributable to a law clerk. Further, the application was amended at various times to include additional time spent in prosecuting the application.

a. The General Counsel contends that the Applicant's claim of 10-1/4 hours for trial preparation should be reduced to 8 hours, apparently on the ground that the Applicant called only three witnesses to testify. This approach does not take into account the quality and nature of trial preparation. Further, in view of the importance of the case to the Applicant—a monetary remedial order most likely would have forced the Applicant out of business—the amount of time spent on trial preparation does not appear unreasonable.

b. The General Counsel contends that the time allotted for a trial day should be limited to 1 hour in excess of actual court time. I do not find any basis for so reducing the award. It appears reasonable that in excess of actual trial the Applicant's attorney would spend time reviewing the day's proceedings with his client and preparing for the next day. Sessions with clients and witnesses before and after the actual court time for that day appear to be reasonable and necessary.

c. The General Counsel contends that the time claimed for brief writing is excessive. The brief was researched and written by a law clerk and the General Counsel contends that extra time was taken because of the clerk's inexperience. I find some merit in this contention. Further, the trial attorney apparently did not give the law clerk the benefit of his pretrial research.

The General Counsel further argues that the Applicant's manner of preparing the posttrial brief increased costs. The Applicant did not purchase a copy of the trial transcript (saving in excess of $1000) and utilized the General Counsel's copy of the transcript. This approach required more extensive notes, and therefore more time, than if the Applicant had purchased its own copy of the transcript. However overall, the Applicant decreased rather than increased the cost of the brief by not purchasing a copy of the transcript. The General Counsel cannot be heard to complain about this departure from the standard procedure which inured to his benefit.

In sum, because the trial attorney did not give the law clerk the benefit of his prior research and because the law clerk was inexperienced, I have reduced the claim for preparing the brief by 20 percent. See Kutska v. California State College, 564 F.2d 108 (3d Cir. 1977); Action on Smoking v. CAB, 724 F.2d 211 (D.C. Cir. 1984). The Government need not pay for the law clerk's learning experience. Further, the attorney for Applicant admitted that on occasion time spent by a new attorney or clerk is written off the client's bill as "education." My reduction of the claim is similar to such action by the law firm.

d. The General Counsel contends that the Applicant should be awarded only 4 hours at $50 per hour for prosecuting the instant application. I find that argument to be totally without merit. The Application is entitled to a reasonable award for costs in presenting its EAJA claim. Further, the prolonged nature of this litigation was caused by the General Counsel.[9] The hearing was at the request of the General Counsel, who resisted all attempts to narrow the scope of the hearing or to resolve matters without a hearing. The Applicant could not abandon its application but rather had to respond to the General Counsel's motion. It would be unjust to deny an award for such action.

I note that the General Counsel has no deterrent in EAJA for prolonging the litigation and delaying the award. There is no provision in EAJA for interest or any other sanction if the Government delays. Interest

[9] For example, after the General Counsel's motion to dismiss the application was denied, the General Counsel filed two motions for reconsideration. Second, the General Counsel refused the Applicant's offer to correct an alleged error in service. Third, the General Counsel requested a hearing but refused to follow the rules for such a request even after being so ordered by the judge. Fourth, the General Counsel has requested time extentions for the filing of papers and briefs amounting to 9 weeks.

does not run until there is a judgment against the Government. Thus, it appears to be in the General Counsel's interest to delay these proceedings. At least the General Counsel's conduct in this case strongly suggests such an approach. It is the Applicant, not the General Counsel, who has been prejudiced by the delay. It would further unjustly penalize the Applicant to impose the arbitrary and unreasonable limits on the EAJA award proposed by the General Counsel.

As the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit in Bagby v. Beal, 606 F.2d 411 (3d Cir. 1979) stated:

> If an attorney is required to spend time litigating his fee claim, yet not be compensated for that time, the attorney's effective rate for all the hours expended on the case will be correspondingly decreased. [Quoting Prandini v. National Tea Co., 585 F.2d 47, 53 (3d Cir. 1978).]

e. The General Counsel contends that since no exceptions were filed by any party, the Applicant should not be entitled to fees for work performed after my decision. However, it appears to me that time spent reviewing the decision with the client and efforts made to convince the General Counsel not to appeal the decision, are reasonable expenses related to the litigation. Contrary to the General Counsel, I do not find such to be "make work" claims.

f. The General Counsel objects to the referral of the EAJA case to the same administrative law judge that dismissed the underlying complaint allegations. Section 102.148(b) of the Board's Rules mandates that an application be referred by the Board to the judge who heard the adversary adjudication on which the application is based. That rule is in accord with EAJA, which requires the application be submitted to the "adjudicative officer of that agency." 5 U.S.C. § 504(a)(1) and (2). The purpose of referral to the same judge who heard the case is that he or she is more alert to the merits of the application with respect to such issues as partially prevailing parties, substantial justification and reasonableness of time and expenses to various aspects of the litigation. The General Counsel expressly denied that he wanted to disqualify the judge. In any event, to the extent that the General Counsel's objection is viewed as an attempt to disqualify the judge, the General Counsel did not comply with the Board's Rules for requesting disqualification of a judge. Section 102.37 of the Board's Rules; see also Top Form Mills, 273 NLRB 1246 fn. 1 (1984).

g. The General Counsel further objects to my limiting of the EAJA hearing to specific issues. Section 102.153 of the Board's Rules attempts to avoid prolonged EAJA proceedings by providing that "An evidentiary hearing shall be held only where necessary for resolution of material lissues of fact." Further the Board's Rule provides that:

> A request that the administrative law judge order further proceedings shall specifically identify the disputed issues and the evidence sought to be adduced, and shall explain why the additional proceedings are necessary to resolve the issues.

In the light of the Board's Rules the General Counsel cannot complain that the evidentiary hearing was limited by his own failure to make a specific request to litigate further matters.

h. The General Counsel's other arguments are specious and not worthy of further consideration.

VII. THE APPLICANT'S REQUEST FOR AN ADDITIONAL AWARD

The Applicant seeks an additional award to compensate for the delay in this proceeding caused by the General Counsel. See National Ass. of Concerned Vets v. Secretary of Defense, 675 F.2d 1319 at 1335 (D.C. Cir. 1982). The additional award requested represents 11-percent simple interest of the original fee award. However, as mentioned earlier, EAJA does not provide for prejudgment interest. Further, as an exception to sovereign immunity, EAJA has been strictly construed. See Monark Boat Co., 262 NLRB 994 (1982), affd. 708 F.2d 1322 (8th Cir. 1983). Accordingly, no interest payment will be awarded. However, the General Counsel's conduct in prolonging these EAJA proceedings as well as in the underlying litigation[10] has been considered and has in effect, resulted in an award greater than would be normally granted in a case of this nature.

Based on the above findings and conclusions, I shall recommend that the Applicant be awarded fees and expenses, including time spent pursuing recovery of its application under EAJA.[11]

[Recommended Order for dismissal omitted from publication.]

[10] The General Counsel prolonged the underlying litigation by inadvertently failing to comply with Sec. 102.118 of the Board's Rules in not submitting to the Applicant's trial attorney all the statements of one of his witnesses and by attempting to litigate matters dismissed from the case by the Regional Director. Further, during settlement discussions of the underlying case, the General Counsel urged the Applicant to bypass its own attorney and negotiate a settlement with the Union.

Custodis-Cottrell, Inc. and Charles Windell Bryant. Case 10–CA–21199

8 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 10 June 1986 Administrative Law Judge Hutton S. Brandon issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In adopting the judge's decision, we note that there is no basis to warrant a remand in this proceeding to allow the introduction of the joint labor/management safety agreement between Georgia Power Company and the North Georgia Construction Trades Council. (The Respondent was not a party to that agreement.) Initially, the judge sustained the Respondent's objection to the introduction of that agreement based on relevancy, but he subsequently relied on the General Counsel's offer of proof to conclude that the agreement did not create an exception to the no-strike provisions in the three existing collective-bargaining agreements applicable to the Respondent's work at the Plant Scherer site. Thus, even though the judge did not accept the agreement into evidence, he considered its materiality on the basis of this offer of proof. Moreover, based on the joint labor/management safety agreement's expressed intention not to affect existing collective-bargaining agreements, it is clear that the agreement does not create an exception to the no-strike provisions of the parties' existing collective-bargaining agreements, which set forth clear and unequivocal waivers of the right to strike at the Plant Scherer worksite.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that no exception to the no-strike clauses of the parties' collective-bargaining agreement has been established, Member Johansen disavows the judge's statement that exceptions to no-strike clauses are not to be lightly inferred. Indeed, the Supreme Court has held that waiver of the right to strike will not be lightly inferred. Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956). He finds, however, that the contractual no-strike provisions evidence a clear and unmistakable waiver of the right to engage in work stoppages such as the one at issue and concludes, in agreement with the judge, that the stoppage was unprotected.

Sharon Howard, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Mark Johnson and Robert Terry, Esqs. (Spencer, Fane, Britt & Browne), of Kansas City, Missouri, for Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HUTTON S. BRANDON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried at Forsyth, Georgia, on 25 and 26 March 1986. The charge was filed by Charles Windell Bryant, on 9 September 1985,[1] and the complaint and notice of hearing issued on 15 January 1986 alleging that Custodis-Cottrell, Inc. (Respondent or the Company), violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act, in the discharge of Bryant and 11 other employees[2] on 26 August for concertedly engaging in a work stoppage. The primary issue presented is whether the concerted work stoppage was caused by abnormally dangerous conditions for work within the meaning of Section 502 of the Act.[3]

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a New Jersey corporation with an office and place of business located at Juliette, Georgia, where it is engaged in heavy construction. During the past calendar year, Respondent purchased and received at its Juliette, Georgia location materials and supplies valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of Georgia. The complaint alleges, Respondent by its answer admits, and I find that Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Work of Respondent and Applicable Bargaining Agreements

This case requires a determination of whether abnormally dangerous working conditions existed at Respondent's Juliette, Georgia place of business on 26 August. Determination of that issue requires an understanding of Respondent's construction work and methods. The parties stipulated to most of the facts involving Respondent's operation. Thus, Respondent is involved as a contractor in the building of natural draft cooling towers for Georgia Power Company's Plant Scherer, a coal-fired power generating station in Juliette, Georgia. Respond-

[2] The complaint was amended at the hearing to include discharged employees David Sharp, Roy Walters, Don Livingston, Jay Royal, Buddy Barrett, D. Ramsey, Lump Phillips, Harold Morgan, Aubrey Johnson, D. Walker, and Marty Smith.

[3] Sec. 502 in pertinent part provides, "nor shall the quitting of labor by an employee or employees in good faith because of abnormally dangerous conditions for work at the place of employment of such employee or employees be deemed a strike under this Act."

ent completed construction of three cooling towers at Plant Scherer in the past and on 26 August was in the process of constructing a fourth tower, the one involved in this proceeding. A completed cooling tower is approximately 450 to 550 feet in height and is constructed principally of steel reinforced concrete. The principal parts of the cooling tower are the veil (the reinforced concrete walls of the structure that form the bulk of the tower), the columns (large concrete pillars that support the veil), and the internals (elements that cool the water passing through the tower).

The veil is constructed by pouring successive concentric rings of concrete one on top of the other until the top of the veil is reached. In performing the construction work, Respondent employs various crafts including ironworkers, carpenters, and laborers who are members of, or are represented by, the Iron Workers' union, the Carpenters' union, and Laborers' union, respectively. Three collective-bargaining agreements are applicable to Respondent's job. The first is the International agreement between the Carpenters, Iron Workers, and Laborers International Unions and Respondent (Natural Draft Cooling Tower Agreement). This agreement in section 11 provides:

> In the event of any dispute, the employer agrees that there will be no lock out and the unions agree that there will be no stoppage or slow down of work, nor any strike of its members, either collectively or individually, and all disputes will be settled as provided in the following paragraph.

A second agreement exists between the International Association of Bridge, Structural and Ornamental Iron Workers, Local Union No. 387 (Local 387), and the Association of Steel Erectors and Heavy Equipment operators and is applicable to Respondent's Plant Scherer job. This agreement (Local Master Agreement) includes the following clause at article 3:

> It is hereby agreed by the Union and the Employer that the Union will not resort to strikes (which includes stoppages or slow downs of work) during the life of this agreement. Accordingly, neither the Union nor the employees will instigate, promote, sponsor, engage in, honor, support, or condone any strike.

Finally, a third agreement (Plant Scherer Project Agreement) is binding on Georgia Power Company, its contractors, including Respondent, and subcontractors and the International and local unions affiliated with the Building Construction Trades Council Department, AFL–CIO. This agreement contains the following provision at article 15:

> The Union agrees that so long as the local or area agreement applicable to the central Georgia site is in effect, there shall be no strikes, refusals to work, wobbles, walk offs, slow downs, or picketing for any purpose whatever at the central Georgia site.

All local craft unions are signatory to the Plant Scherer Agreement including Local 387. All the above-noted agreements contain grievance machinery concluding in final and binding arbitration.

Under the Natural Draft Cooling Tower Agreement, Respondent employs a composite work force made up of three crafts: carpenters, laborers, and ironworkers. The agreement allows members of each union to perform tasks which under normal practice would be considered within the exclusive work jurisdiction of members of the other unions. Article 9 of the same agreement provides "high pay," a wage premium for work performed by employees on high construction. The parties stipulated that the construction work involved in this case is inherently hazardous, that employees work at high elevations, and that, as is the case in most construction industry jobs, they are constantly exposed to the elements. They work on a four-tier rope mesh enclosed (except at the top level) scaffold surrounding the inter and outer rim of the veil. There is a waist-high outside handrail on each level of the scaffold. The scaffold is anchored in concrete and supported by I-beams.

The morning shift begins at 7 a.m. when the composite crew ascends to the scaffold by way of a wire-mesh enclosed stairway anchored to the veil wall. The composite crew breaks away the plywood forms from the previous day's pour. The carpenters then shape the plywood panels for the formation of the next set of forms utilizing electric saws and drills, the electricity for which is supplied by power cables and extension cords running up the veil walls and around the scaffold.

In preparation for the next pour the scaffold is raised approximately 5 feet by a hydraulic pump through a process which takes approximately 30 to 60 minutes. Work continues during the raising of the scaffold with the ironworkers finishing the installation of horizontal reinforcing steel (rebar) and beginning to place and tie the vertical rebar, which will be covered in the next day's pour. In effect, the vertical rebar is placed a day ahead of the pour which covers it.

Also during the jacking process, the laborers spray lubricating oil on the plywood forms and, after the jacking is completed, the carpenters complete buckling the oiled forms into place. The ironworkers continue to install the reinforcing steel and the laborers connect the pipes which carry the concrete for the pour around the veil rim.

Before the pour begins, the forms are inspected by the field superintendent who also inspects the scaffold to make sure that it is properly placed and securely supported. Following this, orders for concrete are submitted and after testing of the concrete as it is delivered, the concrete is pumped from the base of the veil to the level of the pour. The laborers are responsible for performing the pouring of the concrete and use an electrical tool referred to as a vibrator, which is inserted in the concrete to eliminate air pockets. During the pour the ironworkers complete the tying of horizontal steel rods and, when installation of all steel is completed, the ironworkers and the carpenters distribute reinforcing steel around the scaffold for placement during the next day's shift. In addition, the crew normally cleans up the scaffold. Completion of these operations normally coincides with the end of the shift. After the shift is completed, the employees descend from the veil. The foregoing is essentially repeated each day until the veil is completed. It was stipulated that it is the practice in the industry not to interrupt the concrete pour except in extraordinary circumstances.

B. The 26 August Walkoff

It is undisputed that on 26 August, Respondent employed approximately 145 employees on its project. This figure included 15 ironworkers, 15 carpenters, and 17 laborers working on the scaffold on tower 4. At the time work began at 7 a.m., the sky was overcast and chances of rain appeared to be increasing. That rain with thundershowers was moving into the central Georgia area beginning in the early morning as evidenced by the testimony of David Livingston, the official in charge of the National Weather Service Station in Macon, Georgia, and official U.S. weather radar observation records made from the U.S. Weather Services Radar Station at Athens, Georgia. According to Livingston's testimony and the radar records, the intensity of the rain and thundershowers increased as the morning wore on. However, Livingston was unable to testify that showers occurred at Juliette, Georgia, during the morning of 26 August or that thunder or lightning occurred at that location. Livingston testified that rain had been observed at his location, the Macon airport south of Macon, and more than 30 miles from Juliette but no thunder or lightning.

That it did rain at the Plant Scherer site during the morning of 26 August is not disputed. What is disputed is the time of the rain, the intensity of the rain, and whether any thunder or lightning was associated with the rain. On that morning Respondent's operation was at pour 21 on tower 4 which meant that at that point the men working on the veil were working approximately 140 feet high. Charging Party Bryant testified that it rained all morning on 26 August, at times harder than at other times. He related that around 10 o'clock he heard thunder at a distance. However, he saw no lightning.[4] According to Bryant, who like most of the ironworkers worked on the top level of the scaffold, the employees began to talk about the bad conditions and "going home." The concrete pour began around 10:30 a.m. The ironworkers' foreman, Bobby Brock, came by and, based on Bryant's uncontradicted and credible testimony, was "cussing" about the wisdom of starting the pour. Around 11:30 a.m. when it was still raining "hard," Bryant saw some ironworkers leaving to descend the stairway from the veil. Bryant testified that he and his coworker, ironworker Howard Morgan, therefore decided they would leave also, but as they began to do so, they were told by Brock that if they were going down, they should go back and remove the vertical rebar that had been set in place but not tied. They did so and then proceeded to go down the stairs, but not before Brock told them that if they went down they were fired.

It is undisputed that 11 ironworkers in addition to Bryant left the veil at approximately 11:30 a.m. and went home. Three ironworkers, including Foreman Brock, remained on the veil and completed the work that day. The carpenters and laborers also remained on the job and completed the work. The concrete pour continued and Respondent finished the job by drawing workers from other points on the project.

The 12 ironworkers who walked off the job were discharged. Of those that testified in this proceeding, all contended that the work on the veil on 26 August under the conditions prevailing was unsafe. Specifically, Bryant testified that it was difficult to work with wet gloves and with water running out of his shoes. Others complained that there was a possibility of lightning striking the scaffold, and that the scaffolding was oily and wet making it slick and difficult for employees to move around.

Norman "Buddy" Barrett, one of the ironworkers who walked off, testified that the rain had begun gradually but kept getting harder and finally before the pour started, it was a "flood." He found it necessary to drop down to the next level of the scaffold as some of the other ironworkers did so that at least the floor of the scaffold above him gave some protection from the rain. Barrett testified that he walked out with the other ironworkers because he felt like it was raining too hard, that it was making everything slick, and that it made it difficult to see what one was doing.

Three ironworkers in addition to Bryant, Donald Livingston, "Lump" Phillips, and Martin Smith all testified that they had heard thunder during the morning. Thus, Livingston related that he had heard thunder in the distance and it was "coming" about the time the concrete trucks arrived for the pour.[5] Further, Livingston testified that around the same time he saw lightning in the distant north and described it as intercloud lightning rather than cloud to ground lightning. He further testified that 20 to 30 minutes after the heavier rain started he descended to the next lower level of the scaffold for protection from the rain. Although he and other ironworkers who did the same thing did not perform any work on the second level, none were rebuked for their presence on the lower level.

Phillips testified that he heard thunder 30 to 40 minutes before "the bottom fell out." However, he added that Bryant heard it too and, as already related, Bryant testified it occurred around 10 a.m. According to Phillips when "the bottom fell out," Foreman Brock came by and, referring to Field Superintendent Jack Richey, remarked he had gone "crazy" and ordered the concrete. Phillips further testified without contradiction that some of the ironworkers replied that they were not going to work and that Brock responded saying he could not tell them what to do but "you'd be a damn fool to stay up here and work." Nevertheless, as the ironworkers were in the process of leaving, Brock met them at the stairs and told them to remove the vertical rebar before leaving. Some of them did so and then approached the stairs to descend. At that point Brock stated that anybody that "hit the ground" was fired. Brock did not testify. Phillips is credited regarding the statements attributed to Brock.

[4] Respondent, in the testimony of its Field Superintendent Jack Richey, conceded that when there is thunder and lightning, the men are removed from the tower because then "it's just not a good place to be." If a pour has begun, however, a few men may be left on the tower to bulkhead the pour after which they go to the ground.

Smith testified that he had heard thunder at a distance that morning. Because Smith testified it was at a time when he was pulling concrete forms, I conclude that it was prior to the time the jacking of the scaffold occurred so that it must have been some 30 to 40 minutes prior to the time the pour began around 10:30 a.m.

Neil Rosser, called as a witness by the General Counsel, was one of the ironworkers who did not leave the job on 26 August. And while Rosser did not testify concerning any lightning or thunder, he testified that it began raining that morning some 20 to 30 minutes after he started work and got gradually harder during the morning. He related that it was raining hard prior to the time the pour began. At that time he went down to the second level of the scaffold. According to Rosser, because he wore prescription glasses and because the rain was so heavy, he could not see what he was doing. He related that if he had been told that he had to work or go home, he would have had to leave. However, because he said he understood that there was a provision in the collective-bargaining agreement that once a pour had started he could not leave due to weather without being fired, he decided to stay.

The consensus of the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses was that the heavier rain when mixed with the oil flowing from the oiled concrete forms made the scaffold slippery. They complained that the heavy rain affected their ability to see what they were doing. Although there were drainage channels or slots in the pick boards (the scaffold floor), at least one of the witnesses said that some of the slots were filled with concrete and water stood in certain areas. All the General Counsel's witnesses testified that they felt that the weather conditions on the job at the time of the walkoff made the job unsafe. However, only Smith referred to the danger from lightning involved in setting up 17-foot lengths of vertical reinforcing concrete at the top of the veil rim as the ironworkers were required to do.

Respondent's witnesses including Field Superintendent Richey, Laborers' Foreman Tallent, and Carpenters' Foreman Rodney McCant, all denied hearing any thunder or seeing any lightning on the morning of the walkoff. All agree, however, that there had been rain that morning. Richey stated there had been a moderate shower before the jacking was completed at 8:59 a.m. There was no more rain until about 10:30 a.m. The pour started about 10:30 a.m. and about 10 to 20 minutes later, there was a "pretty good rain which did not affect visibility." Tallent described the shower occurring after the pour started as a "small shower" while McCant described it as a "moderate rain that did not obscure visibility." On the other hand, Respondent's witness, Craig P. Parkins, a carpenter, described the rain as a "pretty heavy rain," but he could still see across the interior of the veil some 250 to 300 feet. Carpenter employee Allan McCant likewise described the rain at the time the ironworkers left as "a pretty good" rain. Similarly, laborers' employee Robert Gray described the rain as a steady rain, while carpenters' employee Thomas Seymour testified it was raining "pretty good" when the carpenters left. None of Respondent's witnesses attributed any increase in risks on the job as a result of the rain or existing weather conditions at the time of the walkoff. They encountered no visibility problems which interfered with their work, denied the existence of any standing water on the pick boards, and generally denied the existence of any increased slipperiness due to rain and excess oil on the scaffold. In short, according to Respondent's evidence, the weather conditions did not create any greater danger of injury on the job than otherwise existed on a normal workday on the tower.

C. Argument of the Parties

The General Counsel argues, as the complaint alleges, that Bryant and the other ironworkers walked off the job because of their good-faith belief that the existing working conditions on the job at the time of the walkoff made the job abnormally dangerous within the meaning of Section 502 of the Act. While conceding that the job was inherently dangerous because of the height at which the employees were required to work, the weather conditions presented new factors which changed the character of the normal working conditions and made them abnormally dangerous within the meaning of Section 502. Therefore, the General Counsel asserts, because the walkoff did not constitute a strike by virtue of the application of Section 502, the walkoff was protected and Respondent's discharge of Bryant and the 11 other ironworkers interfered with their Section 7 rights and violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

Briefly stated Respondent's argument and defense is that the working conditions of the ironworkers were not abnormally dangerous at the time they left work and their walkoff, therefore, was not protected under Section 502. Accordingly, Respondent by virtue of the no-strike clauses in the collective-bargaining agreements was within its right in discharging those who walked off the job.

D. Conclusions

Normally, a concerted work stoppage of employees to protect their working conditions, such as a requirement that they work in the rain, is consistent with their Section 7 rights and is protected under the Act. See Quality C.A.T.V., 278 NLRB 1282 (1986); McEver Engineering, 275 NLRB 921 (1985), enfd. 784 F.2d 634 (5th Cir. 1986). But an employer does not interfere with employee Section 7 rights under the Act by discharging them for engaging in a strike in breach of a no-strike provision in a collective-bargaining agreement. This is because, generally speaking, no-strike clauses are viewed as a quid pro quo for provisions on binding arbitration of disputes between parties. Thus, if the dispute is arbitrable, it is presumed that the no-strike agreement prohibits employees from engaging in work stoppages in furtherance of that dispute. Section 502 of the Act, however, precludes a work stoppage in the face of "abnormally dangerous" working conditions from being treated as a strike or work stoppage which would otherwise breach a no-strike provision. See Clark Engineering v. Carpenters, 510 F.2d 1075, 1079–1080 (6th Cir. 1975). The Board has long held that the test for determining the existence of abnormally dangerous conditions under Section 502 is an objective one. Thus, in Redwing Carriers, 130 NLRB 1208 (1961), enfd. as modified 325 F.2d 1011 (D.C. Cir. 1963), cert. denied 377 U.S. 905 (1964), the Board stated (at 1209):

> We are of the opinion that the term contemplates, and is intended to insure, an objective, as opposed to a subjective, test. What controls is not the state of mind of the employee or employees concerned, but whether the actual working conditions shown to exist by competent evidence might in the circumstances reasonably be considered "abnormally dangerous."

Likewise, in Gateway Coal Co. v. Mine Workers, 414 U.S. 368 (1974), the Supreme Court rejected a subjective test as the measure for determining the existence of an "abnormally dangerous conditions" under Section 502 stating at 386–387:

> [A] union seeking to justify a contractually prohibited stoppage under Section 502 must present ascertainable, objective evidence supporting its conclusion that an abnormally dangerous condition for work exists.

This objective standard or measure has consistently been followed in Section 502 cases. See, e.g. Gibraltar Steel Corp., 273 NLRB 1012 (1984); L. E. Myers Co., 270 NLRB 1010 (1984); Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 269 NLRB 881 (1984); Richmond Tank Car Co., 264 NLRB 174 (1982); Baker Marine Corp., 258 NLRB 680 (1981); True Drilling Co., 257 NLRB 426 (1981).

Moreover, when the work involved is inherently dangerous, a finding of the existence of an "abnormally dangerous" work situation may not be based on previously existing conditions of longstanding endured by the employees for a considerable period prior to a work stoppage. As stated by the administrative law judge with Board approval in Anaconda Aluminum Co., 197 NLRB 336 at 344 (1972):

> Absent the emergence of new factors or circumstances which change the character of the danger, work which is recognized and accepted by employees as inherently dangerous does not become "abnormally dangerous" merely because employee patience with prevailing conditions wears thin or their forbearance ceases. [Citations omitted.]

And, the hazard presented by the "abnormally dangerous" working conditions must not be speculative. Rather, the abnormally dangerous working conditions must put the employees in imminent peril. Mine Workers District 6 (Consolidation Coal Co.), 217 NLRB 541, 551 (1975).

Considering the instant case in light of the foregoing principles, I am compelled to the conclusion that the General Counsel has not established the existence of an abnormally dangerous condition of work at the time of the walkoff of the 12 ironworkers here.

The record herein fully depicts the general working conditions of employees working on the veil. That it was inherently dangerous was conceded by all parties. The critical factual issue is whether the weather viewed by objective standards changed those working conditions from normally inherently dangerous to abnormally dangerous. The elements of weather cited by the General Counsel's witnesses as creating the extra hazardous conditions were the lightning (as indicated by the thunder) and the rain. Temperature and wind were not claimed to be factors.

No doubt the presence of lightning in the vicinity of the tower would create a new and dangerous working condition not normally encountered in the day-to-day routine. And as Field Superintendent Richey conceded, if lightning was observed in the vicinity, all employees would have been removed from the tower with the exception of only a few necessary to stop a concrete pour if one had started. Although the General Counsel called an electrical engineer as a witness, Dr. Paul Steffes, to testify regarding risks entailed in working in high places under lightning conditions, it takes no expert in light of human experience to recognize the dangers involved. However, while Steffes testified that lightning was not entirely predictable, he pointed out that distant thunder would not indicate imminent risk.

On the basis of the record considered as a whole and that testimony which I deem credible, objective evidence does not establish an imminent peril from lightning at the time of the work stoppage. Accepting the testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses regarding hearing thunder, such thunder was remote in both distance from the site and time from the walkoff. The last thunder Bryant claims to have heard was around 10 o'clock, an hour and a half before the work stoppage, and even then he admitted it was not "real close." This was the same thunder heard by Smith who had placed it much earlier in time. Phillips also heard the thunder heard by Bryant. Livingston's testimony was somewhat contradictory on the time he heard the thunder. At one point he put the thunder as occurring an hour after the shift began long before the work stoppage. However, at another point in his testimony in explaining why he left the job, he put the thunder and lightning around the time of the pour and related:

> I could see across the horizon farther from me, like north, I could see there even more. I could see lightning there and I could hear thunder, and there was more coming and the wind was blowing that way.

Based on the U.S. Weather Service maps in evidence, the path of the bad weather system was from the southwest to the northeast. Thus, to the extent Livingston saw lightning on the north horizon it was not headed in his direction. In view of this and because no other witness heard thunder at any time within an hour of the time the ironworkers left, I find Livingston's testimony on the point to be an incredible exaggeration. I find there were no abnormally dangerous conditions existent at the time of the walkoff due to lightning.[6]

From a consensus of the testimony of witnesses of both the General Counsel and Respondent, one must conclude that a more intense rain began around the time the concrete pour started. Although the witnesses differ in their description of the intensity of the rain, I conclude that the rain was at least "drenching." Notwithstanding the fact that a number of ironworkers sought shelter on the second level of the scaffold, they no doubt became thoroughly wet after the concrete pour began if they were not already wet from the earlier, but slower, rain that morning.[7] I have no doubt that some were uncomfortable and possibly miserable because they were wet. I am also confident that the rain slowed, if it did not stop altogether, their work pace and made their jobs more difficult. As some of the witnesses noted, it was difficult working in wet gloves and one or two noted that rain on their prescription glasses hampered their sight and work activity. Nevertheless, I find neither the rain nor the wetness of the scaffold created an abnormally dangerous working condition. Uncontradicted testimony reflects that oil and water was present on the scaffold on a daily basis, the former as a result of the spraying of the concrete forms and the latter as a result of the frequent hosing off of spilled concrete from the scaffold.

I reject that testimony of the General Counsel's witnesses that the scaffold was made slick by the rain. It is undisputed that the pick boards, the walking surface of the scaffold, had a roughened surface which was designed to prevent slipperiness. Moreover, the pick boards had channels in them for draining off water. Although the channels may have been blocked in places, it is inconceivable that each segment of the picks all the way around the veil were so blocked as to create a general safety problem. There was no complaint regarding the slipperiness of the pick boards earlier in the day and substantially before the work stoppage even though they must have become wet from the rain earlier that morning. In addition, unrefuted employer records revealed that the ironworkers had worked before in the rain on a number of occasions on tower 4. The intensity of the rain may not have been as great on such occasions, but prior work under rain conditions demonstrates that rain per se did not decrease significantly the safety of the scaffold or the work.

Some of the General Counsel's witnesses suggested that the scaffold was more unsafe in the rain in view of raw materials and tools which cluttered the scaffold surface. This too appears to have been a normal condition. Rosser testified without contradiction that the scaffold was normally cluttered and it was "normally a hazard anyway."

Did the rain affect the visibility to the extent it rendered the job abnormally dangerous? I conclude that it did not. Those employees who stopped work and descended to the second scaffold level to escape the rain were not reprimanded by Respondent. They thus could avoid any hazard associated with attempting to work in poor visibility. Moreover, and in any event, I conclude the rain did not constitute a significant visibility problem even for those wearing glasses. In so concluding, I find incredible Smith's testimony that it was raining so hard he could not see his hand in front of his face. That testimony was contradicted by another credible General Counsel's witness, Rosser, who had no monetary interest in the outcome of the case and was less likely to be biased. Rosser testified that he could see across the veil, a distance of more than 150 feet during the rain.

Finally, although not dispositive, it is nevertheless significant that only 12 ironworkers left the job while 3 other ironworkers remained as well as the 17 laborers and 15 carpenters. It is further noteworthy that the latter two crafts, unlike the ironworkers, worked with electrical equipment in the rain in the performance of their jobs and, thus, conceivably encountered greater electrical risks by working in the rain. Apparently, however, they discerned no imminent peril and stayed on the job.

Considering all the foregoing, I find and conclude that the working conditions of the ironworkers on 26 August at the time of the work stoppage were not made "abnormally dangerous" by the then-existent weather situation. Nothing had changed from their normal working conditions except, perhaps, for their subjective perceptions of danger. Thus, the application of Section 502 does not render the work stoppage here protected. Therefore, the work stoppage remained unprotected, and the discharges for participation in the work stoppage did not violate the Act.

At the hearing the General Counsel sought to introduce evidence of a joint labor/management safety agreement between Georgia Power Company and the North Georgia Building and Construction Trades Council applicable to the Plant Scherer job, and allegedly applicable to contractors, including Respondent, on the project. In the absence of a clear explanation by the General Counsel of how the safety agreement related to the issues in the instant case, Respondent's objection based on relevance to the receipt in evidence of the agreement was sustained. The General Counsel was allowed to make an offer of proof, however. In her brief, the General Counsel requested reconsideration of my ruling on the subject, and, relying on the safety agreement, argued that the ironworkers engaging in the work stoppage were seeking to enforce that agreement. She claimed that under the safety agreement, the ironworkers were not required to work under unsafe conditions and concluded that in view of the "driving rain and thunder [which] created emergent conditions, it is unreasonable to require

[6] Dr. Steffes testified regarding a lightning "zone of protection" established by the National Bureau of Standards (NBS). According to Dr. Steffes, under the NBS standard, a reasonable zone of lightning protection extends in the form of a cone from the highest structure in an area with the diameter of the cone at its base being twice the height of the structure. The record shows that a 1000-foot tall chimney was located about 900 to 1000 feet from tower 4. Thus, tower 4, or portions of it, may have been within the zone of lightning protection from the chimney which was fully grounded even though tower 4 was approximately 150 feet tall. However, no exact measurements are reflected in the record, and I make no specific finding on this point.

[7] Some of the members of the composite crew had donned rainwear earlier. Apparently most of the ironworkers had not requested rainwear from Respondent until after the harder rain began.

or expect employees to follow grievance complaint procedures."

While not clearly articulated, it appears that the General Counsel is arguing that the safety agreement created an exception to Respondent's no-strike clauses in its agreements with the Iron Workers Union. This would make the safety agreement relevant to a determination of the protected nature of the walkout and make Section 502 and the objective test thereunder inapplicable. Accordingly, to address the issue, I shall reverse my ruling at the hearing and accept the General Counsel's offer of proof.

Based on the offer of proof, the safety agreement provides that employees shall not be required to work under unsafe conditions, and precludes disciplining employees for complying with company safety procedures or Government rules. No evidence was presented, however, that the employees were being asked or directed to breach any company policy of Georgia Power Company or Respondent or violate any specific Government rule.[8] Moreover, Respondent's counsel, in arguing at the hearing the irrelevance of the safety agreement, quoted without objection or contradiction from the General Counsel the following provision in the labor/management safety agreement; "The cooperative effort of a labor/management safety and health program is not intended to affect existing collective-bargaining agreements."

The General Counsel was unable to cite any authority at the hearing and cited none in her brief to support the no-strike exception she now claims. It is patently clear that the safety agreement does not expressly create an exception to Respondent's no-strike clauses and the General Counsel does not argue otherwise. Instead, she apparently seeks to create an implied exception which would justify employee use of a subjective standard here in determining the existence of dangerous working conditions. Exceptions to no-strike clauses are not to be lightly inferred. As the Supreme Court, in rejecting a subjective measure for establishing abnormally dangerous conditions of work for Section 502 cases, said in Gateway Coal Co., supra at 386:

> Absent the most explicit statutory command, we are unwilling to conclude that Congress intended the public policy favoring arbitration and peaceful resolution of labor disputes to be circumvented by so slender a thread as subjective judgment, however honest it may be.

By logical extension the same strong public policy in favor of peaceful resolution of labor disputes militates against any implied exception of the no-strike clauses based on the labor/management safety agreement here. Such an inference is particularly unwarranted when the safety agreement specifically provides that it will not affect existing bargaining agreements of the contractors. In particular, it should not override an existing bargaining agreement containing its own safety provision.

The fact that a dispute on a safety complaint may not be immediately resolved through a grievance procedure also does not compel the implied exception the General Counsel seeks. If it were otherwise, all no-strike clauses would be rendered ineffective by the subjective perception of employees regarding safety concerns, and Section 502 of the Act, insofar as it applies to work stoppages for abnormally dangerous working conditions would become meaningless surplusage.

Finally, and in any event, it must be noted that the ironworkers who walked off the job on 26 August were not shown to be aware of a safety agreement, much less seeking to implement its terms. Thus, there is no factual basis for finding that they were protected under the theory that they were seeking to implement the terms of a labor/management safety agreement creating an exception to the no-strike clauses.

Considering the foregoing, I conclude no exception to the no-strike clauses has been established by the General Counsel. I find the employees who were discharged for walking off on 26 August were unprotected under the Act and their discharges, therefore, did not violate the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent, Custodis-Cottrell, Inc. is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(1) of the Act in the discharge of the employees named in the complaint, as amended, who engaged in the work stoppage on 26 August 1985.
3. Respondent did not violate the Act in any other manner set forth in the complaint.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[9]

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed in its entirety.

[8] The Plant Scherer project agreement which Respondent concedes is binding on it and which contains one of the no-strike clauses relied on by Respondent in its defense contains its own provision on safety at art. 14. There the employees agreed to be bound by the "safety rules and regulations as established by the Employer in accordance with the Construction Safety Act and OSHA." There was no evidence presented in this case reflecting or even suggesting that Respondent's operations on 26 August breached any such safety rules or regulations.

[9] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

Case 22-CA-14083

10 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 14 October 1986 Administrative Law Judge James F. Morton issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions as modified and to adopt the recommended Order.

The Respondent, Joseph De Rario, DMD, P.A., operates a dental office located in Oakhurst, New Jersey. De Rario employs between 12 and 15 people. Sandra Falcone began working for the Respondent as a hygiene assistant in May 1985 and performed the regular duties of a hygienist including preparing the room, taking and mounting X-rays, and discussing home care with the patients. In August 1985 Falcone received an above-average performance rating. At or about that time she also assumed two additional duties. The first was administering temporal mandibular joint or "TMJ" therapy, a form of facial and neck massage, to patients. The second was acting as a periodontal assistant to Dr. Chang, which entailed preparing the room for the periodontist and assisting him during the procedures.

On Thursday, 10 October 1985,[2] one of the dentists, Dr. Trufolo, held a meeting with the employees to express his displeasure at some of the work-related problems which had occurred that day. Sandy Falcone and a coworker, Lisa Manrodt, were sitting together on the same chair. During the meeting Manrodt interrupted Dr. Trufolo several times and disagreed with his comments. The Respondent's office manager, Vickie Devaney, was present at the meeting and, when it ended, she told Manrodt and Falcone that she wanted to see them in her office. Devaney then criticized both Manrodt and Falcone for what she considered to be their childish behavior during the Trufolo meeting. She stated that during the meeting they were giggling and punching each other and that she was very embarrassed by their behavior. She also reprimanded both Manrodt and Falcone because the two women had allegedly been spending too much time together socializing during working hours which was interfering with the performance of their jobs.

Falcone and Manrodt became very upset at what they perceived as unjust criticism and tried to discuss the matter quietly with Devaney. However, Devaney became increasingly distraught, began to yell, and slammed her hands on her desk. Falcone testified that she decided to "just agree with her because she's not going to listen to anything that we have to say." At that point Falcone and Manrodt left the room.

During the weekend following the 10 October meeting, Falcone and Manrodt discussed their meeting with Devaney and composed a summary of their account of the meeting. Falcone also telephoned three coworkers during the weekend and explained to each of them the unfair treatment she and Manrodt believed they had received from Devaney at the 10 October meeting with her. One of the employees Falcone called, Donna White, also expressed her dissatisfaction at the unfair treatment she was receiving from Devaney at work. During these telephone conversations, Falcone discussed with each of the three employees she called Manrodt's and her view that the employees should get overtime pay when they worked during their own time and that they should not have to pay anything toward the cost of their uniforms.[3] Falcone was told by these employees that she should go to see Devaney on Monday. On Monday, 14 October 1985,[4] the three employees whom Falcone had telephoned told Devaney, before Falcone arrived for work, that Falcone had telephoned them over the weekend and discussed various matters including the 10 October meeting Devaney had held with Falcone and Manrodt, overtime pay, and the cost of uniforms. These employees also told Devaney that they had told Falcone to talk directly to Devaney on Monday morning.

On the morning of 14 October 1985, Falcone asked to speak with Devaney, and they met shortly thereafter in private. Several items were discussed

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] The judge inadvertently states that this meeting was held on Friday, 11 October 1985.

[3] De Rario's employees pay one-half the cost of their required work uniforms and, not infrequently, are expected to work during their own time, i.e., during lunch hours and after the normal workday, without receiving additional compensation.

[4] The judge erroneously refers to the date of this meeting as 15 October 1985 in his decision.

at that meeting. One of the first items discussed was that Falcone and Manrodt were very upset about the 10 October 1985 meeting they had with Devaney because they felt that Devaney was falsely accusing them of spending too much worktime together. Falcone then told Devaney that she was becoming ill during the times she assisted the periodontist because there was "a lot of blood" during some of the procedures and asked if she could be relieved of these duties to concentrate on areas in which she believed she performed better. Devaney told her that she could not hire another assistant to perform the work but that Falcone could ask another dental assistant to switch duties with her. Falcone also brought up the subject of her TMJ therapy duties. Falcone stated that while she enjoyed the work, she felt that she was entitled to some additional type of compensation for performing the therapy as it was not in her job duties when she was hired. At that point, Devaney threatened to take the TMJ duties away from Falcone, who objected. Falcone then brought up the subject of payment for overtime, to which Devaney responded by banging her hand on the desk and saying that she had no legal obligation to pay overtime as she had fought that matter out. Falcone stated that "by law De Rario is required to pay us for a hundred per cent of our overtime hours" and "a hundred percent for our uniforms." According to the credited testimony, it was at that point that Devaney stated: "That's it, Sandy. You're out of hand, you have an attitude problem, I can't deal with you anymore . . . you can have two weeks or stay till the end of the day." When Falcone asked Devaney if that meant she was fired, Devaney responded that it did.

At that point Falcone walked out of the office and went home. She returned to the office around noon and asked Devaney for her job back. Devaney denied the request and told Falcone that she would not rehire her "after what took place over the weekend and because of all the threats she made this morning."

Later that day Falcone then went to see De Rario who called Devaney into his office to hear her account. Devaney told De Rario that she fired Falcone "number one . . . because of [her] attitude. Number two, because [she] refused to do periodontal assisting. Number three . . . because [she] demanded to be paid for TMJ therapy. Number four . . . because . . . [she] demanded to be paid for overtime hours. Number five, because [she] demanded to be paid for your uniforms." Falcone told De Rario that she never refused to perform periodontal assistant duties or demanded to be paid for TMJ work. De Rario upheld the decision to fire Falcone. De Rario did not testify at the hearing.

For the following reasons, we find that Sandra Falcone was discharged as a result of her concerted activities protected by Section 7 of the Act. In Meyers II,[5] the Board reaffirmed its adoption of the following definition of "concerted activities" in Meyers I:[6] "In general, to find an employee's activity to be 'concerted,' we shall require that it be engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself."[7] Moreover, once activity is found to be concerted, an 8(a)(1) violation will be found if, in addition, the employer knew of the concerted nature of the activity, the activity was protected by the Act, and the adverse employment action at issue was motivated by the protected, concerted activity.[8] In the present case, Falcone clearly acted on a collective basis "with or on the authority of other employees." As the judge found in his decision, Falcone received authorization from the employees to discuss various complaints including overtime pay and uniform allowances. The employees whom Falcone called over the weekend told her to talk to Devaney on Monday. Therefore her activities were concerted.

Furthermore, the Respondent was made aware of the concerted nature of Falcone's actions. On 14 October 1986 prior to Devaney's meeting with Falcone, the three employees to whom Falcone spoke over the weekend told Devaney that they had been called by Falcone over the weekend. They specifically informed her that Falcone had discussed the 10 October meeting Devaney had with Manrodt and Falcone, the Respondent's failure to pay overtime, and its failure to reimburse employees for the full cost of their uniforms. These employees told Devaney that they had advised Falcone to talk to Devaney about these matters on Monday. Devaney also admitted at the hearing that Falcone told her at the 14 October meeting that "she [Falcone] was the spokesperson for everyone because they were afraid to talk with me." Falcone's concerted activities are clearly protected under the Act since the subjects the employees discussed constitute terms and conditions of employment.[9]

We also find that the General Counsel satisfied the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the Respondent's discharge of Fal-

[9] Member Johansen, who did not participate in Meyers, agrees that Falcone's activities were concerted, and that the Employer knew of that activity.

cone was based on Falcone's protected concerted activities. In NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), the Supreme Court affirmed the test enunciated by the Board in Wright Line[10] for determining whether an employee was discharged because of the exercise of Section 7 rights. Under Wright Line the General Counsel, under Section 10(c) of the Act, has the burden of establishing a prima facie case that the employee's protected conduct was a substantial or motivating factor in the employee's discharge or other adverse action taken by the employer. Once the General Counsel satisfies this burden, the employer can avoid liability under the Act by proving by a preponderance of the evidence an affirmative defense that it would have taken the same action even if the unlawful motives had not existed.

In the instant case, the General Counsel established that at least three reasons Devaney gave for firing Falcone—Falcone's attitude,[11] her demand for payment of overtime compensation, and for payment of uniform allowances for the employees—involved protected concerted activities under the Act. At that point, the Respondent could only avoid being held in violation of the Act by proving by a preponderance of the evidence that even absent the improper motives, it would have discharged Falcone for legitimate reasons. While the Respondent proffered additional reasons for firing Falcone—that Falcone refused to assist the periodontist and that she demanded to be paid the full amount for performing TMJ therapy—the judge discredited these reasons and found them to be "pretextual."[12] Thus, the only credited reasons the Respondent gave for firing Falcone were based on her protected concerted activities.[13] The Respondent therefore failed to prove that even absent unlawful motivations, it would have discharged Falcone. Accordingly, we find that Falcone was unlawfully terminated for engaging in protected concerted activities in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Joseph De Rario, DMD, P.A., Oakhurst, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order, except that the attached notice is substituted for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge any of you for engaging in concerted activities for your mutual aid and protection.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Sandra Falcone immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her former seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from her discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL expunge from our files any reference to her disciplinary discharge and WE WILL notify her that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge WILL not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against her.

JOSEPH DE RARIO, DMD, P.A.

[10] Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), approved in NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983).

[11] Devaney's first reason given for firing Falcone was her attitude problem. It appears that Devaney was referring to Falcone's attitude in voicing her group concerns regarding payment for employees' overtime and uniform allowances. Thus, as noted above, after Falcone told her that the Respondent was required "by law" to pay "for a hundred per cent of our overtime hours" and "a hundred percent for our uniforms," Devaney responded: "You're out of hand, you have an attitude problem, I can't deal with you anymore . . . you can have two weeks or stay till the end of the day."

[12] The judge credited Falcone's testimony that she only requested to be paid some compensation for performance of TMJ therapy, and that she did not demand that the Respondent pay her the full amount he received for the therapy sessions as Devaney testified. Since Falcone was making this demand on her own behalf and had not sought support from any other employees, her demand for additional compensation was not concerted activity under the Act. However, it is clear that the Respondent has not established that it would have discharged Falcone solely for making this request.

[13] As we note above, Devaney in citing "attitude" appeared to be referring to Falcone's complaints with respect to overtime and uniform allowances. However, even if "attitude" included matters related to work performance, we find the Respondent has not met its burden to establish that these matters would have resulted in Falcone's discharge even in the absence of her protected concerted activities.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

JAMES F. MORTON, Administrative Law Judge. The complaint alleges that Joseph De Rario, DMD, PA (Respondent) discharged Sandra Falcone in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act. The General Counsel contends that Respondent discharged Falcone because of her role as employee spokesperson in seeking overtime pay and other employee benefits. Respondent asserts that she was discharged because she stated that she would refuse to perform assigned tasks.

I heard this case on 18 and 24 April 1986 in Newark, New Jersey. On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the briefs filed by the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The pleadings, as amended, establish and I find that Respondent is engaged in the practice of dentistry and that its operations meet the Board's jurisdictional standard for health care institutions.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background

Respondent has about 12 employees at its dental office in Oakhurst, New Jersey. Sandra Falcone began working there as a hygiene assistant in May 1985. Respondent arranged to have her learn the technique in administering a form of neck and facial massage (TMJ therapy), and in late August 1985, that function was added to her duties. About the same time, she began to train as a periodontal assistant but she was hardly enamoured of that job because the sight of blood upset her. Also in August, she received an above-average performance review. She was told, however,that she would not receive a raise until her next evaluation as she had been hired at a salary higher than she previously earned.

As noted below, the employees discussed overtime pay and the money they spent on their uniforms." They contributed to the cost of their work uniforms and, not infrequently, are expected to work during their own time, (i.e., lunch hour, at the end of the normal workday) without receiving additional compensation therefor. Falcone and her coworkers, in August, discussed among themselves their view that Respondent should pay the full cost of uniforms and also overtime pay, but they did not then broach either of these subjects with Respondent.

On Friday, 11 October 1985, one of the dentists held a meeting of the employees to express his displeasure at the overall level of work performance. One of the employees, Lisa Manrodt, who was seated alongside Falcone during this meeting, interrogated the dentist several times, apparently to disagree with some of his comments. Respondent's office manager, Vickie Devaney, was present at the meeting and, when it ended, she told Manrodt and Falcone that she wanted to see them in her office.

Devaney told them in no uncertain terms that she was displeased with Manrodt's interruptions and with Falcone's actions which Devaney perceived as having encouraged Manrodt. Falcone and Manrodt were very upset over what they perceived as unjust criticism, intemperate and bordering on calumny.

B. Falcone's Activities

Over the weekend, Falcone and Manrodt composed a summary of their account of the meeting. In addition, Falcone telephoned several coworkers. She told each of the meeting with Devaney and also discussed with each Manrodt's and her view that the employees should get overtime pay when they work during their own time and that they should not have to pay anything toward the cost of their uniforms. She was told by those employees that she should go to see Devaney on Monday.

Three of the employees, whom Falcone had telephoned, told Devaney on Monday, 15 October, before Falcone arrived for work, that Falcone had telephoned them over the wekend and talked to them about the 11 October meeting, about overtime pay, and the cost of work uniforms.

C. Falcone's discharge

When Falcone arrived at work later on 15 October, she asked to speak with Devaney. They talked in private. Falcone's account is as follows. Falcone told her that she gets sick to her stomach when she sees a lot of blood during periodontal procedures and asked if she could be relieved of those duties to concentrate on areas to which she believed she did better. Devaney responded in effect that she would get used to the periodontal work but that it would take time. Falcone stated that she really felt sick doing that work. Devaney suggested that Falcone talk to one of the other assistants to see if they would switch with her and she told Falcone that she would not hire another assistant. Falcone then brought up the subject of TMJ therapy. She pointed out to Devaney that she was happy with that work as she treated the patients by herself. She pointed out to Devaney that Respondent charged those patients $20 for each of those visits and she said she was entitled to some additional compensation for TMJ work as that was not in her job duties when she was hired. Devaney's response was to tell her that she would be relieved of TMJ duties. Falcone became "very, very upset" at Devaney's taking away her TMJ function as she "didn't refuse to do anything." Falcone then "brought up the issue" of overtime pay. Devaney responded by banging her hand on the desk and she informed Falcone that she has no legal obligation to pay overtime as she has fought that matter out. Falcone stated that the employees are entitled to be paid for all overtime work and also that Devaney "is supposed to pay us a hundred percent for our uniforms." Devaney replied, "That's it Sandy. You're out of hand, you have an attitude problem. I can't deal with you anymore . . . you can have two weeks or stay till the end of the day." Falcone asked if Devaney was firing her. Devaney responded that she was. Falcone left and returned later that day to appeal to Respondent's president, Dr. De Rario. He called Devaney in to hear her account. Devaney told De Rario that she fired Falcone "number one, because of [her] attitude . . . number two, because [she] refused to do periodontal assisting . . . number three because [she] demanded to be paid for TMJ therapy . . . number four . . . because she demanded to be paid for overtime . . . number five because [she] demanded to be paid for your uniforms." Falcone told De Rario that she never refused to perform periodontal assisting or demanded to be paid for TMJ work. De Rario excused Devaney, who left. De Rario then told Falcone that he has full faith in Devaney and he left. Devaney returned and accused Falcone of having undermined her by calling employees over the weekend. Falcone said she called them to try to work something out. Devaney kept "yelling and yelling" so Falcone left.

Devaney was called by General Counsel to testify pursuant to Rule 611(c) of the Federal Rules of Evidence." She acknowledged that she had no intention of discharging Falcone at the end of the meeting she had with Manrodt and Falcone on 10 October and that on 14 October several employees had told her that Falcone had discussed with them her dissatisfaction with Respondent's policy as to overtime hours and reimbursement for work uniforms. Devaney testified that she then spoke with Falcone and that Falcone told her that she, Falcone, was the spokesperson for the "front desk people" (i.e., the receptionists and other clerical employees) as they were afraid to confront Devaney themselves." Devaney's initial responses to the General Counsel's questions indicated that Falcone brought up the overtime and uniform reimbursement matters after she had been discharged. Her later response indicates that Falcone's references to those matters preceded her discharge. The chronology set out in her pretrial affidavit was quite detailed and reveals that Falcone's references to employee complaints about overtime pay and uniform reimbursement took place before Devaney discharged her. Devaney testified further that she discharged Falconein that interim because Falcone stated she could not perform periodontal duties and would not work for Respondent unless Respondent paid her $20 an hour for her TMJ work, paid her overtime pay, and reimburse her 100 percent for the cost of her uniforms. As to the meeting later that day with Dr. De Rario and Falcone, Devaney testified that De Rario called her into the meeting and asked her if she ever had made any personal comments about Falcone, not related to her work. When she denied doing so, De Rario told Falcone that Devaney's decision would stand and he left, according to Devaney.

Dr. De Rario did not testify.

In rebuttal, General Counsel recalled Falcone who testified without contradiction that Respondent bills $20 an hour for the TMJ work she performs. She denied ever telling Devaney she refused to do periodontal work or that she demanded $20-an-hour payment for TMJ work.

D. Analysis

I credit Falcone's testimony. Devaney's account would have me find that Falcone set forth a multipoint ultimatum on 14 October which gave Devaney no choice but to discharge Falcone." I find it highly improbable that a person of Falcone's demeanor would even think of presenting Devaney with any ultimatum." Devaney's account seems so unlikely that it is understandable why Dr. De Rario did not appear as a witness to offer corroboration of it. It is even more unlikely that Falcone would even suggest, let alone demand, that Respondent turn over to her its full payment for her TMJ work. Respondent contends that Falcone's testimony supports its contention that she had refused to perform periodontal work. The credited evidence discloses, however, that Falcone had asked Devaney to relieve her of that function, and that Devaney instead offered Falcone the opportunity to obtain a substitute whenever she was scheduled to assist the periodontist and that, when Devaney told her on 14 October she would take away her TMJ assignments, Falcone protested that she had never said she refused any assignment. In short, there is no probative evidence to support Respondent's assertion that Falcone had refused to perform periodontal duties.

In Dayton Typographical Service, 273 NLRB 1205 (1984), the Board held that an employee was engaged in protected concerted activity in protesting the employer's policy regarding overtime compensation, that the employer there was aware of that activity, and that the reason given for the employee's discharge was a pretext. The Board thus found that the discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act. As the instant case parallels that holding, I find that Respondent discharged Falcone because of her concerted protected activities and it thereby violated Section 8(a)(1).

Conclusions of Law

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent has committed an unfair labor practice in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by having discharged employee Sandra Falcone because she engaged in activities protected by Section 7 of the Act.

The Remedy

Respondent having unlawfully discharged Sandra Falcone, I find it necessary to order it to offer her reinstatement and make her whole for lost earnings and other benefits, computed on a quarterly basis from date of discharge to date of proper offer of reinstatement, less any net interim earnings, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). See generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962).

Although the General Counsel had stated in the complaint in this case that she seeks as part of the remedy a visitatorial clause, the General Counsel did not pursue that request in her brief. I infer that such relief is no longer deemed warranted.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[1]

ORDER

The Respondent, Joseph De Rario, DMD, P.A., Oakhurst, New Jersey, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging any of its employees because they engaged in protected concerted activities for their mutual aid and protection.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Sandra Falcone immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed, and make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits she may have suffered as a result of the discrimination against her, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to anlayze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(c) Remove from its files any reference to the discharge of Sandra Falcone, and notify her in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against her.

(d) Post at its office in Oakhurst, New Jersey, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 22, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order, what steps the Respondent has aken to comply.

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed 20 August 1986 by the Employer, alleging that the Respondent, Laborers Union Local No. 1130, affiliated with Laborers International Union of North America, AFL–CIO (Laborers Union), violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing the Employer to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Carpenters Local Union No. 1235, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO (Carpenters Union). The hearing was held 20 October 1986 before Hearing Officer David Dominguez.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The Employer, a California corporation, with an office and place of business in Modesto, California, is engaged as a general contractor in the building and construction industry. It was undisputed and we find that during the past year, a representative period, the Employer purchased and received goods or services valued in excess of $50,000 directly from suppliers located outside the State of California. It is undisputed and we find that the Employer is engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act. It is undisputed and we find that Laborers and Carpenters are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

In December 1985 the Employer entered into a contract to perform as general contractor over the construction of the Modesto Community Center Parking Garage. The Employer employs 12 carpenters to perform such duties as installing, assembling, setting, stripping, dismantling, and reusing concrete foundation forms. Apprentice carpenters size and pack timber and do general cleanup functions in addition to assisting journeymen carpenters with the foregoing duties.

The present dispute arose in August 1986. Business agents of the Laborers Union approached Larry E. McGraw, the president of the L.E. McGraw Construction Company, and stated that a portion of the work being performed by the carpenters on the Modesto Community Center Parking Garage Project was laborers' work and demanded that the work be assigned to its members. The work then being performed by the carpenters consisted of setting the forms into which the cement was poured, removing or "stripping" the forms which were designated to be moved to another location, and reinstalling the forms for the next cement pour. McGraw refused to assign the disputed work to the laborers. At that point, Richard Crispin, who had identified himself as a business representative of the Laborers Union, stated that if the Employer was refusing to assign the disputed work to members of the Laborers Union that the Employer was "not leaving us much choice except to picket the job." The jobsite was picketed by the Laborers Union from 20 August through 9 September 1986, at which time a preliminary injunction against the picketing was issued by the Federal district court in Fresno, California. One of the pickets, Amos Earl McElvanie, identified himself as a member of the Laborers Union, stated that his Union's business agent knew he was picketing this jobsite, and further stated that the reason he was picketing was because he wanted the Employer to assign the disputed work to members of the Laborers Union.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work consists of the fabrication, assembly, and/or installation of the wood and/or metal concrete foundation forms at the Modesto Community Center Parking Garage, 1101 9th Street, Modesto, California.[2]

[1] The Laborers Union and the Carpenters Union neither participated in the hearing nor filed posthearing briefs.

[2] Since no objection was made by any of the parties involved in this dispute, we adopt the description of the work in dispute set forth in the Continued

C. Contentions of the Parties

The Employer contends that the disputed work should be assigned to employees represented by the Carpenters Union, an intervenor in this case, because the Carpenters Union is certified as the collective-bargaining representative of its employees and because there exists a current collective-bargaining agreement between the Carpenters Union and the Employer. The Employer further argues that each of the factors which the Board considers in disputes of this nature weighs heavily in favor of such assignment to the employees represented by the Carpenters Union. In addition, the Employer requests an order awarding similar work in like projects to employees represented by the Carpenters Union, including any and all projects on which the Employer may now be working, or on which it may work, in any of the 46 counties covered by the collective-bargaining agreement to which it is signatory.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that there is no agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

As noted above, in August 1986 business agents of the Laborers Union approached the Employer and demanded that the disputed work be assigned to its members. When the Employer refused to make such assignment, Richard Crispin, a business representative of the Laborers Union, threatened to picket the jobsite. Subsequently, the jobsite was picketed by the Laborers Union from 20 August through 9 September 1986. One of the pickets stated that he was picketing the jobsite because he wanted the Employer to assign the disputed work to the laborers and that his Union's business agents were aware of this conduct. Based on the foregoing, and the record as a whole, we find that reasonable cause exists to believe that the Laborers Union violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act.

There is no current agreed-upon method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute to which all parties are bound. Accordingly, this dispute is properly before the Board for determination.

notice of hearing served on the parties. However, we note that the installation of the forms by the carpenters comprises a continuous process and necessarily entails stripping the forms so that they may be reused.

In addition to pouring the cement into the wooden forms, the cement masons may on occasion assist the carpenters in setting up the forms. There is no contention that any work performed by the cement masons is in dispute.

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certifications and collective-bargaining agreements

It is undisputed that the employees of the Employer are represented either by the Carpenters Union or the Cement Masons Union, but are not represented by the Laborers Union. It is also undisputed that the Carpenters Union has been certified as the exclusive bargaining representative of the particular group of employees who are performing the disputed work. Moreover, it is undisputed that the carpenters are performing their work under a signed collective-bargaining agreement which for over 9-1/2 years has been interpreted by the parties thereto as covering the type of work which is in dispute.

The Laborers Union has never been a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Employer, nor have any of its members ever been employed by the Employer. We find that the Employer's collective-bargaining agreement with the Carpenters Union encompasses the disputed work. Accordingly, we conclude that the factors of certifications and collective-bargaining agreements favor the Employer's assignment.

2. Company preference and past practice

It is undisputed that the Employer has during the past 9-1/2 years used carpenters to perform the type of work in dispute. Furthermore, it is also uncontested that the Employer has never directly employed any members of the Laborers Union to perform the type of work in dispute or any other type of work. We therefore find that the Employer's past practice favors the assignment of the disputed work to employees represented by the Carpenters Union.

At the hearing, the Employer, through the testimony of its president, expressed its preference that the disputed work be awarded to its employees represented by the Carpenters Union. While we do not afford controlling weight to this factor, we find that it tends to favor an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by Carpenters.

3. Area practice

The undisputed testimony of the Employer indicates that it is a common practice of construction companies on similar types of construction projects in the area in the State of California to assign work similar to that in dispute here to carpenters and not laborers. We therefore find that this factor tends to favor an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by the Carpenters Union.

4. Relative skills and safety

The undisputed testimony of the Employer indicates that the disputed work requires the skills of a carpenter, and that these skills are not possessed by laborers. Specifically, the testimony establishes that the Employer has trained the carpenters employed by it to set and strip forms. In this regard, the Employer testified that its carpenters have been employed by it for some years and are experienced working together as a unified crew. The uncontradicted testimony of the Employer also indicates that skill is required in dismantling the forms because 95 to 98 percent of them are reused.

Additionally, the Employer testified that safety is a factor it considers in assigning the work to employees represented by the Carpenters Union because the job requires the use of heavy tools which are typically not possessed by the members of the Laborers Union and which they are not authorized to use. We therefore find that the combined factors of relative skills and safety favor an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by Carpenters.

5. Economy and efficiency of operations

The Employer presented undisputed evidence that an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by Carpenters Union will result in greater flexibility in the utilization of its work force and in greater efficiency and economy of operations. As noted above, employees represented by the Carpenters Union have experience performing the work in dispute because in the past they have been assigned work similar to that in dispute. In addition, the disputed work is intermittent and when carpenters are not engaged in performing the disputed work, the Employer assigns related work to carpenters which it would be unable to assign to laborers. Accordingly, we find that the factor of economy and efficiency of operations favors an award of the disputed work to employees represented by the Carpenters Union.

6. Job impact

The Employer testified that if an award of the disputed work is made to employees represented by the Laborers Union, the Employer will be forced to lay off four carpenters. Accordingly, we find that the factor of job impact favors the Employer's assignment.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Carpenters Local Union No. 1235, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the facts that such an award is consistent with the Employer's current collective-bargaining agreement with the Carpenters Union; the employees represented by the Carpenters Union possess the requisite skills to perform such work and they can perform such work in a safe manner; such an award will result in greater economy and efficiency of operations and will not result in an adverse impact on jobs; the assignment is in accord with area practice; and it is consistent with the Employer's past practice and preference. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Carpenters Local Union No. 1235, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, not to that Union or its members. In consequence, we also find that Laborers Union Local No. 1130, affiliated with Laborers International Union of North America, AFL–CIO, is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force or require the Employer to assign the disputed work to employees it represents. The present determination is limited to the particular controversy which gave rise to this proceeding.[3]

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

1. Employees of L. E. McGraw Construction, Inc., who are currently represented by Carpenters Local Union No. 1235, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, are entitled to perform the fabrication, assembly, and/or installation of the wood and/or metal concrete foundation forms at the Modesto Community

[3] Since the facts do not demonstrate that the Laborers Union has a proclivity to engage in further unlawful conduct in order to obtain work similar to that in dispute, we deny the Employer's request to issue an award encompassing the geographical area of the 46 counties covered by the collective-bargaining agreement to which it is signatory.

Center Parking Garage at 1101 9th Street, Modesto, California.

2. Laborers Union Local No. 1130, affiliated with Laborers International Union of North America, AFL–CIO is not entitled by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the Act to force or require L.E. McGraw Construction, Inc. to assign the disputed work to employees represented by it.

3. Within 10 days from this date, Laborers Union Local No. 1130, affiliated with Laborers International Union of North America, AFL–CIO shall notify the Regional Director for Region 32 in writing whether it will refrain from forcing the Employer, by means proscribed by Section 8(b)(4)(D), to assign the disputed work in a manner inconsistent with this determination.

DECISION ON REVIEW AND ORDER REMANDING

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 12 November 1985 the Regional Director for Region 16 issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding in which he dismissed the instant petition based on his finding that jurisdiction should not be asserted over the Employer under the test set forth in National Transportation Service, 240 NLRB 565 (1979). In so doing, the Regional Director found that the relationship between the Employer and the Stephen F. Austin University,[1] a nonprofit educational institution operated by the State of Texas and exempt from the Board's jurisdiction, was such that the Employer did not exercise sufficient control over its employees' wages, hours, and working conditions to enable it to engage in meaningful bargaining with a labor organization.

In accordance with Section 102.67 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the Petitioner filed a timely request for review of the Regional Director's decision, and a motion to remand and reopen the record for newly discovered evidence. The Board granted the Petitioner's request for review by unpublished order dated 24 March 1986,[2] and held in abeyance the Petitioner's motion to remand and reopen.

On 30 June the Board remanded the instant case to the Regional Director for further consideration consistent with its recently issued decisions in ResCare, Inc.[3] and Long Stretch Youth Home,[4] including, if necessary, a reopening of the record.[5] On 22 August, after the parties were afforded an opportunity to submit briefs on the issue, the Acting Regional Director issued a Supplemental Decision and Order reaffirming the findings and conclusions of the 12 November 1985 decision that jurisdiction should not be asserted over the Employer.

Thereafter, on 12 September, the Petitioner filed a timely request for review, contending that the Acting Regional Director erred in concluding that the control retained by the exempt entity over the essential terms and conditions of the Employer's employees is the type of direct economic control that precludes collective bargaining. By unpublished order dated 28 November, the Board[6] granted the Petitioner's request for review.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has reviewed the entire record in this proceeding with respect to the issues under review and makes the following findings. In December 1984, the University was advised that state appropriations were going to be reduced, and it began looking for ways to increase revenue and reduce costs. It was determined that by contracting out food services formerly provided by the University itself (including the operation of two cafeterias, a catering service, and a banquet hall), a substantial savings would be realized. Bids were solicited and bidders were interviewed by a food service committee consisting of University administrators, faculty, and students.

The choice was narrowed to two companies, including the Employer, and these bidders were informed that certain benefits must be included in the bids as a result of a consent decree entered into between the University and members of a Federal class action suit alleging that the University violated Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.[7] Most of the food service workers were included as members of the class. To satisfy the University's obligations under the consent decree, the University required the bidders to agree to offer employment to all the then-current University food service employees at salaries equal to or greater than those they were receiving from the University, to attempt to accomplish any reduction in current staff by attrition rather than layoff, and to offer current employees a benefit package specified by the University. It was explicitly acknowledged, however, that the successful bidder would possess the right to terminate any employee for cause.

The benefit package mandated by the University included the same benefits (holidays, sick leave, and vacation policies) the University had provided, as well as the payment of a fixed percentage of Social Security taxes for all employees working in excess of 20 hours per week, the contribution of up to $85 per month to each employee's health and life insurance plan (coverage comparable to the University's plan), and the offer of a retirement program similar to that of the Teachers Retirement System of Texas, with payment of a specified percentage of the cost of such a program for each employee into an independently supervised retirement plan. The University also required that the successful bidder carry workers' compensation insurance and stated amounts of public liability and property damage insurance.

The University and the Employer executed a letter of agreement on 11 July 1985, and the Employer took over the University's food service operations in August 1985. At the time of the hearing in this case (October 1985), a formal contract between the parties was in effect, but had not yet been executed. The University specifies the hours of operation for the cafeterias and requires that certain types and quality of food be served. In addition, it reserves the right to approve or disapprove the Employer's selection of a food service manager, and the record shows that the University took an active role in interviewing applicants for that position, rejecting at least three before Douglas Goade was selected. In addition, the Employer utilizes University offices, telephones, appliances, and kitchen utensils; does not pay rent for any of the facilities; and requires that its employees adhere to the University's general employment rules and personal conduct rules.

The Acting Regional Director, after applying Res-Care and Long Stretch, concluded that "the control of employee wages and other benefits is more closely allied to that present in Res-Care than Long Stretch." Thus, he affirmed the previous order dismissing the petition. Contrary to the Acting Regional Director, we find that it would effectuate the purposes and policies of the Act to assert jurisdiction over the Employer.

In Res-Care, the Board reaffirmed the basic twofold inquiry enunciated in National Transportation Service,[8] for determining when assertion of jurisdiction over an employer providing services to or for an exempt entity is appropriate. Further, the Board stated that henceforth it would examine not only the control over essential terms and conditions retained by the employer, but also the scope and degree of control exercised by the exempt entity over the employer's labor relations, to determine whether the employer is capable of engaging in meaningful collective bargaining.

The Board concluded in Res-Care that it was the exempt entity (the Department of Labor) that, in every sense, retained the ultimate discretion for setting wage and benefit levels; thus, the exempt entity effectively precluded the employer from engaging in collective bargaining. Although the employer initially set the wage and benefit levels for each job classification in its operating budget, the Board noted that the budget required approval by the exempt entity and, once approved, became the basis for the contract price. In addition, the employer was required to obtain approval from the exempt entity of the wage ranges to be paid to the employer's employees, including a maximum for each classification, and the substantive terms of several employee benefits. The contract specifically provided that any proposed changes in the approved wage ranges or fringe benefit plans had to be submitted to the exempt entity for approval, along with any proposed changes in the staff manning table, labor grade schedule, or salary schedule.

In the instant case, the Acting Regional Director found that the University controls the base wages and benefits of all ex-University employees employed by the Employer, but that it does not exercise similar controls over new hires. However, he found no indication that the Employer will be in a position to hire new employees or to raise wages and fringe benefits of its current employees above the level mandated by the University. Thus, he noted that the food service operations were overstaffed when the Employer initiated its operations, and, therefore, there were no existing plans to hire new employees in the foreseeable future. He also noted that the base wages set by the University were higher than similar industry wages in the geographical area. Accordingly, he concluded that the Employer does not sufficiently control the employment conditions of its employees to enable it to engage in meaningful bargaining.

We disagree with the Acting Regional Director's conclusion. As the record clearly shows, there are no line-by-line budgetary controls imposed upon the Employer by the University, and there are no limitations or controls upon any expenditures by the Employer. Moreover, the circumstances under which the Employer agreed to offer employment to all then-current food service employees (at wages equal to or better than their current wages), as well as the "one-time only" benefit package it agreed to offer them, in no way prevents the Employer from exercising its discretion in these areas in the future, as both the Employer's food service manager and the University's general counsel testified. Thus, the initial wages and all amounts specifically set forth in the benefit package are "minimums," not maximums, and no one disputes that the Employer is free to pay more than the minimum wage mandated by the parties' agreement to ex-University employees or to any new employees it may hire, to add additional holidays and other benefits, or to offer other retirement options. Further, we note that although the Acting Regional Director speculated that the Employer most likely will not be in a position to hire any new employees for some time, the record contains testimony indicating that the Employer already may have done so.

[8] In National Transportation Service, the Board majority stated that the inquiry is "whether the employer itself meets the definition of 'employer' in Section 2(2) of the Act and, if so . . . whether the employer has sufficient control over the employment conditions of its employees to enable it to bargain with a labor organization as their representative." 240 NLRB at 565.

In this case, we find that the exempt entity does not exercise such control over the Employer's labor relations policies as would oust the Employer of the final say over decisions affecting the "core group of 'basic bargaining subjects,'" and thereby prohibit meaningful bargaining. Res-Care, supra, slip op. at 12. Unlike the situation in Res-Care, minimum guidelines mandated by the University in order to comply with the consent decree are merely that—"guidelines." The Employer is free to determine for itself any increases in wages and/or benefits afforded ex-University employees, so long as they satisfy the specified minimums, and may establish and modify wages and benefits paid to its other employees without any limitations whatsoever. It is clear that these initial limitations imposed by the University on the Employer are designed to ensure that the obligations agreed to by the University in the consent decree are met, even though it has chosen to contract out the food service operation.

Based on the above, we find that the minimum guidelines imposed by the University do not affect the Employer's ultimate discretion over wage and benefit levels. Long Stretch Youth Home, supra, slip op. at 11. Indeed, the limitations imposed by the minimum guidelines constitute an even lesser constraint on the Employer's ability to engage in meaningful collective bargaining than was present in Long Stretch. We therefore conclude that the Employer retains substantial control over all economic matters which are central to the employer-employee relationship and which enable it to engage in meaningful collective bargaining, and that it will effectuate the purposes of the Act to assert jurisdiction herein. Accordingly, the Acting Regional Director's Supplemental Decision and Order is reversed, and we shall reinstate the petition and remand the proceeding to the Regional Director for further appropriate action.

ORDER

The petition in Case 16–RC–8811 is reinstated and remanded to the Regional Director for appropriate action.

Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO, Local 22 and Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts, Inc. and Perini Corporation and United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, AFL–CIO, Local 218. Case 1–CD–759–1

10 April 1987

DECISION AND DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

The charge in this Section 10(k) proceeding was filed on 30 October 1985 by Perini Corporation (Perini) and the Associated General Contractors of Massachusetts, Inc. (AGC). The charge alleges that the Respondent, Laborers Local 22, violated Section 8(b)(4)(D) of the National Labor Relations Act by engaging in proscribed activity with an object of forcing Perini and its subcontractor Anastasi Brothers Corporation (Anastasi) to assign certain work to employees it represents rather than to employees represented by Carpenters Local 218. The hearing was held 10 March 1986 before Hearing Officer Robert A. Pulcini.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board affirms the hearing officer's rulings, finding them free from prejudicial error. On the entire record, the Board makes the following findings.

I. JURISDICTION

The AGC is an association which represents employers engaged in the building construction industry. Perini is a member of the AGC. Perini, a Massachusetts corporation with its principal place of business in Framingham, Massachusetts, is a general contractor in the building construction industry. Annually Perini receives goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Massachusetts. Anastasi, a Pennsylvania corporation with its principal place of business in Marshfield, Massachusetts, is a masonry contractor in the building construction industry. It annually receives goods valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points located outside the State of Massachusetts.

The parties stipulated, and we find, that Perini and Anastasi are engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that Laborers Local 22 and Carpenters Local 218 are labor organizations within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE DISPUTE

A. Background and Facts of Dispute

At all pertinent times, Perini, as a member of the AGC, and Carpenters Local 218 were parties to a collective-bargaining agreement which designated certain work, including the erecting and dismantling of all scaffolding for all trades, as being within the jurisdiction of the Carpenters. The agreement also required that Perini would not subcontract any work encompassed in the agreement to a subcontractor who was not a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Carpenters.

Perini, as the general contractor for the construction of the Charlestown Condominium Project in Charlestown, Massachusetts, subcontracted the project's masonry work to Anastasi. The subcontracted work included the erecting and dismantling of pipe scaffolding. Anastasi, who does not employ carpenters, is not a party to a collective-bargaining agreement with the Carpenters. It is, however, signatory to the AGC's contract with the Laborers, which describes the erecting and removal of all scaffolds as being within the jurisdiction of the Laborers.

Prior to the commencement of the scaffolding work on this project in June 1985,[2] Walter Chipman, a Carpenters Local 218 official, met at the jobsite with Perini's superintendent, O'Rourke. Chipman told O'Rourke that the scaffolding work belonged to the carpenters and that if Perini assigned it to Anastasi, the Carpenters would pursue the matter as a subcontracting violation and would not let carpenters work on the scaffold. Thereafter, Local 218's business agent, Green, requested that a meeting be set up at the jobsite to discuss the subcontracting of the work to Anastasi. The meeting took place around 3 July. In attendance were Chipman, Green, Perini's director of personnel Gross, Project Manager David Kibler, and Charles Schumb of the AGC. At that meeting, Local 218 representatives asserted that the scaffolding work belonged to the carpenters and that in their estimation the subcontracting of it to Anastasi was a violation of the subcontracting clause. Chipman and Green added that they would do what they had to do to protect their work. As noted, the scaffolding work commenced in June and it was erected and dismantled by Anastasi employees. As of the date of the hearing, the work was nearly completed.

[1] The parties stipulated that the transcript developed in Laborers Local 223 (Anastasi Bros. Corp.), 272 NLRB 860 (1984), should be incorporated into the present proceeding.

Notwithstanding Chipman's earlier remarks, the carpenters did not refuse to work off the scaffolding. In the meantime, however, around mid-July, Local 218 filed a grievance against Perini concerning its subcontracting of the scaffolding work. In October, Gross learned that an arbitrator had ruled that Blount Brothers Corporation had breached its contract with another local of the Carpenters by subcontracting scaffolding work to a subcontrator who did not have an agreement with the Carpenters. Upon learning this, Gross became concerned because Local 218's pending grievance against Perini involved a similar dispute. Gross then contacted Lou Mandarini, the business agent for Laborers Local 22, to discuss the impact of the Blount arbitration award on the Charlestown project. Gross asked Mandarini to attend a meeting with Gross and a representative of the Carpenters to see if an accommodation, such as a composite crew or an adjusted work assignment, could be worked out. Mandarini said that he would not attend a meeting and that it was his Union's work and, if Perini wished to change the assignment, he would not supply any laborers at all to the project. Gross testified that if the laborers were pulled from the job it would, in essence, be shut down. Thereafter, Perini did not ask Anastasi to use carpenters on the scaffolding work and no laborers were withdrawn from the jobsite.

On 30 October and 15 November, respectively, Perini and AGC filed a charge and amended charge alleging that Laborers Local 22 violated Section 8(b)(4)(D). They filed a similar charge 30 October alleging that Carpenters Local 218 had also violated Section 8(b)(4)(D). This latter charge, however, was subsequently withdrawn.

B. Work in Dispute

The disputed work involves the erecting and dismantling of pipe scaffolding at the Charlestown Condominium Project in Charlestown, Massachusetts.

C. Contentions of the Parties

Perini and AGC contend that the disputed work was properly assigned to employees represented by the Laborers based on the Laborers' collective-bargaining agreements with both Perini and Anastasi, company practice, area practice, economy and efficiency of operation, skills, and safety. They further contend that a broad award is warranted covering the geographic area encompassed by the Boston District Council of Carpenters' agreement with AGC.

Carpenters Local 218 contends that no jurisdictional dispute exists. It argues that it is not claiming the disputed work but is merely pursuing a grievance seeking a declaration by an arbitrator that the subcontracting clause of its agreement with Perini has been violated. Local 218 contends that this conduct is not tantamount to a demand for the work because Local 218 has not sought any backpay remedy or money damages for breach of the collective-bargaining agreement.

At the hearing, Laborers Local 22 took the position that there is a viable jurisdictional dispute over the assignment of the work and that Local 218's attempted disclaimer at the hearing was ineffective.

D. Applicability of the Statute

Before the Board may proceed with a determination of dispute pursuant to Section 10(k) of the Act, it must be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that Section 8(b)(4)(D) has been violated and that the parties have not agreed upon a method for the voluntary adjustment of the dispute.

In October, Laborers Local 22 threatened not to supply any laborers to the project if the disputed work were reassigned to employees represented by Local 218. Further, the parties have stipulated that there exists no agreed-on method for the resolution of this dispute. We therefore find reasonable cause to believe that a violation of Section 8(b)(4)(D) has occurred and that there exists no agreed-on method of voluntary adjustment of the dispute within the meaning of Section 10(k) of the Act. Accordingly, we find that the dispute is properly before the Board for determination.[3]

E. Merits of the Dispute

Section 10(k) requires the Board to make an affirmative award of disputed work after considering various factors. NLRB v. Electrical Workers IBEW Local 1212 (Columbia Broadcasting), 364 U.S. 573 (1961). The Board has held that its determination in a jurisdictional dispute is an act of judgment based on common sense and experience, reached by balancing the factors involved in a particular case. Machinists Lodge 1743 (J. A. Jones Construction), 135 NLRB 1402 (1962).

[3] As noted, in May, Carpenters Local 218 threatened to refuse to permit carpenters to work on the scaffolding at the Charlestown Condominium Project for the purpose of forcing Perini to assign the disputed work to employees represented by Carpenters. Carpenters, in July, later threatened to do what they had to do to protect their claim to the work. Carpenters Local 218 now indicates that it has disclaimed the work and contends that therefore no jurisdictional dispute exists. We find that Carpenters Local 218's attempted disclaimer of the work is not an effective renunciation which resolves the jurisdictional dispute. We note that Local 218's attempted disclaimer was first asserted at the hearing when the disputed work was almost completed. See, e.g., Laborers Local 910 (Brockway Glass Co.), 226 NLRB 142, 143 (1976).

The following factors are relevant in making the determination of this dispute.

1. Certification and collective-bargaining agreements

There is no evidence that the Board has certified either Carpenters Local 218 or Laborers Local 22 as the collective-bargaining representative for any of the employees involved herein. As noted, the Laborers, through the AGC, has an agreement with Anastasi which describes, at Appendix A, the "Erection, planking and removal of all scaffolds for lathers, plasterers, bricklayers, masons and other construction trades crafts. Building, planking or installation and removal of all staging, swinging and hanging scaffolds, including maintenance thereof" as being within the jurisdiction of the Laborers. The Carpenters does not have an agreement with Anastasi. Although Carpenters does have an agreement with the general contractor, Perini, that agreement is not germane to the instant work dispute. That is so because it is Anastasi, not Perini, that is the employer for the purposes of deciding the work dispute. In this regard, it is well settled that it is the company that ultimately controls and makes the job assignment that is deemed to be the employer. Laborers Local 223 (Anastasi Bros. Corp.), supra, 272 NLRB at 862–863. In the present case, it is Anastasi who assigned the disputed work, and it is Anastasi that is the properly designated employer for the purpose of determining the award of the disputed work. Accordingly, because the Laborers have an agreement with Anastasi which indicates that the scaffolding work is under the jurisdiction of the Laborers, while the Carpenters have no agreement with Anastasi, we find that this factor favors an award of the disputed work to the employees represented by Laborers Local 22.

2. Company preference and past practice

Anastasi has assigned the disputed work to employees represented by Laborers Local 22 and is satisfied with their performance. In addition, Anastasi has had a past practice of assigning scaffolding work on other projects to employees represented by Laborers. Anastasi does not employ carpenters and always employs laborers to perform scaffolding work. Accordingly, we find that these factors favor an award of the disputed work to the employees represented by Laborers Local 22.

3. Relative skills

Anastasi's field superintendent, Michael Sneel, testified that the laborers skillfully and safely erect the scaffolding and that he is satisfied with their expertise. Sneel also testified that, in his experience, carpenters are insufficiently skilled and experienced to assist the hoisting crews in unloading and dismantling the scaffolding. Accordingly, on this record, we find that this factor favors an award of the disputed work to the employees represented by Laborers Local 22.

4. Economy and efficiency of operations

The laborers perform a variety of duties at the jobsite in addition to their duties in erecting and dismantling the scaffolding. If Anastasi were directed to assign the disputed work to carpenters, Anastasi would not be able to lay off any laborers and the laborers would have periods of idle time resulting from their not having the responsibility for the scaffolding. Accordingly, we find that this factor favors an award of the work in dispute to employees represented by Laborers Local 22.

Conclusions

After considering all the relevant factors, we conclude that employees represented by Laborers Local 22 are entitled to perform the work in dispute. We reach this conclusion relying on the collective-bargaining agreement between Anastasi and the Laborers; company preference and past practice; relative skills; and economy and efficiency of operations. In making this determination, we are awarding the work to employees represented by Laborers Local 22, not to that Union or its members.

Scope of Award

Perini and the AGC request that the Board issue a broad award covering the entire geographic area encompassed by the Boston District Council of Carpenters' agreement with the AGC. Perini and the AGC argue that this is necessary to avoid the recurrence of similar work disputes between the Carpenters and the Laborers which entail work stoppages and threatened work stoppages. Perini and the AGC point out that the Board has previously considered two virtually identical disputes and determined that the work in dispute there be awarded to employees represented by the Laborers.[4] They further argue that the constituent locals of the Boston District Council of Carpenters have continued to claim the work through the use of allegedly unlawful means and that Laborers' local unions within the geographic area of the Boston District Council of Carpenters are also intent on threatening or engaging in work stoppages over similar disputed work.

[4] Laborers Local 223 (Turner Construction Co.), 277 NLRB 99 (1985); Laborers Local 223 (Anastasi Bros.), supra.

We conclude that the issuance of a broad award would be inappropriate and we shall limit our determination to the particular controversy that prompted the instant proceeding. In this regard, we note that there are two prerequisites for a broad, areawide award. First, there must be evidence that the disputed work has been a continuous source of controversy in the relevant geographic area and that similar disputes may recur. Second, there must be evidence demonstrating that the charged party has a proclivity to engage in unlawful conduct in order to obtain work similar to the work in dispute. Iron Workers Local 433 (Crescent Corp.), 277 NLRB 670 (1985); Electrical Workers IBEW Local 104 (Standard Sign), 248 NLRB 1144 (1980). In the present case, Laborers Local 22, not Carpenters Local 218, is the charged party. Finally, we note that in Anastasi Bros., supra, there was no allegation of unlawful conduct by Laborers Local 22. In Turner Construction Co., supra, Laborers Local 22 was not a party and was not alleged to have engaged in unlawful conduct in connection with that dispute. Since there is no showing of a proclivity of the charged party to engage in unlawful conduct to obtain work similar to the disputed work, we find insufficient grounds to issue a broad award, and we limit our determination accordingly.

DETERMINATION OF DISPUTE

The National Labor Relations Board makes the following Determination of Dispute.

Employees of Anastasi Brothers Corporation, represented by Laborers' International Union of North America, AFL–CIO, Local 22 are entitled to perform the erecting and dismantling of pipe scaffolding at the Charlestown Condominium Project in Charlestown, Massachusetts.

Case 20–CA–16935

13 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 9 March 1983 Administrative Law Judge William L. Schmidt issued the attached decision.[1] The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a letter in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions, brief, and letter and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[2] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Jhirmack Enterprises, Redding, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[2] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In finding Allison's discharge to be unlawful, we rely also on the fact that her discharge was based, in part, on an unlawful disciplinary warning she was given approximately 12 days before her discharge. This fact is evidenced by the discharge form prepared by the Respondent, and quoted in the attached decision, that Allison's discharge was "based on her past record of aggravating situations" and that she had been "counseled repeatedly."

Members Johansen and Babson agree with the judge that Allison was engaged in a fundamental form of protected concerted activity when she advised employee Ramsey, in response to his inquiry, that some employees had complained to management at the attitude survey meeting about his slow job performance. The employee complaints were prompted by their concern that Ramsey's performance adversely affected their chances of winning the weekly production award and increased the possibility of overtime work. Allison's purpose in relaying the complaints to Ramsey was to encourage him to take corrective action to protect his job. Thus, they find that Allison's conduct was clearly undertaken for the mutual aid and protection of a fellow employee and therefore constituted actual concerted activity. They additionally find that Allison's conversation with Ramsey constituted a logical outgrowth of the concerted complaints of other employees about Ramsey's job performance and a continuation of that earlier protected concerted activity. See JMC Transport, 272 NLRB 545 fn. 2 (1984), and Dayton Typographical Service, 273 NLRB 1205 (1984), enfd. in relevant part 778 F.2d 1188 (6th Cir. 1985).

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, concurring.

I concur in my colleagues' finding that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging employee Sharon Kay Allison because of her protected concerted activity. Unlike my colleagues, however, I find an adoption of the judge's decision inadequate to provide the necessary rationale for the finding of a violation.

The record reveals that at a February 1982[1] meeting of swing-shift packaging line employees with several of the Respondent's management officials, a discussion ensued concerning the inefficiency of packaging line mechanic Dan Ramsey. Ramsey's work affected the other line employees because if he was slow in repairing line malfunctions, the other employees could be required to work overtime on Saturday to meet production quotas and could fail to win the Respondent's award of free pizza at lunchtime to the week's most productive packaging line.

Following this meeting, Ramsey, who had not attended the meeting, had a conversation with Allison that resulted in Allison's discharge. At the hearing Allison and Ramsey presented different versions of this conversation. According to Allison, Ramsey approached her and asked if she had been at the meeting. When Allison said yes, Ramsey asked if anything had been said about him. Allison asked why, and he said that he had heard "the women were talking him down." Allison responded, "Yes. They did. Uh, they said you were pretty slow on the machines . . . . Don't get mad about it . . . . Just get in there and show the girls that, you know, that you're not slow, that you can do it."

According to Ramsey, Allison initiated the conversation about the meeting, told him that the employees talked about his work performance about "how bad it was, how slow you was," and then identified the two employees who had been the most vocal against Ramsey. It is undisputed that Ramsey, who was upset by what Allison had told him, spoke to Joyce Delgado, a quality control employee, about his conversation with Allison. Subsequently, Supervisor Jim Hay learned of the conversation and informed Plant Manager John Ruyle.

After conferring with Ramsey and several other employees,[2] Hay and Ruyle reported the incident to Personnel Manager Robert Honaker, who decided to discharge Allison. On 10 February Hay informed Allison of her discharge.

The Respondent admits, and the judge found, that Allison's discharge was motivated by her conversation with Ramsey.[3] The Respondent contends, however, that the conversation did not constitute protected concerted activity because Allison, on her own initiative, informed Ramsey that he had been criticized by fellow employees, thereby breaching the confidentiality of the 5 February meeting and deliberately undermining the morale of Ramsey, Dionne Alger,[4] and other employees.

The Respondent's contention is supportable only if its witnesses are credited. The judge, however, discredited the Respondent's witnesses, and I, like my colleagues, will not disturb these credibility findings. See Standard Dry Wall Products, 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). Thus, the judge found that the Respondent did not impose a "general gag rule" concerning the discussion at the 5 February meeting. Further, the judge, crediting Allison's version of her conversation with Ramsey, rejected the Respondent's contention that Allison deliberately intended to hurt Ramsey by revealing that he had been the subject of discussion at the meeting. Rather, the judge found that Allison's "primary purpose in responding to the inquiry which Ramsey initiated was to confirm to him that adverse comments had been made to management about his work and to encourage him to take corrective action."

Based on this finding, I conclude that Allison's remarks to Ramsey constituted actual concerted activity.[5] Thus, the conversation consisted of Ramsey seeking information from Allison in an attempt to protect his job and Allison responding with the requested information and with words of encouragement to Ramsey to work faster and thereby protect his job. Such an interaction of two employees is actual concerted activity for "mutual aid or protection" clearly envisioned within Section 7, and therefore a discharge motivated by such activity violates Section 8(a)(1).

The inquiry, however, cannot stop at this juncture. The Respondent established through the testimony of its witnesses that it discharged Allison because of its good-faith belief that she had engaged in misconduct, namely, that she had breached the rule of confidentiality imposed at the 5 February meeting and that she deliberately inflicted emotional harm on Ramsey. To establish a violation under these circumstances, the General Counsel must prove that Allison did not, in fact, engage in such misconduct. NLRB v. Burnup & Sims, 379 U.S. 21 (1964); Rubin Bros. Footwear, 99 NLRB 610 (1952).

The General Counsel in this case met this burden. The General Counsel's witnesses testified that the events did not occur as the Respondent envisioned and that Allison was not guilty of any misconduct in the course of this concerted activity. As a result she did not lose the protection of Section 7 of the Act. As noted above, the judge credited the General Counsel's witnesses. Under these circumstances, the General Counsel established, and I find, that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by discharging Allison for her protected concerted activity.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

WILLIAM L. SCHMIDT, Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard by me on December 9 and 10, 1982,[1] at Redding, California. The proceeding is based on a charge filed against Jhirmack Enterprises (Respondent) by Sharron Kay Allison (Allison) on March 2, and a complaint issued by the Regional Director for Region 20 of the National Labor Relations Board (the NLRB) alleging that Allison's February 10 discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act). The Respondent's timely answer denies that the Respondent engaged in the alleged unfair labor practices.

On the entire record,[2] my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, and my careful consideration of the posthearing briefs filed by the General Counsel and the Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint alleges, and the answer admits, that the Respondent, a corporation, was engaged in the manufacture of personal care products at Redding, California, and that during the calendar year preceding the issuance of the complaint the Respondent sold and shipped products, goods, and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly to customers located outside the State of California. On the basis of the foregoing, I find in accord with a [3] I am puzzled by my colleagues' statement that in finding Allison's discharge to be unlawful, they also rely "on the fact that her discharge was based, in part, on an unlawful disciplinary warning she was given approximately 12 days before her discharge." Although I agree with their adoption of the judge's finding that the prior warning was unlawful, the judge found no connection between the warning and the discharge.

[4] According to the Respondent, Alger was upset by Allison's disclosure to Ramsey that Alger had been highly critical of Ramsey at the 5 February meeting.

[5] In light of this conclusion, it is unnecessary to apply the Meyers definition of when the act of a single employee is or is not concerted. See Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984), remanded sub nom. Prill v. NLRB, 755 F.2d 941 (D.C. Cir. 1985), cert. denied 474 U.S. 948 (1985), reaffd. 281 NLRB 882 (1986). I note, however, my disagreement with my colleagues' "logical outgrowth" theory. See my dissenting opinion in Every Woman's Place, 282 NLRB 413 (1986).

further allegation in the complaint that was admitted by Respondent that the Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. I further find that it would effectuate the purposes of the Act for the Board to assert jurisdiction over the labor dispute involved here.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Relevant Facts

The complaint, as amended, alleges that Allison was discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act on February 10 and that she was unlawfully reprimanded on January 29. The answer admits that Allison was discharged on the aforementioned date but the Respondent argues forcefully that her discharge was for cause. It is undisputed that Allison was discharged because she spoke to a packaging line mechanic, Dan Ramsey, about matters involving Ramsey that were discussed at a company attitude meeting on February 5. Essentially the issue in the discharge aspect of the case boils down to whether Allison's conduct in speaking with Ramsey was protected conduct or was, as the Respondent claims, an aggressive verbal assault by Allison on Ramsey which was not protected by the Act.

Allison was hired by the Respondent as a packer on May 11, 1981, and she remained in that position until her discharge. At the times relevant here Allison was working on the swing shift. The scheduled worktime for that shift is from 3:15 p.m. to 12:15 a.m. The shift supervisor for Allison's area was James Hay. The employees at the Redding plant are not represented by any labor organization.

The Respondent's personnel manager, Robert Honaker, testified that he perceived Allison as an instigator of trouble on her shift. Honaker's perception was grounded on complaints that Allison had made to the management that Shift Supervisor Hay on the swing shift packaging line had shown favoritism toward Joyce Lewis, a relatively junior employee in the department, by Hay's work assignments to Lewis and by Lewis' selection as a leadlady.[3]

Other employees in the department shared Allison's complaint and it was sufficiently vocalized so as to result in an admonition to Hay from his superior when Hay received his annual evaluation in November 1981, to avoid showing favoritism. However, in Allison's view, Hay's favoritism toward Lewis was not discontinued and in mid-January 1982, Allison went to Plant Manager John Ruyle's office where she spoke with him about what she perceived as Hay's continuing display of favoritism toward Lewis.[4] In addition, Allison spoke with other employees in the department and urged them to voice their displeasure of Hay's activities to Ruyle also.

Apparently the Respondent's officials were growing weary of Allison's complaints about Hay and Lewis. Allison was summoned to Ruyle's office on January 29 where she was verbally reprimanded by Ruyle in Hay's presence for "causing trouble in packaging with one of the employees." In addition, a written reprimand was placed in Allison's personnel file. That reprimand recited that the interview with Allison was initiated because of "bad feeling and irritation growing on shift which was was felt to be fed by Kay." Hay provided further details for the written reprimand that read as follows:

> Thru observation and comments it was felt that Kay was stirring up ill feelings among herself and other packagers toward Joyce Lewis. She was confronted with this and claimed it not to be true. I was aware that Kay and other packers felt favoritism was being shown toward Joyce Lewis and I told them I would review the situation but I did not feel that Kay was leaving it at that. She denied saying anything that would have caused trouble and felt she was being singled out because of her past record. It was suggested that she just do her own job and only worry about herself. Will review situation in 30 days. [Emphasis added.]

The Respondent's brief summarized its impression of Allison as a "disturbing influence" who was involved in a lot of agitation concerning how lead employees were selected, who was selected, whether overtime was mandatory, how overtime was assigned, and what job assignments were to be given "and so forth and so on." Respondent concedes that the employees "legally have a right to gripe" about the foregoing matters and that Allison was a "prime instigator in the griping." However, the critical issue from the Respondent's viewpoint was whether Allison's activities were, as the General Counsel in effect claims, for the mutual aid and benefit of employees or whether Allison's actions were, as the Respondent in effect claims, for other motives disruptive to production that are not protected. The Respondent is candid in its assertion that by the time the events of early February occurred, it was just plain tired of Allison's attitude.

On February 4 and 5, certain of the Respondent's managers conducted small group meetings with employees to report the results of an attitude survey that had been administered to employees in late 1981. Allison attended one of these meetings on February 5. The Respondent was represented by Vice President Robert Cox, Ruyle, and Honaker. There is a dispute whether employees were told that matters discussed in the meeting were to be treated as confidential and not discussed outside the meeting room or whether employees were invited to vocalize their complaints on the promise that they would be treated as confidential vis-a-vis the employees' supervisors who were not present for the attitude meetings.

[3] In addition, Allison had been vocal in her complaints about the Respondent's policy of making holiday and vacation payments to second- and third-shift employees on the basis of the hourly rate of pay for day-shift workers that did not include the shift differential.

[4] Allison's visit with Ruyle in January appeared to have resulted from the recent announcement that Lewis was going to become a leadlady. In discussing matters concerning lead employees with Allison and other employees, Respondent's officials appeared to regard lead personnel as a part of the "management team." However, there is insufficient evidence in this record to warrant the conclusion that the Respondent's lead employees are supervisors or agents within the meaning of the Act or managerial employees.

Allison testified that at the meeting she attended, employees received the following admonition:

> He [Cox] first wanted everyone to feel like you could say whatever you wanted to say. He said that this was a—more or less a gripe session than anything, uh, for us to let all of our angers out toward our supervisors, if there was any—anything that had to do with, uh, with the, uh . . . inside packaging conditions, uh, against other packers, anything, and we were all just supposed to tell everything the way it was and that there'd be nothing held against us and our jobs wouldn't be in jeopardy, that this [was] what this meeting was about. There had been too many gripes been brought, evidently, to the head of departments and they wanted to get everything out in the open, and so everybody could say whatever they had on their minds.

Several other employees testified about this matter. Sharon Brown testified that at the outset of the meeting, employees were told to "let it all hang out, all of our gripes." Brown said that no one told those in attendance that they could not talk among themselves about the meeting and that "[the meeting] was talk in the department from the time it began until the time it ended . . . it was just constant." Similar testimony was given by Christina Wolff. Ann Sjostron testified that she attended the same attitude meeting that Allison had attended and that after the meeting was over she thought "everybody was talking about it." Michelle Ramos testified that at the attitude meeting she attended, a company official, whose name she could not recall addressed the group for the purpose of inviting the employees to speak up about their gripes and to advise them that none of what they said would get back to their supervisors. Ramos said that nothing was said about employees talking among themselves about matters discussed at the attitude meeting and after she returned to work, she heard other employees (Wolff in particular) talking about what had been said in another of the attitude meetings. Honaker testified that he did not really expect the employees not to talk among themselves about matters that were discussed at the attitude meetings.

It is undisputed that in the course of the atttitude meeting that Allison attended there was a discussion about the speed and abilities of the packaging line mechanic, Dan Ramsey. Those who spoke up about Ramsey complained about his lack of speed in repairing the packaging line breakdowns and, as a consequence, the efficiency of the line was impaired by Ramsey's ability or lack thereof. Ramsey's work had a direct bearing on the work lives of the other packaging line employees. If Ramsey took too long to repair line malfunctions, the chances for the swing-shift packaging employees receiving the Company's free pizza award on Friday night would be greatly diminished.[5] And if a line was closed down for repair too long, there was always the possibility that Respondent would require the packaging line employees to work Saturday overtime in order to meet production quotes. In short, Ramsey's role had the potential of affecting all the packaging employees and there was a feeling among a significant group of employees that, at that particular time, Ramsey was slowing up the operation.[6]

It is undisputed that following the attitude meeting that Allison attended, she spoke to Ramsey (who had not attended the meeting) and apprised him of the complaints that had been made about him at the meeting. Allison's version of the manner in which her conversation with Ramsey arose and the substance of that conversation was as follows:

> A. I was working on the line that Dan was a mechanic on and he came over to me and he asked me that—if I had been to the meeting that was held that afternoon, and I told him yes, that I had been there. And he asked me if the—there had been anything said at the meeting about him. And I asked him "Why?" And he said he had heard that there was—the women were talking him down. And I said, "Yes." I said, "They did. Uh, they said that you were pretty slow on the machines." And I said, "Don't get mad about it." I said, "Just get in there and show the girls that, you know, that you're not slow, that can do it." And he says, "Okay." He said, "Thanks for telling me," and he left.
> Q. Why did you tell him?
> A. Because the things that was being said in the meeting about him, I felt like his job was in jeopardy. He's my friend. I like Dan. I feel sorry for him. He had a wife and two kids and jobs were hard to find. So I told him. And, uh—for that reason plus the reason that if it would speed him up, it's going to get our production out, for us, we won't have to work Saturdays, and we'll beat the day shifts and we'll get the pizza.[7]

Ramsey, who was still employed by the Respondent at the time of the hearing, was called as a witness by the Respondent to give his version of his February 5 exchange with Allison. According to Ramsey, he was going along the packaging line adjusting the torque on the capping machines. Before approaching the area where Allison was working, Ramsey had been in the area where Dee Alger worked and had been speaking with Alger as he was performing his job. Alger had been particularly vocal in the attitude meeting about Ramsey's deficiencies. When Ramsey approached Allison's work area, Ramsey said that Allison remarked: "I don't see how people can laugh and joke with you after what they said." Ramsey's testimony about the remainder of his conversation with Allison at this time was as follows:

[5] On Fridays, the Company treated the week's most productive packaging line to free pizza at lunchtime.

[6] Ramsey had worked for the Respondent for about 5 years at the time but only recently had been promoted to the line mechanic's job.

[7] Other testimony establishes that Allison had known Ramsey as a youth. Allison had been a personal friend of Ramsey's mother when she was living and often visited Ramsey's childhood home.

A. Okay. I was surprised and then she came out: "I'm going to tell you this as a friend that the girls and me was talking about your work performance, how bad it was, how slow you was." And then she made a statement like, "There is too [sic] girls especially who was doing all the talking."

Then I asked her who it was. She said Dee Alger and Faithhope [Castellanos].

Q. Anything further that you recollect about the conversation?

A. Just that right now. Kind of lapse my memory right now.

Ramsey testified that he was upset by what Allison had said to him and that it continued to bother him as he worked the remainder of the evening. According to Ramsey it was "an upsetting thing" to learn that his fellow workers did not believe that he was doing a good job.

Ramsey testified that later that evening he spoke to Joyce Delgado, a quality control employee, in Delgado's office, about the substance of Allison's conversation with him. Apparently, Delgado passed that information along to others. On Monday, February 8, Hay spoke to Ramsey about Allison's conversation with him. Alger also found out about Allison's conversation with Ramsey and, on Tuesday, February 9, she discussed the matter with Hay. Alger complained to Hay about Allison's action in speaking to Ramsey concerning those matters that she had raised about Ramsey at the attitude meeting. Hay testified that he set out to investigate Alger's allegation. His investigation consisted of asking Ramsey if Allison had talked to him and when Ramsey acknowledged that that was the case, Hay asked Ramsey to tell him what Allison had said. Hay did not provide any testimony with respect to Ramsey's response. Hay did testify that he next went to Ruyle with the information concerning the Allison-Ramsey conversation.

According to Allison, on Wednesday, February 10, Rosemary Lewis, the head lead employee on her shift, approached her about 6 p.m. and told her that Hay wanted to speak to her in the lunchroom. Allison complied and, when she arrived at the lunchroom and had seated herself, Hay began by saying, "Kay, you're terminated." Allison testified that the conversation continued as follows:

I asked him "Why? What did I do?" And he said, "You were talking. You're being terminated for talking." And I said, "I—that I didn't understand what he was talking about, you know, that there wasn't a rule that we couldn't talk." And he said, "I'm referring to the attitude meeting." He said, "You told Dan Ramsey what was said about him at the meeting." And I said, uh, "Yeah, I did. I—there was nothing at the meeting that said we couldn't talk to the other employees. The meeting stipulated that we could not—what we had to say at the meeting wasn't going to get back to you and we could say whatever we had to say about anything or anybody." And he said. "No, that you told Dan Ramsey what was said and you violated the confidentuality [sic] of an employee and you're terminated."

. . . .

A. And I said, "Well, then if you're going to terminate me for talking about the meeting, then you should go in and get everybody in the packaging room and terminate them because we were all talking about it at break and at lunch." And he said, "I'm not worried about the others. I'm worried about you."

Q. Did he give you any other reason for your termination?

A. No. He told me that he had told me at a prior meeting with John Ruyle and himself and me that he had warned me then to mind my own business and worry about Kay Allison, and he said I didn't do that, so I'm terminated.

Hay did not testify about the substance of the discharge conversation that he had with Allison on February 10.[8] However, the discharge form dated February 11 that Hay prepared is in evidence. On that form, Hay listed "violation of policy" and "inability to get along with fellow employees" as the bases for Allison's discharge. The handwritten details recite:

Breach of confidentially [sic] of attitude survey meeting and undermining morale and harmony of shift. Referring to meeting of Jan 29th 1982, main point that Kay was left with was "just worry about Kay Allison and no one else."

Incident—some girls in attitude meeting brought up ability of one of the mechanics on swing shift. That evening Kay took it upon herself to inform that mechanic (Dan Ramsey) of the girls' feelings. This lowered the self esteem and morale of Dan plus washed away the feeling of freedom the girls had to speak out at meeting without repercussions. This, based on her past record of aggravating situations and disrupting harmony, it was felt in the best interest of Jhirmack to terminate her. Kay's work ability was fine but she had been counseled repeatedly to only worry about herself and avoid confrontations. She failed to do this.

B. Additional Findings and Conclusions

Section 7 of the Act provides, inter alia, that:

Employees shall have the right . . . to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of . . . mutual aid or protection . . . .

Section 8(a)(1) of the Act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer.

to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7 . . . .

[8] Ramos testified that Hay told her a day or two later that Allison "got fired because she was talking when she wasn't supposed to be."

An employer is not at liberty to punish an employee by discharging her for engaging in concerted activities that Section 7 of the Act protects. NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., 370 U.S. 9, 17 (1962).

The findings in section II,A, can lead to only one conclusion, namely, that Allison was discharged by Hay because she told Ramsey some of the other employees had complained about his work at the attitude meeting on February 5. Although Hay's written explanation on the Respondent's discharge form, Allison's version of the discharge conversation, and Ramos' testimony about Hay's postdischarge explanation for Allison's termination all suggest that Allison was fired because Hay believed that she had violated a confidentiality rule regarding the attitude meeting, the Respondent's brief all but abandoned that argument in favor of an assertion that Allison's purpose was to deliberately inflict deep emotional pain on Ramsey in order to retaliate against leadlady Faithhope Castellanos and employee Dee Alger.[9] Thus, the Respondent's brief asserts:

> What Ms. Allison willfully did to Mr. Ramsey is cruel, and hurtful, and in the Employer's viewpoint, much more serious than if she had walked up and struck Mr. Ramsey in the face.

In effect, the Respondent argues that Allison's actions were so destructive of employee morale as to merit her discharge. For these reasons, Respondent contends that Allison's disclosure was unprotected and that her discharge was for cause.

The Respondent's argument that Allison's underlying motive for informing Ramsey about the discussion at the attitude meeting that she attended was to retaliate against Castellanos and Alger is grounded on the testimony of leadlady Rosemary Lewis. According to Rosemary Lewis, Alger reported to her during the evening of February 5 that Ramsey was upset and would not speak with her. Lewis said that later that same evening Castellanos approached her and said that she felt that Allison told Ramsey about what had been said at the attitude meeting because Castellanos had directed Allison to load an entire skid of packages earlier that evening after Allison had, in effect, duped Alger into loading a whole skid (which would have involved doing half of Allison's work at that particular time).

At the outset, the Respondent's contention requires a credibility resolution favoring Ramsey's version of the exchange that he had with Allison on the evening of February 5. Ramsey was not a convincing witness. In addition, the General Counsel demonstrated on cross-examination that Ramsey had cooperated with the Respondent's prehearing preparation of its case against Allison in several significant respects. Moreover, in the prehearing affidavit provided by Ramsey to the General Counsel's investigating agent only a month after the relevant events, Ramsey did not indicate that Allison had told him that Alger and Castellanos were the individuals who had complained about him at the attitude meeting. Ramsey attempted to explain his recent recollection of this vital centerpiece to the Respondent's case by making a clumsy assertion that his recollection had improved by the time of the hearing, notwithstanding that at another point in his testimony, Ramsey acknowledged a "lapse" in his memory with respect to the February 5 conversation with Allison.

By contrast, Allison was a convincing witness who appeared to be making a sincere, earnest effort to truthfully relate the events to the best of her ability. However, Allison was insistent that the attitude meeting had occurred on February 3 and the Respondent asserts that Allison's error in this regard is a deliberate effort to cover up the fact that the whole incident was part of a plot by Allison to get even with Alger and Castellanos. I reject that argument. Allison's testimony on several matters was consistent with the available extrinsic evidence and the Respondent's evidence that Allison was angry with Alger and Castellanos over the loading of the skids is grounded solely on the hearsay testimony of Rosemary Lewis concerning Castellanos' speculation. Indeed, Castellanos was not even called to testify nor was her absence explained. This circumstance alone merits an adverse inference about the Respondent's contention. This is especially true where, as here, Alger was called as a witness and gave no indication that Allison exhibited or harbored any ill feelings over the loading of the skids as the Respondent contends. Accordingly, I find that Allison's error in her testimony about the date of the attitude meeting is an insignificant mistake and that, in general, Allison's testimony is as reliable as one could reasonably expect considering the passage of time. For these reasons, I have credited Allison's testimony where it conflicts with the testimony of the Respondent's witnesses.

In view of the foregoing, I reject the Respondent's contention that Allison set about to deliberately injure Ramsey by confirming the fact that there had been complaints about his job performance at the attitude meeting. Although it is very likely that Ramsey was disturbed by this news, especially in view of the limited time he had been working in the mechanic's position, the only fair conclusion from the record before me is that Ramsey's reaction was the product of the fragile human ego and not the handiwork of an evil woman scheming to avenge an affront by Castellanos. Allison's professed affinity for Ramsey resulting from her friendship with his deceased mother is a far more logical explanation for her motive in making the disclosures about the job performance criticism that had been leveled at Ramsey than is the sinister explanation propounded by the Respondent. As I am satisfied that Allison's explanations of her motives in talking to Ramsey are truthful, I find that her primary purpose in responding to the inquiry that Ramsey initiated was to confirm to him that adverse comments had been made to management about his work and to encourage him to take corrective action. Viewed from this perspective, it is clear that Allison's discussion with Ramsey on February 5 was a fundamental form of concerted activity in aid of a fellow employee and, hence, it was conduct protected by Section 7 of the Act. Bullocks, 247 NLRB 257 (1980). And see Mushroom Transportation Co. v. NLRB, 330 F.2d 683 (3d Cir. 1964). As it is undisputed that Allison was discharged as a direct consequence of that discussion with Ramsey, I find that her discharge violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

[9] In any event, I am satisfied that there is no meritorious, factual, or legal basis justifying Allison's discharge on the ground that the matters discussed at the attitude meetings were confidential. Thus, it is my conclusion that Cox's remarks at the attitude meeting that Allison attended were intended as a promise by the officials present not to discuss the substance of employee remarks with the employees' supervisors rather than as a general gag rule. Such a finding is consistent with Honaker's testimony that the Respondent did not expect that employees would not discuss what occurred at the meeting after they left the meeting room and the testimony of several employees that there was widespread discussion of the meetings on the production floor. Moreover, in view of the ultimate finding here that Allison's true object was to respond to Ramsey's inquiry as to whether there had been criticism of his work and to encourage him to a better performance, I find that the Respondent's business need for such a prohibitive rule is insufficient to override Allison's right to make this type of disclosure to Ramsey in an effort to protect Ramsey's job. NLRB v. Exchange Parts Co., 375 U.S. 405 (1964); NLRB v. Washington Aluminum Co., supra; American Hospital Assn., 230 NLRB 54 (1977); Blue Cross-Blue Shield of Alabama, 225 NLRB 1217 (1976).

In addition, it is concluded that as the written warning entered in Allison's personnel file following the January 29 disciplinary interview discloses that Respondent's officials had identified Allison as an "instigator" of employee complaints concerning Hay's alleged favoritism toward Joyce Lewis and, as the warning was issued for Allison's role concerning this complaint, the Respondent's disciplining of Allison on this occasion also violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

III. THE EFFECT OF THE UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES UPON COMMERCE

The activities of the Respondent set forth in section II, above, occurring in connection with the operations of the Respondent described in section I, above, have a close, intimate, and substantial relationship to trade, traffic, and commerce among the several States and tend to lead to labor disputes burdening and obstructing commerce and the free flow of commerce.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it is recommended that the Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

With respect to the affirmative remedial action, it will be recommended that the Respondent be ordered to offer Allison immediate and full reinstatement to her former or substantially equivalent position of employment, discharging if necessary any individual hired after her termination, without prejudice to the seniority or other rights and privileges enjoyed by her prior to her February 10 discharge. It will be further recommended that the Respondent be ordered to remove from its records any reference to Allison's termination and her January 29 reprimand. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982). It will also be recommended that the Respondent be ordered to make Allison whole for the losses which she suffered as a result of her unlawful discharge. The amount of backpay due Allison shall be computed in the manner provided by the Board in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest thereon as provided by the Board in Olympic Medical Corp., 250 NLRB 146 (1980), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). And see generally Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962). Finally, it will be recommended that the Respondent be ordered to post the notice to employees attached hereto as an appendix for a period of 60 consecutive days in order that employees may be apprised of their rights under the Act and the Respondent's obligation to remedy the unfair labor practices found above.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer within the meaning of Section 2(2) of the Act, engaged in commerce or in an industry affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By confirming Dan Ramsey's inquiry as to whether there had been a criticism of his job performance at the Respondent's February 5, 1982, attitude meeting, and by complaining to management about supervisors favoring certain employees, Sharron Kay Allison was engaged in a form of concerted activities guaranteed to employees by Section 7 of the Act.

3. By discharging Sharron Kay Allison because she engaged in the activity specified in paragraph 2, above, involving Ramsey, and by placing a written warning in Sharron Kay Allison's personnel file following a disciplinary interview on January 29, 1982, the Respondent has engaged in, and is engaging in, unfair labor practices within the meaning of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[10]

ORDER

The Respondent, Jhirmack Enterprises, Redding, California, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or disciplining any employee for exercising rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees because they choose to exercise the rights guaranteed to them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to reinstate Sharron Kay Allison and make her whole in the manner specified in the remedy section of the decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the discharge of Sharron Kay Allison on February 10, 1982, or the reprimand of Allison on January 29, 1982, and notify her in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful conduct will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against her.

[10] All outstanding motions inconsistent with the recommended Order are denied. If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary or useful to a determination of the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order, the propriety of any offer of reinstatement made to Sharron Kay Allison, and Respondent's compliance with, in order to comply with paragraph 2, subparagraph (b), of this Order.

(d) Post at its plant in Redding, California, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[11] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 20, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[11] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

The Act gives all employees the following rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT discharge or discipline any employees because they choose to exercise any of the rights that are guaranteed by the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce any of our employees because they choose to exercise the rights set forth above that are guaranteed by Section 7 of the National Labor Relatins Act.

WE WILL offer to reinstate Sharron Kay Allison to her former position, and WE WILL reimburse her for any losses resulting from her discharge on February 10, 1982. We are required to do this because the National Labor Relations Board found that we violated the law by discharging Sharron Kay Allison on February 10, 1982, for engaging in activities that are protected by the National Labor Relations Act.

WE WILL remove from the records of Sharron Kay Allison any written reports, notations, or memoranda reflecting her February 10, 1982 reprimand, and WE WILL notify her in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future discipline against her.

Millwright and Machinery Erectors Local Union 720, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (National Maintenance Corporation and Tero-Technology) and Samie W. Ousley. Case 15–CB–3197

13 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 29 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Millwright and Machinery Erectors, Local Union 720, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Charlotte N. White, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Jerry L. Gardner, Jr., Esq. (Gardner, Robein & Healey), Metairie, Louisiana, for the Respondent.
Mr. Samie W. Ousley, appearing pro se.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. Samie W. Ousley (Ousley) filed a charge against Millwright and Machinery Erectors, Local Union 720, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America (Respondent or the Union) on 23 April 1986 and withdrew it on 22 May 1986.[1] Ousley filed the instant charge on 27 May, and complaint issued on 2 July. As amended on 26 September and as further amended at the hearing, it alleges that the Union failed and refused to refer Ousley for employment with National Maintenance Corporation (National Maintenance) on 15 and 16 March, and with Tero-Technology on 13 May, for arbitrary, invidious, discriminatory, and/or irrelevant considerations. Further, the complaint alleges, the Union by its business agent Joe Wase Bennett (Bennett) on 8 May during a union meeting solicited union members to inflict bodily injury on Ousley because the latter had filed an unfair labor practice charge against the Union, and to persuade Ousley to withdraw the charge. This conduct, the complaint alleges, is violative of Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).

A hearing was held before me on these matters in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, on 6 and 20 October. Thereafter, the General Counsel and the Respondent submitted briefs. On the entire record and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

The complaint and answer, as amended at the hearing, establish that National Maintenance and Tero-Technology are both Louisiana corporations with offices and places of business in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, that the former is engaged in the industrial contract maintenance business and the latter in the building and construction industry, that during the 12-month representative period preceding issuance of the complaint the corporations individually purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 shipped directly to their Dow Chemical and Borden Chemical jobsites, respectively, from points located outside the State of Louisiana. The pleadings further establish, and I find, that National Maintenance and Tero-Technology are, individually, employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

The pleadings further establish, and I find, that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Exclusive Hiring Hall

The exhibits and pleadings, as amended at the hearing, establish, and I find, that the Union, acting on its own behalf and through the Baton Rouge Building and Trade Council, and National Maintenance and Tero-Technology, each individually, have been parties to and/or abided by the provisions of collective-bargaining agreements pertaining to the Dow and Borden Chemical jobsites, respectively, and/or a practice in existence that provides, inter alia, for exclusive referral for employment of persons in millwright classifications from a hiring hall operated by the Union.

[1] Jt. Exhs. 8 and 9. All dates are in 1986 unless otherwise specified.

The Board has previously agreed with findings that describe the operating procedures of the hiring hall,[2] and that are reaffirmed by evidence in the instant proceeding. In summary, a job applicant's right to employment is established by his signing a master out-of-work list and being assigned a master list number, which he retains until he is referred to a job that lasts 5 or more days. After such employment, the applicant is assigned a new and higher master list number.

The Union's referral procedures require that each individual desiring employment must report "that morning" to the hiring hall and sign a "Day List" showing his or her name and master list or "registration" number.[3] However, the exhibits show that persons desiring employment in fact sign a weekly out-of-work list,[4] and Business Representative Bennett testified that a signature on Monday was good through the following Sunday.

The master list or registration numbers shown on the weekly out-of-work list are not in sequential order, and there are gaps between numbers—not all members with master list numbers put their names on the out-of-work list each week. The referral rules require that applicants must be referred for jobs in sequential order beginning with the lowest master list number.[5] However, an employer may request an individual on the master list by name and thus bypass other individuals with lower numbers.[6] When employer orders for employees are called in on weekends or after 10 a.m. on weekdays, the most recent out-of-work list is used to make referrals. When this list is exhausted, the master list is utilized.[7]

The complete procedure is more completely detailed in the record in a former proceeding. According to findings adopted by the Board, most millwrights sign the out-of-work list on Monday, and must be in the hall to be referred on that day. Union Business Representative Bennett or his staff prepares a separate list that "unscrambles" the out-of-work list, so that the master list numbers are in sequential order. Millwrights do not have to be in the hall from Tuesday through Friday, because Bennett calls them on the telephone. Carpenters Local 720 (UMC of Louisiana), supra, 276 NLRB at 63.

[4] All signatories on a "Weekly Out-of-Work List" for the week beginning 10 March (a Monday) signed only on that day, and every signatory for the week beginning 12 May (a Monday) signed only on that day (Jt. Exhs. 5 and 6).

[5] Jt. Exh. 1, par. 5(c).

[6] Ibid., par. 5(e). The General Counsel sought to cast doubt on the integrity of the referral system by eliciting testimony from union member Webb Wax. Thus, Wax testified that Business Representative Bennett referred Wax to a job out-of-turn in October 1985 (G.C. Exh. 2). Wax affirmed that Bennett told him to answer any inquiry about this referral by saying that Wax had been "called by name." In fact, this was false, according to Wax—the employer's representative did not even know him.

Bennett agreed that he signed Wax's referral slip, but claimed that he had a letter to prove that Wax had been called by name.

Wax appeared to be the more credible witness, and may have been testifying against his own best interest. I credit his testimony.

B. Evidence of Bennett's Animus Against Ousley

As indicated, Bennett was the Union's business representative. He was also the financial secretary and the pleadings establish that he was a union agent. In his capacity as business representative, Bennett was authorized by the union bylaws to refer applicants for employment.[8]

The General Counsel elicited evidence for the purpose of showing that Bennett had animus against Ousley. Thus, Ousley testified that he campaigned for an opponent of Bennett's in 1985 (Tillman Palmer), wore campaign stickers, and passed out literature. On the Monday before the election, Bennett looked "straight at" Ousley in the union hall when the latter was wearing a Palmer sticker, according to Ousley. Bennett first denied knowledge of whether Ousley ever supported a political opponent of Bennett's and then said that he was "sure" that Ousley had done so. I credit Ousley.

Ousley affirmed that the union membership, in mid-February, voted to require Bennett to turn in his credit cards, to leave his car at the union hall at night, and to discharge two secretaries. Ousley was present at this meeting, and voted with the majority. His testimony was partially corroborated by Bennett, who acknowledged that he saw Ousley at the meeting.

On the next day, according to Ousley, he stopped at a coffeepot in the union hall and engaged in conversation with one of the secretaries. Bennett came out of the office and told the secretary that she had no business talking to Ousley because he was one of the "sorriest motherfuckers who voted to get rid of" the secretary. Ousley was talking to another secretary about a week later and Bennett said the same thing.

Bennett testified that he "probably" saw Ousley at the coffeepot the next day, but said that he did not remember the statements attributed to him by Ousley. I credit the latter as to both conversations.

Ousley also affirmed that he testified at two previous unfair labor practice hearings involving charges against Bennett and the Union by other union members,[9] and that Bennett saw him on those occasions.

C. The Events of 15 and 16 March

1. Recent political history of the Union—election of Union President Ronald Kinchen

The amended complaint alleges unlawful refusal to refer Ousley on both 15 and 16 March. It also alleges that Union President Ronald Kinchen, who assertedly passed over Ousley on 15 March, and Bennett, who allegedly did so the next day, were both union agents. The Union admits that Bennett was an agent but denies that conclusion with respect to Kinchen. Accordingly, the Union argues, it was not responsible for any referrals Union President Kinchen may have made.

Bennett was elected union president about 1967. He testified that, as president, he referred individuals for employment "at one time" under what he said was "a different referral system."

[9] Supra, fn. 2. It is unclear whether Ousley is the same person as the "Oursley" mentioned at 274 NLRB at 1510.

Bennett relinquished the post of president in 1975, and was elected financial secretary and business representative.[10] Jerry Sibley was elected president, and continued in that position until about 1985. Sibley was also an assistant business representative, appointed by Bennett, until 1984. During this period, Sibley made referrals from the hiring hall.

Kinchen, who had previously been a vice president and had unsuccessfully run for the presidency against Sibley, defeated the latter in the 1985 election. Ousley supported Kinchen during this campaign and, as noted, also supported Bennett's opponent for the position of financial secretary-business representative.

As indicated, the Union's bylaws give the business representative authority to make referrals.[11] The bylaws also provide that the president shall conduct meetings, preserve order, enforce the bylaws, and have duties listed in section 33 of the International constitution.[12] The latter specifies a few additional functions and "such other duties as are required by the office."[13]

2. The referrals on 15 March

Bennett was out of town on 15 March, a Saturday, and did not designate anybody to make referrals in his absence. Kinchen received a call on Saturday from Phil Dozier, National Maintenance superintendent for the Dow Chemical jobsite. Dozier told Kinchen that he needed employees immediately—there was an emergency, and Dozier could not reach Bennett. If the Union could not fill the positions, National Maintenance would fill them from other sources.

Kinchen first tried to reach Bennett himself, unsuccessfully, and then called Dozier back. The latter asked for eight millwrights by name, of which Kinchen could only get one ("Keith Schafer").[14] Dozier also asked for Kinchen, but the latter said he was not working that day. He did go out the next day.

Kinchen did not have an out-of-work list, but did have a membership list with telephone numbers. In addition to Shaffer, Kinchen said that he referred Eddie Hill, Alden "Persac," Doug Harper, and one other person whose name he could not recall. Although Bennett asserted that Gary Palmer was also referred on Saturday, Kinchen testified that Palmer (and Kinchen) reported for work on Sunday. National Maintenance records show that W. W. Harper, M. E. Hill, and A. E. Persick were referred on Saturday, that Shaffer was called by name, and that Palmer and Kinchen were called by name on Sunday.[15] I accept the National Maintenance records as accurate. Harper, Hill, and Persick are the only employees with respect to which the issue of Kinchen's agency status is relevant. Because they and Shaffer were the only members referred by Kinchen. Inasmuch as Shaffer was called by name, his referral could not have been a violation of the referral procedure.

Kinchen testified that he did not call Ousley, a friend of his, because he got "the four people he needed" before getting to Ousley's name on the membership list.[16] Kinchen also agreed that there were persons on the out-of-work list who were entitled to referral prior to the individuals sent out by Kinchen. However, Kinchen did not have, at the hearing, the master list numbers of those persons—Harper, Hill, and Persick. Although Ousley's master list number was 318,[17] there is no evidence to show whether Harper's, Hill's, or Persick's numbers were higher or lower than Ousley's. Shaffer had a higher number, 396,[18] but Shaffer was called by name. As noted above, the referral rules allow an individual called by name to be referred out of turn.

I conclude that the evidence is insufficient to establish that Ousley was passed over by the referrals on 15 March.

The Union uses referral slips when referring individuals.[19] Kinchen credibly testified that he did not have any referral slips with him on Saturday, that those individuals who were referred did not get one "that day," but did receive them later. Bennett denied that he issued referral slips for the individuals referred by Kinchen, and suggested that the latter may have done so. However, because Bennett told Kinchen on Sunday, as appears hereinafter, that Kichen had no authority to make the referrals, it is unlikely that Kinchen thereafter signed the referral slips. The only other possible signatory on the referral slips was Bennett, who signed the only slip in evidence.[20] If Bennett did sign the referral slips, that fact would raise the issue of whether the Union, by its agent Bennett, ratified Kinchen's actions regardless of the latter's agency status. Bennett did not withdraw the Kinchen referrals and did not immediately inform the membership that Kinchen had acted without authority—such information was not divulged until the next membership meeting.

However, because the evidence is insufficient to establish that Ousley was passed over by any of the Kinchen referrals on 15 March, I consider it unnecessary to determine Kinchen's agency status.

3. The referrals on 16 March

a. Summary of the evidence

National Maintenance Superintendent Dozier called Kinchen again the following morning, Sunday, and said that he needed 16 more referrals. Kinchen agreed to send them out if Dozier could not reach Bennett.

Dozier did succeed in reaching Bennett and asked for the referrals. Bennett went to the union hall, obtained the out-of-work list, and sent 10 individuals to the jobsite.[21] He also called Kinchen and told him that he, Kinchen, had no authority to make referrals.

Four of the individuals referred by Bennett were called by name.[22] Of the remaining six, three had master list numbers higher than Ousley's number of 318.[23] Accordingly, Ousley would appear to have been passed over by three of the 16 March referrals.

Bennett, however, contended that he reached Ousley's name on the daily (weekly) list and called him at 12:42 p.m. on 16 March. There was no answer, according to Bennett.

Ousley, however, testified that he was home on Sunday, but did not receive a call from Bennett. Ousley affirmed that he was repairing an automobile in his carport, and that his portable telephone was just a few feet away from him.

The only telephone conversations Ousley had were with Leland Johnson, according to Ousley. He had called Johnson earlier in the day to inquire about work, and Johnson called him back at 1 p.m. to inform him that Bennett had referred Johnson for employment. Leland Johnson himself testified, and corroborated Ousley concerning this call. As shown above, Johnson in fact was referred out on 16 March. Johnson testified that Bennett called him on 16 March, and Bennett testified that he referred Johnson to the job.

Ousley also stated that union member Webb Wax helped him with his auto repairs on Sunday. Wax testified on this issue and corroborated Ousley. He arrived at Ousley's house between 10 and 10:30 a.m. and helped Ousley until about 3 p.m. Wax overheard Ousley's side of the conversation with Johnson about 1 p.m. He affirmed that this was the only call, and corroborated Ousley on the location of the phone.

b. Factual analysis

Ousley, an apparently truthful witness, was corroborated by two other witnesses who appeared credible. The fact that Johnson was referred on 16 March by Bennett is well established, and lends credence to Johnson's and Ousley's testimonies about their telephone conversation. In addition, their report of this call is corroborated by Wax.

On the crucial issue of the asserted attempt by Bennett to call Ousley on 16 March, the consistent testimonies of Ousley and Wax have more probative value than Bennett's assertion that he tried to call. Although Bennett claimed to be reading from a list he had made, some of his other assertions, based on the same list, are demonstrably incorrect when compared with the National Maintenance business records.[24]

I credit Ousley and Wax, and find that Bennett did not attempt to call Ousley on 16 March. It follows that Ousley was entitled to referral on that day, that a job was available, and that the Union referred other persons with lesser entitlement to employment.[25]

D. Bennett's Alleged Solicitation of Union Members on 8 May to Inflict Bodily Injury on Ousley

1. Summary of the evidence

Ousley testified that he attended a general membership meeting on 8 May, at which 30–40 members were present. After the opening ceremonies, the recording secretary read a charge that Ousley had filed with the Board.[26] Business Representative Bennett then took the floor and said that somebody ought to take Ousley "outside [and] work him over." Bennett added that he would do so himself, except for his position with the Union.

Leland Johnson testified that, at this meeting, Bennett said that somebody "ought to take Samie Ousley outside and whip his ass until he drops those charges that he brought against the hall." On cross-examination, Johnson agreed that his pretrial affidavit did not contain "whip his ass" language. Instead, as elicited from Johnson by Respondent's counsel, Bennett said that "somebody ought to take Samie Ousley out and work him over and make him withdraw the charges." Johnson first reaffirmed his testimony on direct examination, and then stated that "whip his ass" and "work him over" meant the same thing. Ousley did not recall Bennett using the former terminology.

Bennett denied the accuracy of Ousley's charge, but agreed that he spoke at a membership meeting on 8 May. There were about 60 members present, according to the business representative. After the recording secretary referred to charges filed with the Board against Bennett and the Union, Bennett said that it cost the Union money to hire a lawyer to fight the charges. The Union had incurred over $50,000 in legal fees in the past several years. Bennett called Ousley "by name," and asked him why he did not use the Union's grievance procedure before taking the matter to the National Labor Relations Board.[27] He invited individuals with grievances to come to his office before going to the Board.

[23] Don R. Avants, 333, James F. Foreman, 386; and Leland Johnson, 387 (Jt. Exhs. 4(B), 6, and 7—the latter two documents are out-of-work lists that contain each applicant's master list number, as required by the referral rules). The General Counsel sought to supplement the evidence with respect to Johnson by eliciting testimony from Ousley that he signed an out-of-work list on 17 February (G.C. Exh. 4), and from Leland Johnson that he worked a 7-day job in February and obtained a new master list number in March (as required by the rules). Accordingly, Ousley was entitled to referral before Johnson.

Bennett asserted that Avants did not answer Bennett's call on 16 March, but the National Maintenance records show that Avants was referred on that day. I accept the business records as accurate (Jt. Exh. 4(B)).

Bennett also contended that Wilson Watts was called by name, and that Charlie Blocker was referred on 16 March. Bennett said that he was reading from a list prepared "that day." However, the National Maintenance records show that Watts and Blocker did not start work until the next day, 17 March (id.).

[25] The National Maintenance records show that there were other referrals on 17 and 18 March (Jt. Exh. 4(B)). However, there is no complaint allegation with respect to these referrals.

[26] As noted above, although the charge that originated this proceeding was filed on 27 May, and thus subsequent to the 8 May membership meeting, Ousley had filed an earlier charge on 23 April, which he withdrew on 22 May, after the union meeting.

[27] The referral rules contain a provision allowing a member who believes that he has been discriminatorily denied employment to appeal to the Union within 24 hours (Jt. Exh. 1, sec. 6).

Bennett denied that he told the membership that somebody should take Ousley outside and "whip his ass" or "work him over." However, he agreed that he "did say . . . that some of the members needed to talk to Mr. Ousley and more or less let him know what it was costing."

Bennett further testified that Leland Johnson stood up and said "that it was terrible that you couldn't come to the union hall without being threatened to 'get your ass kicked,' or something." At that point, according to Bennett, the union president (Kinchen) told Johnson that he was out of order for using profane language.[28]

Union member Bert McGowan denied that Bennett suggested that somebody should take Ousley outside and "whip his ass" or "work him over." Instead, McGowan affirmed Bennett said that "somebody should have a talk with Mr. Ousley and tell him about the birds and the bees." Union member Thomas Shaffett also denied that Bennett used any "threats." According to Shaffett, Bennett said that "somebody ought to talk to him and try to get him to do [it] the right way . . . by the proper channels." Shaffett also recalled a protest from Johnson about union members being threatened with having their "asses whipped." Union members Wallace Goetzmann and Matthew Gautreau gave similar testimony, the latter repeating the "birds and bees" remark attributed to Bennett by McGowan, and the fact that Johnson was called down for using vulgar language.

2. Factual analysis

There is no doubt that Bennett spoke about an unfair labor practice charge that Ousley had filed, and it is clear that it was the first such charge filed in April—the 8 May meeting was held prior to the filing of the instant charge on 27 May.

It is also clear that Bennett criticized the filing of charges because of their expenses to the Union, and that he called Ousley by name and solicited union members to talk to Ousley. Finally, from the testimonies of Bennett, Shaffett, and Gautreau, there is no doubt that Johnson stood up and protested that union members should not have to receive threats at union meetings about getting their "ass[es] whipped."

Johnson's protest during the hearing is the only evidence of spontaneous reaction, at the time, to whatever it was that Bennett said. There is no evidence that Johnson's interpretation of Bennett's remarks was denied by the latter at the meeting. All that happened after Johnson's comment was that Union President Kinchen called him out of order for using profane language.

It is unlikely that Johnson would have said what he did if Bennett had merely invited the union membership to talk to Ousley about the "birds and the bees," and the grievance procedure. Such solicitation by Bennett could not reasonably have been interpreted as a threat. Ousley and Johnson appeared to be trustworthy witnesses, although the latter on direct examination confused what he said at the meeting with what Bennett said. Nonetheless, Johnson's pretrial affidavit, evidence of which was elicited by the Respondent, is consistent with Ousley's testimony.

I accept Bennett's testimony that he protested the cost of unfair labor practice charges. What is in issue is the nature of his remarks about Ousley. Almost all of Ousley's testimony and the affirmations in Johnson's pretrial affidavit are acknowledged by the Union's witnesses. All that is contested is the substance of Bennett's remarks about Ousley. Because of Johnson's reaction at the meeting to Bennett's statements, the substantial consistency of Ousley's testimony and Johnson's affidavit, and the fact that Ousley and Johnson appeared to be the most credible of the witnesses, I accept their and, in part, Bennett's version of what Bennett said—that unfair labor practice charges against the Union are expensive, that somebody ought to take Ousley outside and work him over to make him withdraw the charges, and that Bennett would do it himself except for his position as a union official.

As indicated, Ousley in fact withdrew the first charge on 22 May, about 2 weeks after the union meeting and filed the instant charge a week later, on 27 May. Although there are differences in the charges, the 16 March allegation appears in both of them. On cross-examination, Ousley said that the Board agent told him to withdraw the first charge because he was running out of time and needed witnesses.

According to Ousley, Bennett told him in June that he was costing the Union money, and that he was "nothing but a damned dog." Ousley replied that it was Bennett who was costing the Union money because he was "not running it right." Bennett denied calling Ousley a dog. I credit Ousley.

E. The Alleged Refusal to Refer Ousley to Tero-Technology on 13 May

Leland Johnson worked for about 3 weeks for National Maintenance at the Dow Chemical job. Accordingly, under the referral system, he should have been assigned a new master list number higher than the 387 number that he had when assigned to the National Maintenance job. Ousley was not referred for work between March and May, and thus retained his 318 master list number. Bennett acknowledged that Johnson had a higher number.

Business Representative Bennett referred Johnson to a job with Tero-Technology on 13 May. According to Johnson, Bennett called him between 4:30 and 5 p.m. that day and offered him the job. Further, according to Johnson, Bennett told Johnson to call Ousley and tell the latter that Bennett had tried to call Ousley. Johnson responded merely by saying that he would take the job.

Bennett contended that he tried to call Ousley three times between 4:15 and 5:15 p.m. but that Ousley was not at home. Bennett stated that he told Johnson of these asserted attempts and told Johnson to inform Ousley. Further, Bennett testified that he told Johnson, "You guys don't need to trump up something now and go back to the Labor Board."

Johnson testified that he knew Ousley's telephone number, recited it at the hearing, and affirmed that he [28] The International constitution provides that a member using profane language at a meeting "shall be admonished by the chair" (Jt. Exh. 11, sec. 33(C)).

called Ousley about 15–20 minutes after Bennett's call to Johnson, i.e., about 5 p.m. or shortly thereafter on 13 May. Johnson informed Ousley about Bennett's alleged effort to reach Ousley on the phone. Ousley replied that he "was there."

Johnson's averment of the time of Bennett's call is confirmed by the latter's testimony. Thus, Bennett explained that he did not receive word about the Tero-Technology job until he returned home from his office. He then called back to his office and had a secretary read the names off an out-of-work list. Johnson's and Bennett's testimonies thus establish that Bennett called Johnson in the late afternoon.

Ousley confirmed that he was home all day on 13 May. The only call he received was from Johnson, who told him that Johnson had received a referral from Bennett, and that Ousley should "stick by the phone." However, no call came from Bennett, according to Ousley.

On cross-examination, Ousley said that Webb Wax was with him on 13 May, but corrected himself on redirect examination to affirm that Wax was with him in March rather than May. Ousley also stated on cross-examination that Johnson called him at 1 p.m.—the same time that Johnson had called Ousley on 16 March.

Ousley asserted that he did not protest to Bennett about the failure to refer him on 13 May because it would not have done any good—he had been "on his [Bennett's] shit-list too long."

Factual Analysis

As on 16 March, the issue is whether Bennett attempted to call Ousley and refer him to a job. I credit the testimonies of Johnson and Ousley that they had a telephone conversation on that day, and that Ousley was at home during this conversation. I credit Johnson's testimony that this conversation took place about 5 p.m. or shortly thereafter, rather than Ousley's belief that it took place at an earlier time. The fact that Bennett's call to Johnson took place in the late afternoon is established by the testimonies of both Bennett and Johnson—and it is obvious that Johnson's call to Ousley informing him of Bennett's call had to take place thereafter. Ousley for a moment confused Johnson's 13 May call with his 16 March call.[29]

It follows that Ousley was at home on 13 May, with an operating telephone at the same time, according to Bennett, that the latter tried without success to reach him. This fact casts doubt on Bennett's testimony. Because of this doubt and the fact that Bennett did not appear to be a truthful witness, I conclude that he did not in fact attempt to call Ousley and that the latter was passed over for referral on 13 May.

F. The Union's Defenses

Business Representative Bennett testified that he offered Ousley several jobs in July and September and that Ousley rejected all except one on the ground that he had a doctor's appointment. Further, according to Bennett, Ousley canceled the one job he accepted because he had to have a urinalysis.

On cross-examination, Ousley acknowledged having been offered and rejecting some jobs, although not all those alleged by Bennett. Ousley credibly testified that he is on medication and had to reject some of the jobs for this reason. One of them was refused because it would have lasted only a few days.

The Union in its brief argues that Ousley is "undoubtedly a malingerer who is more interested in stirring up political discord . . . than in accepting gainful employment." and "perhaps would have rejected the [16 March and 13 May] jobs" if they had been offered to him.

This argument is speculative and without merit.

At the hearing, Bennett testified that Ousley was on a "Not for Rehire" list at National Maintenance, and would not have been employed even if he had been referred to the job. On the other hand, Bennett also testified that it is never certain whether a member on a "Not for Rehire" list will in fact be rejected by the employer—some applicants get the problem resolved on the jobsite. Ousley credibly testified that he was on a National Maintenance "Not for Rehire" list at one time, but that this restriction was removed, with Bennett's assistance, and that he has worked for the Company since that time. These events do not assist the Union's case.[30]

G. Legal Analysis and Conclusions

It is well established that a union threat of physical violence intended to restrain a member's right to use the Board's processes violates Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[31] Bennett's solicitation of union members, at a meeting where many members were present, to take Ousley outside and "work him over" in order to make him withdraw the first unfair labor practice charge, constituted unlawful coercion. Although proof of the effect of a threat is not necessary to establish a violation, Ousley in fact did withdraw the first charge after having been threatened. His explanation of the reason for withdrawing and almost immediately refiling the charge is implausible; that the withdrawal was caused by the threat is a permissible inference.

It is well established that a union fails to fairly represent its members when it departs from objective criteria in the operation of an exclusive hiring hall, including, as here, the failure to refer applicants entitled to referral. Evidence of intent to discriminate is not necessary to establish a violation of Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.[32]

[29] Although Ousley's testimony on redirect examination did not correct his imperfect recollection of the time of Johnson's call—as it did about the date that Wax was present—it is apparent that Ousley's testimony concerning the time of his conversation with Johnson on 13 May is based on his confusion of that date with 16 March.

[30] Ousley stated that Bennett "at one time" said that Ousley "got fired for exposing [himself] in the ladies' restroom at Kaiser Aluminum," and was placed on a not-for-rehire list. Bennett testified that Ousley was placed on the "Not for Rehire" list at Kaiser, but does not assert the reason. This evidence has nothing to do with the issue of whether Ousley was unlawfully denied referral to National Maintenance and Tero-Technology.

[32] Iron Workers Local 601 (Papco, Inc.), 276 NLRB 1273 (1985), enfd. 122 LRRM 2576 (4th Cir. 1986).

The Union's refusal to refer Ousley for employment on the National Maintenance and Tero-Technology jobs constituted a violation of this section of the Act.

Where discriminatory motivation is established, the Union additionally violates Section 8(b)(2) of the Act. The Board has relied on intraunion political strife in which the alleged discriminatee participated, and a member's filing of an unfair labor practice charge against the Union, both of which took place herein, to support a finding of discriminatory motivation.[33] I conclude that there is ample evidence of discriminatory motivation in this case, as shown by Ousley's political opposition to Bennett within the Union, Ousley's participation in other unfair labor practice hearings directed against Bennett and the Union, his filing of the first unfair labor practice charge in this case that led to the threat at the 8 May union meeting, and Bennett's abusive and obscene statements to Ousley on other occasions. Accordingly, I find the Union's failure to refer Ousley also violated Section 8(b)(2) of the Act.

In accordance with my findings above, I make the following

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. National Maintenance Corporation and Tero-Technology are both employers engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. Respondent Millwright and Machinery Erectors, Local Union 720, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening a physical assault on Samie W. Ousley in order to induce him to withdraw an unfair labor practice charge, the Respondent thereby violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. By refusing to refer Samie W. Ousley for employment with National Maintenance Corporation on 16 March 1986, and to Tero-Technology on 13 May 1986, to which employment he was entitled pursuant to Respondent's hiring hall procedures and its collective-bargaining agreements with employers, in retaliation for Ousley's political opposition to the business representative, his participation in other unfair labor practice proceedings against the Respondent and the business representative, and his filing of an unfair labor practice charge against the Respondent, the latter thereby violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) and (2) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of the Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it cease and desist therefrom and take certain affirmative action that will effectuate the policies of the Act.

Having found that the Respondent unlawfully refused to refer Ousley to a job with National Maintenance Corporation on 16 March 1986, and with Tero-Technology on 13 May 1986, I shall recommend that the Respondent refer Ousley for employment on an equal and nondiscriminatory basis, and make him whole for any loss of earnings suffered by him as a result of the Respondent's unlawful refusal to refer him. Backpay and interest is to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[34] I shall also recommend that the Respondent notify Ousley in writing that the referral system is available to him on an equal and nondiscriminatory basis.

Because this case represents the second time that the Respondent has engaged in conduct violative of the Act, it has demonstrated a proclivity to violate the Act. Because the conduct herein, particularly the threat of assault against Ousley, constituted a serious unfair labor practice demonstrating a general disregard for employees' fundamental rights, the cease and desist order will be a broad one requiring the Respondent to cease-and-desist from infringing in any other manner on rights guaranteed employees by Section 7 of the Act.[35]

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[36]

ORDER

The Respondent, Millwright and Machinery Erectors, Local Union 720, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening to assault Samie W. Ousley or any of its members for engaging in union political activity, filing unfair labor practice charges, or otherwise engaging in protected activity.

(b) Refusing to refer Ousley or any employee or applicant for employment through its employment referral system in disregard of the provisions of its collective-bargaining agreements with various associations and employers or in disregard of its published rules and regulations regarding such referrals.

(c) In any other manner restraining or coercing employees or applicants for employment in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act.

(a) Refer Samie W. Ousley for employment to positions for which he is qualified on an equal and nondiscriminatory basis with other employees and applicants and notify him in writing that the referral system is available to him on this basis.

(b) Make Samie W. Ousley whole for any loss of earnings he may have sustained because of the Respondent's unlawful failures to refer him for employment, by paying him a sum of money equal to that which he would have earned absent the Respondent's unlawful conduct, plus interest, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

[36] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its business offices, meeting halls, and dispatch halls copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[37] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 15, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[37] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT threaten to assault Samie W. Ousley or any of our members for engaging in union political activity, filing unfair labor practice charges, or otherwise engaging in protected activity.

WE WILL NOT refuse to refer Ousley or any employee or applicant for employment through our employment referral system in disregard of our collective-bargaining agreements with employers and our published employment referral system.

WE WILL NOT in any other manner restrain or coerce employees or applicants for employment in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL refer Samie W. Ousley for employment to positions for which he is qualified on an equal and nondiscriminatory basis, and inform him in writing that our referral system is available to him on that basis.

WE WILL make Ousley whole for any loss of earnings he have sustained because of our unlawful refusal to refer him for employment, with interest.

MILLWRIGHT AND MACHINERY ERECTORS, LOCAL UNION 720, UNITED BROTHERHOOD OF CARPENTERS AND JOINERS OF AMERICA

The Armstrong Rubber Company and International Union of the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local Union No. 670, AFL–CIO–CLC. Case 26–CA–11586

14 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 13 November 1986 Administrative Law Judge Nancy M. Sherman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed a brief in support of the judge's decision.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, The Armstrong Rubber Company, Madison, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for paragraph 2(h):

"(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply."

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] Although no exceptions were filed to the judge's granting of the General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause, the Board, sua sponte, has determined to reverse the judge's recommended Order in this respect because the circumstances of this case do not warrant such a remedy. Westwood Industries, 280 NLRB No. 12 (May 30, 1986) (not reported in Board volumes). Accordingly, we have modified the recommended Order.

Jane V. Goldman, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Charles Hampton White, Esq., of Nashville, Tennessee, for the Respondent.
Don P. Copass, of Madison, Tennessee, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

NANCY M. SHERMAN, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Nashville, Tennessee, on 29 and 30 July 1986 pursuant to a charge filed on 11 April 1986 by International Union of the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local Union No. 670, AFL–CIO–CLC (the Union); an amended charge filed by the Union on 2 May 1986; and a complaint issued on 5 May 1986 and amended on 29 July 1986. The complaint alleges that Respondent Armstrong Rubber Company violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act) about 8 April 1986 by discharging seven employees and by converting the position of quality control technician to that of quality area supervisor, all for the purpose of discouraging activity on behalf of the Union. Respondent contends that the seven terminated employees (with whose termination Respondent ceased to employ any employees whom Respondent's records classified as quality control technicians) were discharged because of poor business, and that the job classification of quality area supervisor is a new position which is more responsible than the job classification of quality control technician. The General Counsel contends that the seven quality control technicians were discharged, the position of quality control technician was converted to that of quality area supervisor, and personnel were hired or transferred into jobs bearing that classification because Respondent had learned that the Union had filed with the Board a representation petition seeking a unit of quality control technicians.

On the entire record, including the demeanor of the witnesses, and after due consideration of the helpful briefs filed by counsel for the General Counsel and Respondent, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a corporation that manufactures tires in Madison, Tennessee. During the 12-month period ending 30 April 1986, Respondent's Madison facility sold and shipped directly to, and purchased and received directly from, points outside Tennessee products, goods, and materials valued in each case at more than $50,000. I find that, as Respondent concedes, it is engaged in commerce within the meaning of the Act, and that assertion of jurisdiction over its operations will effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background; Respondent's Lawful 7 April 1986 Decision to Terminate Five Quality Control Technicians

The Union has represented a unit of hourly paid production and maintenance employees at the Madison plant[1] since 1962. When the Union first organized the plant, it was owned by Gates Rubber Company. Respondent has recognized the Union as the representative of the hourly paid unit since buying the plant in 1973. In addition to having a contract with the Union and/or its parent International at the Madison plant, Respondent also has contracts with affiliates of the Union at Respondent's tire plants in Des Moines, Iowa; Natchez, Mississippi; and Hanford, California.[2] All four of these plants are in the area of responsibility of Richard Twickler, who is Respondent's vice president of manufacturing. Although some employees not in the production and maintenance unit at the Madison plant are in fact hourly paid, all the personnel excluded from that unit are referred to by Respondent, and will be referred to herein, as salaried personnel.

Respondent's Madison plant (the plant involved here) produces passenger radial tires. During August through November 1985, Respondent's production schedule at that plant called for production of 14,500 tires a day, and actual production was close to that figure.[3] During this 4-month period, Respondent's hourly work force ranged between 549 (August) and 570 (October) employees. About late November 1985, Vice President Twickler told Bryant Reed, who is the general manager and "head honcho" of the Madison plant, to reduce the tire production schedule to 12,500 tires a day effective in December 1985. This was in fact done.[4] As of 1 December 1985, the hourly paid work force totaled 574. During December 1985, Respondent effected about 65 layoffs among the hourly paid employees, thereby causing the hourly work force to diminish to 512 as of 1 January 1986. The complaint does not allege that these December 1985 layoffs constituted a violation of the Act. Between December 1985 and 1 April 1986, no more hourly layoffs were effected. Between 1 January 1986 and 1 May 1986, a period that encompasses the salaried terminations at issue here, the hourly work force remained fairly constant in size.[5]

Notwithstanding the December 1985 cutback in production and the concomitant December 1985 layoffs of hourly employees, the complement of salaried personnel at the Madison plant remained fairly constant between March 1985 (when production was 16,000 tires a day) and 1 April 1986.[6] There is no contention or evidence that any of them was terminated during this period because of the production cutback. In late March or early April 1986, on the basis of inventories, Twickler directed Reed to reduce tire production still further, to 9000 a day, effective 1 May 1986. The General Counsel does not allege that these instructions were unlawfully motivated.

Vice President Twickler testified that shortly after issuing these instructions, but before 8 April 1986, he encouraged General Manager Reed to "look very closely" in the "area" of salaried personnel at the Madison plant, "to look towards an organization of his staff, to try to eliminate any areas of redundancy, and to move in that direction." Twickler further testified that he did not specify to Reed the number of salaried personnel who should be terminated. About 8 April 1986, 54 salaried people were eliminated from Respondent's corporate headquarters in New Haven, Connecticut. In late spring 1986, about 35 salaried people were terminated from Respondent's corporate office in Natchez, Mississippi. No contention is made that the New Haven or Natchez terminations were unlawfully motivated.

Effective the week beginning 31 March 1986, to preserve the existing work force while adjusting to then business conditions, Respondent's Madison plant cut its 5-day workweek to 4 days. About 1 April, Reed decided that the Madison salaried complement should be cut by a total of 21 people. Together with the division managers, who report directly to him, he decided that 10 salaried people would be cut from the manufacturing division; 3 from the engineering section; 1 each from the industrial relations section, the distribution section, and the accounting/purchasing section; and 5 from the technical and quality control division. At meetings of salaried personnel on 1 and 2 April, Reed announced that 21 salaried employees would have to be terminated effective 11 April; that the terminations would be distributed in the manner described above; and that those to be terminated would be notified by 7 or 8 April. Further, Reed said that any person who volunteered to retire would be included among the 21 people who had to be severed, and that anyone who was eligible for and interested in retirement should see Russell Weymouth, Respondent's manager of industrial relations. Reed went on to say that the specific people to be laid off had not yet been pinpointed; and that, after the retirees were subtracted, Respondent intended, all other things being equal, to terminate the junior personnel. Also, Reed said that in May there might be more production cuts, and consequent layoffs of eight or nine salaried personnel, probably from the manufacturing division. Reed further said that cutbacks would probably be made if the plant returned to a 5-day week. Reed testified that, when he made the foregoing remarks, he believed that any salaried cuts in the manufacturing division would be directed at line foremen.

On 1 April Reed asked his division managers (including Kim McAllister, the head of the technical and quality control division) to recommend to Reed by 7 April what job classifications should be used to fill the quota of personnel to be severed. On Friday, 4 April, McAllister advised Quality Control Superintendent Don Dickenson (who reports to McAllister) that the technical and quality control division was going to lose five people, and asked Dickenson for a recommendation after the weekend on how to handle any cutback in his department. On the morning of Monday, 7 April, McAllister told Dickenson that McAllister had decided to let five quality control technicians go. Dickenson recommended that the five junior quality control technicans be selected for termination because such a "formula" was "easier for everyone to understand."

Later that same day, 7 April, Reed met with division managers, including McAllister and Industrial Relations Manager Weymouth. At this meeting, Weymouth reported that one quality control technician in the technical division, Peggy Clark, had elected to take an early retirement. Then, McAllister recommended that the four remaining people to be severed from the technical division should also be quality control technicians. According to Reed's credible testimony, McAllister stated that he was so recommending because the remaining seven quality control technicians could perform their duties, after the other five were gone, by deleting the performance of checks that at an earlier stage of production had been performed by the foremen in the manufacturing division.[7] Reed agreed with McAllister's recommendation. McAllister did not give the names of the persons who would be severed. He, Weymouth, and Reed all testified, in effect, that they assumed the persons to be severed would be selected according to senoirity. The four junior quality control technicians were advised, during their respective 8 April shifts, that Respondent had decided to separate them. The complaint does not allege that any of these four was unlawfully separated.[8]

B. Respondent's Allegedly Unlawful 8 April Decision to Terminate the Remaining Seven Quality Control Technicians, the Technicians' Termination on 10 April, and Subsequent Terminations

1. Respondent's 8 April notice of the Union's representation petition with respect to the quality control technicians

Meanwhile, on 7 April, the Union filed with the Board's Regional Office a representation petition seeking a unit of the quality control technicians at Respondent's plant. About 10 or 11 a.m. on 8 April, Weymouth received a telephone call from a Board employee in that office. She identified herself as a Board employee, told him that the Union had filed a petition that covered the quality control technicians, and asked him whether he had received it. He said no. Weymouth testified that, at the time he received that call, he was aware of the severance of five quality control technicians, and was not aware of any other planned severances at that exact moment.

2. Respondent's 8 April decision to terminate the seven remaining quality control technicians

At or shortly before noon on that day, 8 April, Weymouth went to Reed's office. Weymouth told Reed that Weymouth had received a call from the Board asking him whether Respondent had received a petition respecting the quality control technicians, and that Weymouth had replied no. Reed admittedly inferred that such a petition had been filed with the Board. About 2 p.m. that afternoon, Reed telephoned Twickler.[9] Reed told Twickler that Reed had just heard that the quality control technicians had petitioned for "joining the Union."[10] Twickler remarked that he was a little surprised at the Union's petition and that "it sounded like an efort to move under the umbrella of the Union to protect their job, that unfortunately was not available to them." What else was said in this conversation is discussed infra in section II,B,5.

Reed testified that he decided in the afternoon of 8 April to cut the seven remaining quality control technicians. Immediately after his conversation with Twickler, Reed told McAllister that the remaining seven quality control technicians would be severed. Reed told McAllister that in the future the quality control foremen were to do the quality control work.[11] This was the first time that McAllister had heard of Reed's idea to eliminate the quality control technicians and also the first time McAllister had heard about changing the quality control function over to be performed by supervisors. Shortly before 3:30 p.m. that day, Reed told Quality Control Superintendent Dickenson that Reed had just been notified that further cuts had to be made and that he was going to have to lay off the rest of the quality control technicians. Reed further told Dickenson that whatever of these technicians' functions continued to be performed would have to be performed by Dickenson, Quality Control Foreman Ernest Axley, and Senior Quality Control Foreman Rodney Griffin, with one of them working on [7] Although McAllister did not recall so stating to Reed at that time, McAllister testified that this was in fact one of the reasons for his recommending the termination of five technicians.

[8] These four were James D. Sisk, Ernest J. Carpenter Jr., Morton H. Sadler, and Marie W. Ford. They were named in the Union's original charge, filed on 11 April 1986, but not in the Union's amended charge, filed on 2 May 1986.

[9] My finding that Reed initiated this call is based on Twickler's testimony; for demeanor reasons, I do not accept Reed's testimony that Twickler called him. My finding as to the hour is based on Reed's testimony that the call took place between 2 and 3 p.m. and McAllister's testimony that his conversation with Reed later that day (see infra), which Reed admittedly held after his conversation with Twickler, took place about 2 p.m. To the extent that it is inconsistent with Reed's and McAllister's testimony, I do not accept Twickler's testimony that his conversation with Reed occurred in "middle or late afternoon."

[11] My finding in this sentence is based on McAllister's testimony, indirectly corroborated by the evidence (infra) that later that same day Reed made a similar statement to Quality Control Superintendent Dickenson. Because of this corroboration and for demeanor reasons, I do not accept Reed's testimony that during this conversation he told McAllister that Reed wanted to replace the quality control technicians with six quality area supervisors. Nor do I credit Reed's testimony that during this 8 April conversation he said he was making this decision because the quality control technicians were duplicating the foremen's checks, and that Reed "would be using a new system, using the quality area supervisor and he would be using SPC and the SAS programs [see infra, sec. II,D,1], although we had not all developed them, we would move in that direction and these people would input their data into the computers and eliminate duplication of many checks and be much more efficient." I so find for demeanor reasons; because McAllister testified that he did not know on 8 April (other than a need to cut more people out of the factory operation) why Reed had made the decision to terminate the remaining technicians; and because Reed (as well as McAllister) testified that elimination of duplicate checks was the basis for McAllister's recommendation, accepted by Reed on 7 April, to terminate the five quality control technicians not named in the complaint.

each shift.[12] Also in the afternoon of 8 April, Reed told Weymouth that Reed had decided to terminate the remaining seven quality control technicians. The complaint alleges as a violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act the termination of these seven—namely, Lee Roy Kemp, Roy Dailey, William Douglas, Eugene Kincaid, James Mason, James Hurley, and Lizzie Mae Watson.

3. The termination notices given to the quality control technicians

a. The notices given to the technicians whom Respondent had lawfully decided on 7 April to terminate

Respondent operates three shifts. During the shifts which operated on 8 April, Weymouth advised quality control technicians Carpenter, Sisk, Ford, and Sadler (none of them alleged to be discriminatees) that their last day of work would be 10 April. Inferentially, because of vacation and severance pay, Sisk and Sadler, at least, were scheduled to remain on Respondent's payroll through 18 April at the earliest.

b. The notices given to the alleged discriminatees whom Respondent had decided on 8 April to terminate

The seven alleged discriminatees were all advised on 9 or 10 April that their last day of work would be 10 April. All of them received severance pay whose amount was based on their service with Respondent. Thus, about 10 a.m. on 9 April, alleged discriminatee Dailey was called into the office. Weymouth said that "they" had decided that all the quality control technicians were going, and that "it was total and permanent, no recall." Then, Personnel Director Shirley Pike told Dailey that he would get 2 weeks' pay in lieu of notice; that he would receive 24 weeks of severance pay, to be paid every other week, until 13 October 1986; that he would get paid for 27 days of unused vacation, plus 52 hours' accrued vacation pay, which would pay him through 27 November 1986; and that for 90 days after 11 April 1986 Respondent would pay for his $15,000 life insurance benefits and for his hospital, surgical, medical, dental, vision, and prescription-drug insurance. As of 29 July 1986, the day that Dailey testified, he had in fact been receiving all these benefits. In addition, he received a lump-sum payment from Respondent's profit-sharing plan. Laying to one side his benefits and his profit-sharing payment, the payments thus promised him totaled more than $16,000.[13]

Inferentially, before noon on that same day, alleged discriminatees Mason and Kincaid were also advised that they were to be severed. About noon that day, Dailey, Mason, Kincaid, and then quality control engineer Robert Meyers met with Dickenson in the X-ray office. Mason asked Dickenson what was going on. Dickenson said that he did not know, that he did not like it any better than the employees did, but that it was something that he had no control over, and that he had not heard about it until he was getting ready to go home on the previous day. Mason asked Dickenson whether it would not have been better if the employees had not been represented. Dickenson said that he could not agree with that.

About 7:15 a.m. on the following day, 10 April 1986, Weymouth and Pike told quality control technician Hurley that he was going to be severed. Pike told Hurley that he would be receiving checks, equal to his paychecks and consisting of vacation pay and severance pay, until 18 August 1986.[14] These payments would amount to about $9600. She further told him how long his insurance benefits would run. Pike offered to assist Hurley in drafting his resume, and also offered to prepare a letter of recommendation. Hurley's attendance had been perfect for at least 10 years, and he had received a job performance rating of "M-plus" (that is, excellent), the second highest rating possible. He asked that the letter of recommendation include a reference to his perfect attendance. Weymouth and Pike agreed. Hurley asked about being rehired. Weymouth and Pike said that this was possible, but could not be promised, and that "things were looking very bad." Hurley asked why so many quality control technicians were being laid off. Weymouth said that he had to do what his "bosses" told him, and that he had received a call from corporate headquarters that week. Hurley asked whether corporate headquarters had told Weymouth to lay off all of quality control. Weymouth said no, that this decision had been made by Reed and the department heads.[15] About 2 hours later, Hurley thanked Reed for the opportunity of working at the plant. Reed said that he was sorry that it had taken him so long to cut the salaried employees, that he had tried to avoid this as long as he could, and that about a month earlier he had tried to prevent this by ordering that there be no overtime. Hurley thanked Reed for issuing this order.

4. Terminations after April 1986

The last day of active work as quality control technicians for all 12 of the technicians was 10 April 1986. One individual in Respondent's salaried manufacturing supervision was terminated for cause on 2 May 1986, and was not replaced. In June 1986 Respondent terminated four line foremen. Between 1 January 1986 and 30 July 1986, [12] My finding that Reed so told Dickenson is based on Dickenson's testimony. My finding as to the date and hour is based on employee Roy Dailey's testimony that on 9 April Dickenson said that he had not heard about the layoff of the remaining quality control technicians until he was getting ready to go home on 8 April and on Dickenson's testimony that he first learned about this from Reed during a conversation that included the remark to which this footnote is attached.

[13] Dailey had been working at the plant for 24 years, since 1962. He had been working for Respondent since it bought the plant from Gates Rubber in 1973.

[14] Hurley had been working in the plant during all or most of the 13-year period when Respondent owned it.

[15] My finding that Weymouth so advised Hurley is based on Hurley's uncontradicted testimony. Weymouth, who was not asked about this conversation, testified that Reed told him that Reed had made this decision, and did not testify that Reed said anything about the department heads. Technical Services Manager McAllister testified without contradiction that Reed did not consult him before the 8 April decision to terminate Hurley and the other alleged discriminatees was made, and there is no evidence of any consultation with any other department head regarding this decision.

25 salaried personnel were terminated (voluntarily or otherwise) and not replaced.[16] Between 1 May 1986 and 28 July 1986, the hourly payroll fell from 508 to 388.[17] In May 1986 scheduled production fell to 9000 tires per day from the 12,500 scheduled for April 1986, and in June 1986 scheduled production fell to 7500. In none of these 3 months did actual production reach scheduled production.

On two occasions in the spring of 1986, Respondent's Des Moines plant shut down for 1 week. During undisclosed periods, Respondent's Natchez and Hanford plants went on a 4-day week. About July 1986 Respondent decided to shut down the Natchez plant permanently.

On an undisclosed date before the hearing in late July 1986, Respondent's Madison plant returned to a 5-day week. As of the time of the hearing, that plant had in its employ seven or eight quality area supervisors, depending on whether Ernest Axley was employed as such.[18] These included four of the individuals who had been terminated as quality control technicians—namely, Sisk, Sadler, and alleged discriminatees Kemp and Douglas.

5. The content of the telephone communication between Reed and Twickler on 8 April 1986

Twickler testified that in the middle of the morning of 8 April he telephoned Reed and suggested that he might have to cut five or six more salaried employees than Reed's current schedule called for. However, Reed did not testify to any conversation with Twickler that morning. Moreover, Twickler testified that, as of the time when he made this call, Reed had scheduled a cutback of about 18 employees, whereas Reed and Weymouth (as well as all the other witnesses who testified about this matter) testified that, as of the morning of 8 April, 21 salaried employees were scheduled for cutback. For these and demeanor reasons, I do not credit the testimony of Twickler summarized in this paragraph.

. Twickler testified that during his alleged morning telephone conversation with Reed on 8 April, which conversation I have found did not take place, Twickler suggested that Reed terminate five or six more salaried employees than were already scheduled for termination; and that that afternoon the two men probably reviewed their earlier conversation. On the basis of this testimony, I find that on the afternoon of 8 April Twickler suggested that Reed terminate five or six more people than were already scheduled for termination; and I do not credit Reed's testimony that Twickler did not tell him how many more people to cut.

. Twickler testified, in effect, that he could not recall any 8 April discussion specifically about terminating quality control technicians. Moreover, Reed testified that Twickler did not tell him whom to cut. Nevertheless, I find that, during the conversation between Reed and Twickler on the afternoon of 8 April, Twickler did in fact at least recommend that Reed terminate five or six of the seven quality control technicians not already scheduled for termination. I so find on the basis of the witnesses' demeanor[19] and the following considerations: The testimony of Reed and McAllister established that it was during or immediately after Reed's conversation with Twickler, when Reed admittedly told Twickler about the representation petition involving the quality control technicians, that the termination of the remaining quality control technicians was decided on. Further, the testimony of McAllister and Dickenson (the respective heads of the division and department where the quality control technicians worked) establishes that they were not consulted before the decision to terminate the remaining quality control technicians was made, even though on 1 April Reed had consulted with McAllister and the other division heads before deciding which salaried employees to terminate. Moreover, in denying to quality control technician Hurley that corporate headquarters had ordered these terminations, Industrial Relations Manager Weymouth untruthfully (as shown by Reed's and McAllister's testimony) attributed the decision partly to the department heads.[20] Further, as discussed infra, sec. II,C, it was not until after the last day of active work by all 12 of the quality control technicians that Madison management engaged in discussions and conduct which would normally be expected to precede the termination of the seven whom Respondent had initially planned to retain—namely, discussions and conduct which looked toward performing through other personnel the functions which, before Twickler's conversation with Reed, Respondent had anticipated performing with these seven. I note, moreover, that the number of alleged discriminatees (five) who were never rehired corresponds to the number of employees (five or six) whose addition to the already scheduled terminations was allegedly recommended by Twickler to Reed on the morning of 8 April.

[16] This figure does not include four salaried quality control technicians (Sadler, Sisk, and alleged discriminatees Kemp and Douglas) who were terminated as technicians on 10 April but began to work for Respondent as quality area supervisors on 21 April 1986 (see infra, sec. II,C). Because Respondent keeps employees on the payroll for about a week after they receive their notice of severance, and because these four employees resumed working for Respondent as quality area supervisors at the beginning of the second week after their severance as technicians, these four were never actually off the payroll. Nor does this figure include alleged discriminatees Dailey, Hurley, Kincaid, Mason, and Watson; as discussed infra, the General Counsel contends that they were replaced by Sadler, Sisk, and others.

[18] McAllister testified in July 1986 that he did not know whether Axley's title was "quality control foreman" or "quality area supervisor," but that both jobs were the same and Axley had no authority over the quality area supervisors. Dickenson testified that Axley's title had been "quality control supervisor" at all material times both before and after the quality control technicians' termination; when asked what Axley was presently doing, Dickenson replied, "He is a quality control supervisor, the same as the others." On 29 July 1986 the parties stipulated that Axley "holds" the position of quality control foreman, and that he "is now and has been at all times material to this proceeding, a supervisor of Respondent within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act." At the hearing, Respondent's counsel stated that he had signed this stipulation after the General Counsel had stated that Axley was not going to be alleged to be an agent of Respondent. The General Counsel thereafter stated that she was making no agency contention.

C. Respondent's Selection of Quality Area Supervisors, Its Preparation of a Job Description, and Related Matters

Reed testified that during the afternoon of 8 April he decided to reorganize the quality control function, and replace it with the quality area supervisors. Because on 8 April he told McAllister and (shortly before 3:30 p.m.) Dickenson that in the future the quality control foremen (referring to Dickenson, Axley, and Griffin) would have to perform the quality control work, I infer that Reed made that replacement decision after these conversations. Between the afternoon of Tuesday, 8 April, and Monday, 14 April, Reed, McAllister, and Dickenson engaged in various discussions about having the work performed by persons in addition to Dickenson, Axley, and Griffin.[21] By 10 or 11 April Reed decided that the work should be so performed at the pay grade level of 14 (3 grade levels above the quality control technicians' jobs). Reed testified, in effect, that by that time he had decided to use six quality area supervisors to replace the seven quality control technicians allegedly discriminated against (supra, fn. 11). When asked by company counsel, "What did you calculate you saved in the way of salaries, by eliminating the Quality Control Technicians?" Reed replied, "Eliminating 12 quality control technicians at their base rate, would be somewhere in the vicinity of $400,000 a year." At the base rate for their jobs, the 12 quality control technicians would have been paid a total of about $236,000 a year; their yearly salaries would have totaled about $345,000 if all 12 had been paid (as they were not) at the maximum. The total wages of the seven alleged discriminatees was about $194,000 annually. As discussed infra, this sum exceeded by about $18,000 the total to the 6 quality area supervisors, whom Reed decided no later than 11 April to pay at the grade 14 level—3 levels higher than the quality control technicians. Moreover, as previously noted, all 12 of the quality control technicians were to receive severance pay, and the cash payments which Respondent promised in connection with the severance of Dailey and Hurley alone exceeded $25,000.

No earlier than the afternoon of Wednesday, 9 April, and no later than Monday, 14 April, Reed instructed Weymouth to find individuals to fill the quality area supervisors' jobs.[22] On 14 April Respondent's industrial relations department, which is headed by Weymouth, posted the following notice in the plant:

CANDIDATE SPECIFICATIONS

Due to a reorganization, several positions of "quality area supervisor" are available. Interested candidates should apply to personnel no later than Wednesday, April 16, 1986 by 7:00 a.m.

EXPERIENCE: Supervisory and/or quality assurance

EDUCATION: College helpful

This notice was not distributed outside the plant. Weymouth testified that the notice was "probably" drafted by Dickenson and someone in the industrial relations department. Dickenson was not directly asked about this matter, and some of his testimony is difficult to square with any conclusion that he participated in drafting it (see supra, fn. 21, and infra, fn. 26).

A total of 10 persons applied for the posted quality area supervisor's job. Of these applicants, four—all of whom were hired—consisted of the only four terminated quality control technicians whom Personnel Director Pike telephoned about the notice posted in the plant.[23] The six remaining applicants were all working in the plant when the notice was posted there. Of these six, Respondent selected two line foremen—Bobby Richardson and Don Murphy—for the job. Richardson was probably among the line foremen scheduled for inclusion in the 11 April salaried layoff, and Murphy may also have been in that group.[24] The layoff of line foremen, which on 1 and 2 April Reed had anticipated would occur in May, did not in fact occur until 20 June. On that date, Respondent laid off four line foremen, rather than the eight or nine Reed had anticipated before line foremen Richardson and Murphy were selected as quality area supervisors.[25] McAllister credibly testified that the six successful applicants for the quality area supervisors' jobs were selected about 14 April. At least as of 28 April 1986 no decision had been reached as to what authority, if any, Axley

[21] This finding is based on credible parts of the testimony of Reed and McAllister. Dickenson testified that any such discussions began no earlier than Wednesday, 16 April, when he and Reed "started talking about SAS and SPC [see infra. sec. II,D,1] and getting some people in there that we could put those kinds of programs into our plant." I do not credit this testimony in view of the fact that the quality area supervisor's job was posted on 14 April (see infra) and the 14 April date on a memorandum by Reed to Twickler which stated, inter alia, that Respondent intended to have two "Quality supervisors" per shift who "would input quality data from the Manufacturing areas into the computer."

[22] My finding that these instructions were given is based on the testimony of Reed and Weymouth, neither of whom gave a date. My finding as to the dates is based on the fact that the job was posted on 14 April and on the evidence that as of noon on 9 April (as shown by Dickenson's remarks at that time in the X-ray office) Dickenson still believed that the quality control technicians' function would have to be performed by himself and the two incumbent quality control foremen.

[23] In response to questions by me, Weymouth gave some testimony about why only these four, and not the remaining seven, had been alerted to the vacancy and interviewed for the job. Weymouth testified that the interviews were conducted by him and Dickenson, and that Dickenson's opinions about these seven technicians played a part in the decision not to interview them for the job. Dickenson was not asked either whether he had taken part in the interviews or what part (if any) he played in the decision not to tell seven of the technicians about the vacancies; his testimony about the kind of people he wanted for the job is directed to intramanagement discussions after the successful applicants had been selected and, perhaps, after they had started work. I make no findings about Respondent's real reason for selecting these particular four for consideration.

[24] Seven line supervisors were terminated on 11 April, and five more were terminated on 18 April—4 days after Richardson and Murphy were selected for the quality area supervisors' jobs. R. Exh. 4, which Weymouth identified as a list of terminations of individuals "from January 1, 1986 through [30 July 1986] who are no longer employed with" Respondent, does not include Richardson or Murphy, but does include the names of all four of the quality control technicians who stopped working as such on 10 April and, without being dropped from the payroll, began to work as quality area supervisors on 21 April.

would have over the six quality area supervisors (see supra, fn. 18).

The record shows that the job description for quality area supervisor was not formulated until after the jobs had been posted, Weymouth and Dickenson had selected the successful applicants, and such applicants had been hired. Reed testified that the job description did not exist as of 8 April, and that it was created by Dickenson "around April 14th [or] the 15th. In that area." Weymouth testified that during the week ending Friday, 11 April, he was not involved at all in formulating a job description for that position, and that he did not review the job description with Dickenson until "sometime after that period . . . . It could have been" 14 or 15 April. Dickenson was not asked when, or even whether, he created the job description. However, inferences about the earliest date he could have prepared it can be derived from his testimony about the dates of his discussions regarding the SPC system (explained infra, sec. II,D,1), which is specifically mentioned in that job description. Thus, he testified that it was not until "like the mid-week after all the technicians were gone" (they last worked on Thursday, 10 April) that he started talking to Reed about SPC and the Statistical Analysis System (SAS, explained infra, sec. II,D,1). Moreover, Dickenson went on to testify that it may have been as late as 4 days later (that is, perhaps as late as on or after 21 April, the quality area supervisors' first day of employment as such) when he and Reed started talking about whether statistical analysis could be effectively brought into the plant.[26] Although the job description recites that the quality area supervisor's duties include "Directing and training of production supervision in Standard Practice [Specifications] and Quality Control Procedures" and "Alerting and reviewing factory supervision of process or product defect problems which are presently occurring," at least as of 28 April Respondent had not yet decided what authority, if any, the quality area supervisors would have over the manufacturing foremen and over the line foremen.[27]

Twickler testimonially authenticated as a "reorganization plan" for the quality control function a memorandum to him from Reed dated 14 April and specifying "Quality Control Reorganization" as a subject. On the basis of the date on this memorandum, Twickler testified that he received it in the mail about 16 or 17 April. He testified that he thereafter approved the plan; he was not asked for a date. Reed's covering memorandum states, inter alia, "The Quality supervisor at [shift's] end, would input quality data from the Manufacturing areas into the computer, thus streamlining Quality data output to management." This is the only reliable evidence as to the earliest date when Respondent decided to require quality area supervisors to learn to operate computers (cf. supra, fns. 11 and 21). Other portions of this memorandum are discussed infra.

By memorandum dated 17 March to Reed, McAllister, and Production Manager Ernest Custer, Respondent's corporate headquarters confirmed that the annual corporate quality audit of the Madison plant would be conducted during the week beginning 14 April. This audit was to include floor verification of the system. Alleged discriminatee Hurley credibly testified that the number of checks made by the quality control technicians was very important for the annual corporate audit. As previously noted, the decision to terminate 10 salaried personnel from the manufacturing division was made by 1 April, the decision to terminate 5 quality control technicians was made on 7 April, and the decision to terminate the rest of the quality control technicians was made in the afternoon of 8 April. On an undisclosed date subsequent to the afternoon of 8 April but before 12 April, Reed and Custer decided to postpone the audit to the week of 9 June. Reed was not asked why this decision was reached, Custer did not testify, and McAllister (whose only appearance on the stand was as an adverse witness called by the General Counsel) was not asked anything about the audit. Quality Control Superintendent Dickenson testified that the technical department was ready for the quality audit the week of 14 April, that he and "quality" wanted to have it then because "we had already collected the data that affected my department," but that the "factory" was "pretty well disrupted." Dickenson went on to testify that during the week of 14 April there had been changes in the manufacturing department in that "some people had been laid off there, a reduction in ticket and scheduling so . . . it was pretty disrupted." The termination of 10 salaried personnel in the manufacturing division, which termination had been decided on 1 April, became effective as of 14 April. However, no more than 5 of Respondent's 513 hourly employees were laid off in April, the April production schedule was the same as the March schedule, and actual production in April was almost as great as it had been in March.[28] Moreover, much of Dickenson's description of the events on the manufacturing floor "in April" is directed at the consequences of an hourly layoff (which did not occur in March or, to any great extent, April) rather than a salaried layoff ("job bidding, reassignment, people going even from one area to another area of the plant, probably at jobs they had never worked before . . . bids up, people trying to get to their new job and stay long enough to train people on their old job"). In May 1986, the month preceding the week (June 9–13) when the audit in fact took place, the scheduled and the actual production had been substantially cut as compared to April,[29] and 97 hourly employees and 1 salaried individual were terminated.

[26] Reed testified that, during his conversation with McAllister on the afternoon of 8 April, Reed referred to the job title "quality area supervisors." Furthermore, this is the job title used in the 14 April job posting. Moreover, the "Quality Control Re-Organization" memorandum from Reed to Twickler dated 14 April (see infra) refers to such persons as "quality supervisors." However, Dickenson testified that his conversations with Reed, which according to Dickenson began about 16 April, included "quite a few discussions about the title for these people. 'Statistician' didn't seem to fit, you know, that type of thing. We came up with supervisor."

[27] Nor is the record clear as to any such authority as of the hearing in late July 1986. See infra, sec. II,D,3.

[29] May scheduled production was 9000 a day, compared to 12,500 in April. Actual production averaged 7406 in May as compared to 12,189 in April. Scheduled production in June was 7500 a day, and actual production averaged 7015.

Quality area supervisors have a salary grade of 14, ranging between $24,336 and $35,880 annually.[30] Although the wages paid to all 7 of the alleged discriminatees fell within this range, their classification (quality control technician) had a salary grade of 11, ranging between $19,604 and $28,548 annually. Alleged discriminatees Douglas and Kemp are both paid about 5 percent more as quality area supervisors than they had been paid as quality control technicians.[31] Douglas had been the highest paid among the quality control technicians allegedly discriminated against, and as of 21 April 1986 was also the highest paid quality area supervisor.[32] The lowest paid quality area supervisor (Sisk) had a lower salary than had been received by any of the quality control technicians allegedly discriminated against. The average salary paid to the quality area supervisors as of 21 April 1986 was about $1600 higher than the average salary which had been received by the quality control technicians allegedly discriminated against. The total wages paid as of 10 April 1986 to the seven quality control technicians who were allegedly discriminated against exceeded by about $18,000 the total wages of the six quality area supervisors as of 21 April 1986, the day they began working as such. This $18,000 was about $8000 less than the salary of the lowest paid alleged discriminatee (Mason) as a quality control technician and about $7000 less than the salary of the lowest paid quality area supervisor (Sisk) as of 21 April 1986.

D. The Duties and Supervision of the Quality Control Technicians and the Quality Area Supervisors

1. Background, Respondent's acquisition of computer equipment, and the SPC and SAS systems

Respondent produced tires at five plants, including the Madison plant involved in this proceeding. Reed credibly testified that some sort of quality control program is necessary in a business such as his. At all material times, Respondent has had a corporate quality assurance group, based in New Haven, Connecticut, which administers a companywide program for checking on the quality control program conducted by each of the five tire plants. Throughout the 1-year period between August 1985 and the hearing in late July 1986, the corporate quality assurance group has been assisting the Madison plant in implementing a statistical process control program (SPC, described infra) and in setting up a statistical analysis system (SAS, described infra). The purpose of these data processing systems is to turn data into a form which gives Respondent more usable results than it could obtain from merely inspecting the data.

Reed described the SPC program as involving a series of checks and plotting checks on graphs to determine whether components produced by Respondent are trending toward out-of-tolerance weight or dimensions. On an undisclosed date in late summer or early fall 1985, Dickenson and other members of management talked about setting up some SPC teams. Inferentially, thereafter, and on undisclosed dates before 7 April 1986, Senior Quality Control Foreman Griffin attempted to obtain some information about SPC, traveled on one occasion to New Haven corporate headquarters for that purpose, and obtained some brochures and books on that subject. In December 1985 he started learning to operate a computer to learn about SPC. Thereafter, he bagan to enter data into a computer with a keyboard and a screen, which was installed in the Madison technical office. Reed testified that Griffin did so to generate computer reports, and also that he "was establishing the model." Between Thanksgiving and Christmas 1985, Joe Herrin and other personnel from the New Haven corporate office came to the Madison plant to give "SPC classes" attended by Dickenson and by whom he described as "some people . . . from other plants and our own people." In early or mid-February 1986, the Madison quality control office acquired an additional computer with a keyboard and a screen, and also acquired a printer shared by both computers. Reed testified that these two computers were "SPC units," and that before April 1986 they were being used on tread length control and on belt width control, respectively. He went on to testify that as of 7 April 1986 the plant had not installed any new data processing equipment, and that these same units (the two computers and the printer) were being used as of the date of his testimony (30 July 1986) for the SPC system, "plus we are using the SPC functions in plotting other operations."

Quality control technicians were required to enter the results of their checks, audits, and inspections onto 6 to 15 forms that they filled out every day. Dickenson credibly testified that the originals of these forms were all sent to Griffin, who put out weekly or monthly quality ratings based on an accumulation of all the checks which had been made. Dickenson did not testify about the extent, if any, to which these quality ratings constituted or were based on the computer reports which (according to Reed) were being generated by Griffin's operation of the SPC units. However, I conclude that data set forth in the quality control technicians' reports were entered into the SPC units by Griffin for the purpose, at the very least, of maintaining tread length control and belt width control, purposes for which (according to Reed) these units were used before April 1986. Thus, Dailey, a quality control technician in the finishing department until his termination on 10 April 1986, credibly testified that some of the forms filled out by him were "fed through computers, I don't know how much." Hurley, a night-shift control technician in the millroom until his termination on 10 April 1986, credibly testified that the scrap weight tickets were put in the "data processing box." Moreover, the quality control technicians' reports included information which would have been useful for the purposes which the computers (according to Reed) were actually serving (see infra, fn. 33). Furthermore, after 28 April 1986 at least some of this same information was entered into these same computers by quality area supervisors whom Griffin had instructed in computer operation (see infra, sec. II,D,4). Finally, Reed testified that until [30] Axley (see supra, fn. 18) is also in salary grade 14. The record fails to show what he is actually paid.

[31] As of 21 April 1986, their last day as quality control technicians, they were paid about $31,000 and $28,000, respectively.

[32] My findings in this sentence, and in the rest of this paragraph, exclude consideration of Axley (see supra, fns. 18 and 30).

April 1986 Griffin performed the same data-entry function thereafter performed at least partly by quality area supervisors, who entered into these same computers data of the same kind as that collected by quality control technicians (see infra, sec. II,D,4).[33]

The SAS system is a statistical analysis computer program that, on the basis of data put into the computer, gives the percentages of Respondent's production which are in tolerance or out of tolerance. Dickenson testified that "we" started getting information on SAS about December 1985. Before Christmas 1985, Herrin gave some information about SAS to Dickenson and other persons whose names are not shown by the record but who, inferentially, were also members of management. Reed testified that on unspecified dates before mid-April 1986, the plant technical department had a "model" of the SAS system, which Griffin had been doing some work with. Respondent developed and installed the SAS system itself in mid-April 1986 after the alleged discriminatees' termination.

The quality area supervisors' job description (drawn up no earlier than 14 April) stated, inter alia, that they were to "Become active Statistical Process Control team members"—teams whose setting up had been discussed by management in late summer or early fall 1985. During the first week that the quality area supervisors were working as such, all of them spent all their working hours attending training sessions on statistics control, with Griffin and Herrin as instructors. These training sessions included instruction on how to operate the two computers that had been in the technical office since December 1985 and February 1986, respectively, and that Griffin had operated during this period. During the week following the quality area supervisors' week of full-time instruction, instruction was combined with operations on the floor. Thereafter, and as of the second day of the hearing (30 July 1986), the quality area supervisors continued to receive additional training, including training on how to enter data into the computer. Dickenson testified on that hearing day "Most of them can enter quite a bit of their own data." This procedure comsumes 15 to 60 minutes a day per man. As discussed infra, the quality area supervisors spent most of the rest of their time collecting statistical data on tires and their components, and noting such data on audit sheets or other paper. As discussed infra, the quality contol technicians had also collected such data, and noted them on audit sheets.

Dickenson testified that Respondent began using the SPC system soon after the quality control technicians were laid off (cf. supra, sec. II,D,1). He testified that it "does take time" (he did not specify how long) to "establish" the SPC system, but that, once it is established, comprehensible results can be reached with much smaller samples, and for a much longer timeframe, than was possible with "the old way of gathering data." He further testified that when data are entered by computer into the SAS system, the computer can produce charts showing "where you are today or last week, last month, compared to where you are right now." Reed's explanation of the SAS system shows that Dickenson was referring to charts showing the percentages of production which are in tolerance or out of tolerance.

I infer that, until deciding on 8 April 1986 to terminate all the employees classified as quality control technicians, Respondent planned to give them about the same kind of statistical and computer training administered to the quality area supervisors on and after 21 April 1986, and, on the basis of such training, to require quality control technicians to perform the same king of computer work which was in fact performed by the quality area supervisors. I so infer from the following evidence: Respondent had been planning since August 1985 to implement the SPC system and to set up an SAS system. A significant portion of the quality control technicians' duties (like the principal duty of the quality area supervisors) was to compile the data which were put into the computers when SPC and SAS were introduced. Reed testified that, when Senior Quality Control Foreman Griffin (the supervisor of the quality control technicians and, later, the quality area supervisors) entered into a computer some of the data complied by the quality control technicians, he "was establishing the model." Reed further testified that Respondent's entire data processing equipment consisted of two computers (which he described as "SPC units") and a printer, all of which Respondent was using before the quality control technicians were terminated and which Respondent thereafter used for the SPC system and the SAS program. Finally, when selecting quality area supervisors, Respondent hired mostly former quality control technicians, but did not (so far as the record shows) make any effort to ascertain whether applicants had any statistical or computer training or aptitude.[34]

2. The supervision and general duties of quality control technicians

During the first 3 months of 1986, each quality control technician covered one of three areas—namely, (1) the millroom, (2) tire assembly, and (3) finishing, curing, and the warehouse. When the plant was operating on three shifts, one technician would be assigned to each of the three areas on each shift, except that two technicians would be assigned to area 3 on the day shift. In addition, Respondent employed one "floater," who filled in for technicians who were absent or on vacation, and helped out when production was picking up. On occasion, Quality Control Superintendent Dickenson asked quality control technicians to change areas, and in most cases these employees were willing to do so.[35] These 11 quality control technicians reported directly to Quality Control Foreman Ernest Axley. Axley reported directly to Senior Quality Control Foreman Rodney Griffin, who reported directly to Quality Control Superintendent

[33] Thus, both quality control technicians and quality area supervisors collected data on the width and length of tread.

[34] As previously noted, among the terminated quality control technicians whom Respondent did not advise of the quality area supervisor's jobs was Hurley, whose college major was mathematics and who in 1970 had had a college course in computers. However, Hurley has never run an SPC computer on the SPC program, and does not know what the SAS program is.

[35] Both of the quality control technicians who testified had worked as such in two areas.

Dickenson, who in turn reported directly to Technical Services Manager Kin McAllister. As previously noted, each quality control technician submitted at the end of each shift a number of written reports. The original copies were sent to Senior Quality Control Foreman Griffin, who used them to prepare a weekly or monthly quality rating. A copy of each such report was sent to the superintendent of the area in question, to corporate headquarters in New Haven, to the "technical department," to Production Manager Ernest Custer, to Quality Control Superintendent Dickenson, and (sometimes) to Technical Services Manager McAllister. General Manager Reed testified that, if these reports showed that most of the checks were within specification, Respondent "assumed" that the product was satisfactory. Dickenson testified that he "would glance at [the reports] and look and see if there was any circles around there, denoting something that was out of spec. If there was no circle, I would probably [throw] them away." There is no evidence as to what corporate headquarters, the "technical department," Custer, or McAllister did with these documents.[36]

3. The supervision and general duties of quality area supervisors

Quality area supervisors are directly supervised by Senior Quality Control Foreman Griffin and (perhaps) by Axley, who had been the immediate superior of quality control technicians and, as such, had directly reported to Griffin.[37] Griffin still reports directly to Quality Control Superintendent Dickenson, who in turn still reports directly to Technical Services Manager McAllister.

Two quality area supervisors are assigned to each shift. All 6 of them perform their duties throughout the plant; Dickenson testimonially attributed at least partly to their limited numbers the difference between their work areas and the more limited work areas in which each of the 11 quality control technicians respectively worked. The quality area supervisors' job description, prepared on an undisclosed date after they started to work as such, states, inter alia, that they are expected to "Monitor all phases of our performance and adherence to the following: specification, standard practice specification, equipment checks, hold release, set-ups, and local procedures." Reed testified that as of 8 April 1986 he intended to confer on quality area supervisors' "supervisory privileges," which he explained as "to stop an operation if it was found out of control, to work within the other manufacturing supervisors, superintendents that would be on the floor at that time." He went on to testify that these were the only "supervisory privileges" he had had in mind. McAllister credibly testified that as of 28 April it had not yet been decided what authority, if any, the quality area supervisors would have over the manufacturing foremen and line foremen. He further credibly testified that as of that date the quality area supervisors did not discipline employees, and that at no time had they authority to recommend discipline.[38] Industrial Relations Manager Weymouth testified in late July that, when the quality area supervisors were first hired, Respondent planned that they would usually go through the manufacturing foreman to effect a change, but in the unusual circumstance quality area supervisors "will have authority" to do it themselves. On the following day, Dickenson testified at one point that quality area supervisors, if they find a defective product or improper operation, have authority to stop it without finding the production foreman. However, he elsewhere testified that, when the quality area supervisors find such deficiencies, "[w]e would notify the manufacturing people and help wherever we could to stop that operation from going on . . . . Tie if off if necessary . . . you're reacting to the conditions you find." When quality control technicians (not contended to be supervisors) found a defective product or improper operation, they could not ordinarily stop production, or take corrective action, without the approval of the foreman in that department. However, if the problem was serious and the foreman was not readily available, quality control technician Hurley, at least, would tell the operator to shut down the operation, and would then find the foreman and tell him about the problem.[39] Like quality control technicians, quality area supervisors do not have any employees under them.[40]

In the course of the quality control technicians' work, they carried with them a clipboard holding audit forms, a tape measure, a tread gauge, and on occasion a mill knife. They used chalk to mark defective tires, but the record fails to show whether they carried chalk with them. Quality area supervisors carry with them a clipboard to hold audit forms or slips of paper, a gauge, a tape measure, a mill knife, a flashlight, and chalk to mark defective tires.

4. The nature of the checks performed and the data collected by the quality area supervisors and the quality control technicians

In the millroom, the quality area supervisors recheck chemical weights of the rubber mixture which comes out of the "Banbury" mixer; collect data on the width, length, and gauge of the treads; collect data on the gauge and width of the sidewalls; check fabric dimensions and the splice width of ply; and perform random audits on the mixer setups. Also, the quality area supervisors initially collected, but later stopped collecting, data as to strands, turns, and diameter of beads. Quality con-

[36] McAllister was called by the General Counsel as an adverse witness, and was not asked about this matter. Custer did not testify.

[37] See supra, fns. 18 and 30. At least as of 28 April 1986, 3 months before the hearing, no decision had been reached as to what authority, if any, Axley would have over quality area supervisors.

[38] For demeanor reasons, I do not credit Dickenson's testimony that they have authority to recommend discipline.

[39] Hurley had been a quality control technician for 13 years. He impressed me as having a good deal more self-confidence than Dailey, who had been a quality control technician for 5 years and who credibly testified to the belief that he had no authority to stop the machines or to tell an employee how to operate his machine. Dickenson, who testified that quality control technicians had no such authority, was in general an unreliable witness; see supra fns. 21 and 26.

[40] In view of the evidence summarized in the text, I conclude that "quality area supervisors" are not "supervisors" within the meaning of Sec. 2(11) of the Act. Indeed, Respondent has not contended otherwise.

trol technicians had collected all these data and had made similar random audits.

In the tire assembly area, quality area supervisors inspect the inside and outside of tire carcasses to determine whether the correct carcasses have been used, whether the correct specifications have been imprinted on the tires, whether the tread had been correctly identified, and whether the tires have such defects as improper splices, wide liners, whitewall splices, wrinkled turn-ups, or trapped air. Also, quality area supervisors perform random audits of the tire assembly machine setups. The quality control technicians had performed all these inspections and had made similar random audits.

In the finishing, curing, and warehouse area, the quality area supervisors perform audits on samples of finished goods. On occasion, if an audit suggests that a defect is "running" in a particular kind of tire, the quality area supervisors check each of these tires individually. Except that the quality area supervisors seldom use the optimizer, the audit of the tires which are in fact checked is the same as the one which had been performed by the quality control technicians on the tires checked by them. The quality control technicians had audited all tires, except that they audited only samples of "some catalog numbers that are proven that they were okay." Each tire in "price club" orders had been checked by quality control technicians and is now checked by quality area supervisors.

The quality control technicians' duties included tracking down tires already in the warehouse when a check of similar tires suggested a defect common to all of them. Quality area supervisors have these same duties.

A significant proportion of the quality control technicians' workday had been devoted to making checks of work which was at least supposed to have been checked by the foreman and/or the operator.[41] From time to time, these "double checks" had disclosed mistakes made by the foreman and/or the operator—on very rare occasions of a possibly dangerous nature. Dickenson testified that if a mistake was not caught by the operator, the foreman, or the quality control technician who checked it, all three would be considered blameworthy, although the technician would be less to blame than the others. In the millroom, these "double checks" had included checking each setup and each changover of the mixers; checking each setup of the extruders (tubers); and checking three setups per shift of the gum calender. In tire assembly, these "double checks" had included checking each changeover of the bead forming operation; checking each tire assembly setup; and checking the cutting operation. Although the quality area supervisors do make such checks on a random basis, their regular performance either has been eliminated or is the responsibility of the foreman or the operator.

Before 11 April 1986, oil connections were made in the presence of a quality control technician (who was responsible for seeing to it that the connection was made properly) and the pipefitter; normally, the maintenance foreman was not present. Thereafter, the pipefitter and the maintenance foreman were responsible for the correct coupling, for which the quality area supervisors had no responsibility.

For an undisclosed period which continued after 21 April 1986, employee Meyers was classified as a quality control engineer, and performed certain tests required by the Department of Transportation. At least some of these tests required the use of an X-ray machine, and at least some of them called for checks on the dimensions of cross sections, circumference, and tread radius on a certain number of tires. Thereafter, and on an undisclosed date before 30 July 1986, Meyers was reclassified as a quality area supervisor, and the quality area supervisors were all taught to perform these DOT-required tests. There is no evidence that the particular X-ray operation initially performed by Meyers was ever performed by the quality control technicians. However, the quality control technicians had used an X-ray machine to perform random tests in the finishing operation.

E. Analysis and Conclusions

In Birch Run Welding, the court held:

> [A]lthough the General Counsel must usually show that the employer knew about individual employees' union activities before the Board may conclude that the employer violated § 8(a)(3), the General Counsel may also prevail by showing that the employer ordered general lay-offs for the purpose of discouraging union activity or in retaliation against its employees because of the union activities of some. This theory is viable even though some employees who actually opposed the union . . . were laid off with their pro-union counterparts.

Birch Run Welding v. NLRB, 761 F.2d 1175, 1180 (6th Cir. 1985), and cases cited. I conclude that the General Counsel has shown by a preponderance of the evidence that Respondent decided on 8 April 1986 to terminate the seven alleged discriminatees because Respondent had just found out that the Union had filed a petition seeking to represent them. Although there is no evidence whether any of the employees in the proposed unit had in fact engaged in any union activity, Respondent clearly believed that some or all of them had. Thus, immediately after learning about the petition, General Manager Reed telephoned Vice President Twickler and (according to Twickler) said that Reed had just heard that the quality control technicians had petitioned for "joining the Union." Moreover, during this conversation Twickler admittedly remarked that "it sounded like an effort to move under the umbrella of the union to protect their job." If (as I find) such a belief motivated the termination of the seven alleged discriminatees, their termination was unlawful whether or not Respondent was correct in that belief. Gulf-Wandes Corp., 233 NLRB 772, 778 (1977), enfd. in relevant part 595 F.2d 1074 (5th Cir. 1979), and cases cited; Crucible, Inc., 228 NLRB 723, 729 (1977), and cases cited; Hedison Mfg. Co., 249 NLRB 791, 808–809 (1980), enfd. 643 F.2d 32 (1st Cir. 1981).

[41] Dickenson testified that such tasks consumed 70 to 80 percent of the quality control technicians' time. I believe this figure to be somewhat overstated because elimination of most of these checks had been proposed by McAllister on 7 April as a concomitant to the termination of about 42 percent of the quality control technicians.

Persuasively pointing to Respondent's unlawful motive is the timing of Respondent's decision to terminate the seven alleged discriminatees. The credible evidence shows that as of 7 April, and until Reed learned around noon on 8 April about the Union's petition and called to tell Twickler about it shortly before 2 p.m., Respondent had every intention of retaining these seven employees, and that the termination decision was reached by 2 p.m. on 8 April. There is no credible evidence that anything at all intervened during this period of less than 2 days, other than Respondent's receipt of notice about the petition, to account for the change in Respondent's plans.[42] Particularly in view of this sequence of events, such timing points to the conclusion that the decision to terminate these seven employees was motivated by the Union's petition. Birch Run Welding, 761 F.2d at 1180–1181; Jim Causley, Inc. v. NLRB, 620 F.2d 122, 125 (6th Cir. 1980); NLRB v. Tennessee Packers, 390 F.2d 782, 784 (6th Cir 1968); Lebis Contracting, 267 NLRB 49, 50 (1983). Lending further support to such an inference is that by Reed's own testimony the alleged discriminatees, who had been classified as quality control technicians, were "replaced" by personnel who had the newly denominated job classification of quality area supervisors;[43] such persons were selected about the working day following the last day when the seven alleged discriminatees worked as quality control technicians. Fedco Freightlines, 273 NLRB 399, 401 (1984); Sumco Mfg. Co., 251 NLRB 427, 438 (1980), enfd. 678 F.2d 46 (6th Cir. 1982); B. J. & R. Machine Co., 270 NLRB 267, 269 (1984). As compared to the work that Reed and McAllister planned as of 7 April to assign to the seven alleged discriminatees after the remaining quality control technicians were terminated as of 11 April, the only difference of any significance between such technicians' work and the work performed by the quality area supervisors is that, to the extent that the data compiled by them were entered into the computer, all the data compiled by the quality control technicians were entered by Senior Quality Control Foreman Griffin, whereas some of the data compiled by the quality area supervisors were entered by them.[44] I regard this change as insubstantial in view of the following: When selected, the quality area supervisors did not (so far as the record shows) have any knowledge about operating computers; indeed, four of them were former quality control technicians. Further, there is no evidence that when selecting them Respondent made any effort to ascertain whether they had any experience in, or aptitude for, statistics or the operation of computers. Moreover, the evidence indicates that before terminating the quality control technicians Respondent had been taking steps looking to the performance by them of the computer function now performed by the quality area supervisors. Finally, at the time of the hearing (more than 2 months after the quality area supervisors began work as such), their ability to enter their compiled data into the computer was somewhat limited (in Dickenson's words, "Most of them can enter quite a bit of their own data"). Further pointing to the essential identity of the two jobs is the action of Respondent's Madison management in terminating the quality control technicians, and hiring the quality area supervisors, before Vice President Twickler had even received (much less approved) a purported reorganization plan supposedly calling for such action and before drawing up the job description for the quality area supervisor's job. Indeed, when Respondent got around to drawing up this job description, Respondent drew up a fair description of the quality control technicians' jobs with the addition of certain computer duties.[45] Moreover, the authority of and the supervision over the quality area supervisors had not been fully determined as of the date of the hearing, more than 3 months after the quality area supervisors began to work as such.

Further indicative of Respondent's unlawful motive is Respondent's failure to make, before terminating the seven alleged discriminatees, the arrangements which it eventually did make for the continued performance of quality control functions previously performed by the quality control technicians. Although Reed admitted that some sort of quality control program is needed in Respondent's business, and although Respondent performed after the technicians' termination the work which as of 7 April Respondent had intended the seven alleged discriminatees to perform after 11 April, until 9 April at the earliest Respondent did nothing at all (so far as the record shows) looking toward obtaining other persons to perform such work. Although creating an appearance of common motive for the termination of all 12 of the quality control technicians, Respondent's termination of the 7 alleged discriminatees effective the same day as the termination of the 5 quality control technicians whose termination had been decided on for lawful economic reasons before Respondent learned of the Union's petition[46] meant that during the next 2 weeks only 3 people—Griffin (when he was not instructing the quality area supervisors), Axley, and Dickenson—were available to perform the quality control work which Respondent had planned as of 7 April to be performed by the 7 alleged discriminatees and which, 2 weeks after their termination, began [42] Indeed, the only evidence even suggesting any other factor is Twickler's uncorroborated and discredited testimony that on the morning of 8 April he suggested to Reed that the already scheduled cutback be increased by five or six. However, Reed testified that the decision to terminate the seven alleged discriminatees (which he testified was made by him) was not until the afternoon of that day.

[43] As Respondent's able brief puts it (p. 7), "Reed determined that the Company would use a quality assurance supervisor, rather than quality control technicians."

[44] The record fails to show how much was entered from the quality control technicians' compilations as compared to the quality area supervisors' compilations.

Although it is true that the quality area supervisors perform substantially fewer "double checks" than the quality control technicians in fact performed, Respondent had planned such a change in the remaining technicians' duties at the time that it decided on 7 April to terminate four technicians and before Respondent's 8 April decision to terminate the rest of them.

[45] More specifically, quality area supervisors were to be "completely trained on Statistical Process Control Methodology," to be "active Statistical Process Control team member[a]," "to do all data entry," and to "review all chart plotting and procedures."

[46] This common termination date may have been the reason all the quality control technicians were named in the original charges filed by the Union, which at that time may not have suspected that the decisions to terminate the technicians were not simultaneous.

to be performed by the quality area supervisors. Furthermore, Respondent's termination of the seven alleged discriminatees before making any arrangements for the performance of the work Respondent had intended them to do imposed on Respondent the further inconvenience of having to postpone the quality audit from the week of 14 April to the week of 9 June. That this was the reason for the rescheduling is shown by Reed's testimony that the quality audit was not rescheduled until after Respondent's 8 April decision to terminate the seven alleged discriminatees; by the probability that the audit would have been rescheduled before 8 April if the decision to reschedule it had been motivated by events which occurred before 8 April; and by the demonstrable falsity of Dickenson's testimony that the rescheduling was motivated by confusion due to an hourly layoff, although the most recent substantial hourly layoff had occurred more than 3 months earlier. Moreover, Respondent's conduct after deciding to terminate the remaining seven quality control technicians indicates that Respondent was attempting to resume the performance of their work as quickly as possible, while at the same time to conceal the fact that the quality area supervisors were essentially quality control technicians with a different job title. Thus, Respondent posted the quality area supervisor's job on the next working day (14 April) after the day that the quality control technicians lost routine access to the plant bulletin board, and about that same day selected all the successful applicants. Further, the job posting contained no job description from which the technicians (or anyone else) could infer that the supposedly new jobs were essentially the same as the ostensibly discontinued ones; and, by controlling the number and identity of technicians who learned about these vacancies before they were filled, Respondent controlled the number and identity of the technicians who would have been included in the unit sought by the Union and who filled the quality area supervisors' jobs.

Finally, the evidence shows that the reasons advanced by Reed for the termination of the seven alleged discriminatees were not the real reasons. Reed testified that he decided on 8 April to terminate these seven because the quality control technicians were basically performing double checks and the technicians' termination would save money. Although the record does show that these were the reasons for Reed's 7 April decision to terminate the five quality control technicians not named in the complaint, the record further shows that these were not the real reasons for the termination of the seven alleged discriminatees. Rather, the evidence shows that Respondent's decision to eliminate most of the double checks had been reached on 7 April, before Respondent learned about the Union's petition; that the work which on 7 April Respondent had decided to have performed after 10 April by the seven alleged discriminatees was in fact performed after 28 April by the quality area supervisors; and that this change at best saved Respondent little money and may well have cost it more.

Nothwithstanding the foregoing, Respondent contends that no finding of unlawful termination can be made because there is no independent evidence that Respondent did not want its quality control technicians to be represented by the Union; indeed, Respondent points to the fact that it has recognized the Union as the representative of the hourly paid employees since buying the Madison plant in 1973, and also has contracts with affiliates of the Union at three other plants (see supra, fn. 2, and attached text). However, the evidence shows that, within about 2 hours after learning on 8 April of the Union's petition, Respondent decided to terminate the seven quality control technicians whom on 7 April it had decided to retain; that Respondent thereafter replaced them with personnel whose total cost to Respondent was almost as high as (and perhaps higher than) the cost of the seven alleged discriminatees; and that the reasons advanced by Respondent for its action are not true. Moreover, nothing in the record shows any reasonable explanation, other than the union petition that Reed found out about around noon on 8 April, for Respondent's decision by 2 p.m. on 8 April to terminate the alleged discriminatees whom on 7 April it had decided to exclude from the salaried layoff to be effective on 11 April. From these circumstances, I infer that Respondent acted out of union animus and with the purpose of procuring the withdrawal or dismissal of the Union's petition on the basis of the seeming abolition of the petitioned-for jobs. See Ames Ready-Mix Concrete v. NLRB, 411 F.2d 1159, 1161 (8th Cir. 1969); NLRB v. Melrose Processing Co., 351 F.2d 693, 698–699 (8th Cir. 1965); NLRB v. Ri-Del Tool Mfg. Co., mem. 486 F.2d 1406, 84 LRRM 2630, 2631 (7th Cir. 1973);[47] Shattuck Denn, 362 F.2d at 470; Postal Service, 275 NLRB 510, 511 (1985); Cedar Falls Health Care Center, 276 NLRB 1300, 1302 (1985); Halloran House, 249 NLRB 759 (1980); Aker Plastics, 262 NLRB 1128, 1134 (1982).

As to cases in which an employer asserts permissible reasons for an allegedly unlawful discharge, the Board requires an analysis under Wright Line,[48] even when (as in this case) the reasons asserted by the employer have been found to have played no part in the discharge decision. Taylor & Gaskin, 277 NLRB 563 (1985). Cf. Squire Distributing Co. v. Teamsters Local 7, 801 F.2d 238, 242 (6th Cir. 1986). Accordingly, I find, for the same reasons that underlie my finding that Respondent's tendered reasons for the seven terminations are purely pretextual, that Respondent has failed to sustain its burden of showing that Respondent would have terminated the alleged discriminatees for such reasons in the absence of the Union's petition.

For the foregoing reasons, I find that Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) by terminating quality control technicians Lee Roy Kemp, Roy Dailey, William Douglas, Eugene Kincaid, James Mason, James Hurley, and Lizzie Mae Watson.

I have found that Respondent converted the position of quality control technician to that of quality area su-

[47] The court stated:

> Where the employee is a leading union advocate whose discharge would tend to undermine the union organizational effort and where the Company had previously indicated that it valued the employee's service, the discharge itself is sufficient evidence of antiunion animus.

pervisor in furtherance of Respondent's scheme to continue performance of work performed by the technicians while ridding itself (in violation of Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3)) of employees bearing that job title, and thereby to procure withdrawal or dismissal of the Union's petition for an election among the employees with that job title. Accordingly, I find that by such conversion Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3). Honda of San Diego, 254 NLRB 1248, 1263 (1981); Martin-Brower Co., 261 NLRB 752, 758–759 (1982), enfd. 716 F.2d 896 (4th Cir. 1983); Amber Delivery Service, 250 NLRB 63 (1980), enfd. 651 F.2d 57 (1st Cir. 1981); *Emerson G. CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by terminating employees Lee Roy Kemp, Roy Dailey, William Douglas, Eugene Kincaid, James Mason, James Hurley, and Lizzie Mae Watson about 11 April 1986.

4. Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by converting the position of quality control technician to that of quality area supervisor.

5. The unfair labor practices set forth in Conclusions of Law 3 and 4 affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent had engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to cease and desist therefrom, and from like or related conduct, and to take certain affirmative action in order to effectuate the policies of the Act.

When, as here, an employer has unlawfully terminated employees, the Board ordinarily requires the employer to offer the employees reinstatement to the jobs of which they were unlawfully deprived or, if no such jobs exists, substantially equivalent jobs. In the instant case, Respondent no longer employs employees who perform precisely the same combination of tasks which was performed by the discriminatees before their unlawful termination. Because Respondent's creation of this situation constituted an unfair labor practice and was motivated by an effort to conceal Respondent's unlawful motives for ridding itself of the discriminatees, and because all of the work that Respondent had intended them to perform before it learned of the Union's petition is still being performed by Respondent's personnel, the fact that the discriminatees' exact same jobs no longer exist would not necessarily preclude an order requiring Respondent to offer such jobs to the discriminatees. Fibreboard Corp. v. NLRB, 379 U.S. 203, 215–216 (1964); Alert Medical Transport, 276 NLRB 631, 673 (1985). However, I conclude that it would be more appropriate to require Respondent to offer the discriminatees reinstatement in the quality area supervisors' jobs, which, for purposes of this case, I find to constitute substantially equivalent employment (see supra, sec. II,D). The only work performed by quality area supervisors but not quality control technicians consists of entering data into the computer and certain X-ray work, neither of them tasks which consume a large proportion of the workers' time. Because Respondent gave on-the-job training in such procedures to all the persons hired about 14 April as quality area supervisors, and because the failure of the discriminatees (other than present quality area supervisors Kemp and Douglas) to receive such training is a direct result of their unlawful termination, Respondent is in no position to claim that mere lack of such training renders inappropriate an order requiring the other discriminatees to be offered jobs as quality area supervisors. To be sure, such an order would be unjust to both Respondent and the discriminatees if they could not be trained for such new tasks. However, I conclude that they can be so trained. Thus, so far as the record shows, all four of the quality control technicians who were selected as quality area supervisors learned such tasks at a rate satisfactory to Respondent. Further, so far as the record shows, in selecting the quality area supervisors, Respondent did not take into consideration either their experience in operating computers or their aptitude in learning such work (the only tasks then performed by quality area supervisors which had not been performed by quality control technicians). Finally, the record indicates that before the Union filed its petition Respondent was planning to train its quality control technicians to enter their data into the computer and to require them to do so. I conclude that the discriminatees are capable of being trained for these new tasks and would in any event have eventually been required to learn how to enter their data into the computer. In determining after the reinstatement of any discriminatees (except Kemp and Douglas) whether they have made satisfactory progress in learning these new tasks, Respondent must, or course, evaluate them on the basis of the training which they have had an opportunity to receive, rather than comparing them with other quality area supervisors whose opportunity for training has not been affected by discriminatory denial of employment.

As previously noted, the discriminatees were all being paid at a level which fell within the salary range attached to salary grade 14. I agree with the General Counsel that the required offers of employment should be to the salary grade 14, which Respondent has attached to the quality area supervisors' jobs, rather than to the salary grade 11, which Respondent had attached to the job classification of quality area technicians. Such a requirement is analogous to the routinely issued requirement that reinstatement offers include wage increases and other improvements afforded to incumbents in the discriminatee's old job during a period when that job was unlawfully withheld from him. Chem Fab Corp., 275 NLRB 21, 22 (1985); Kansas Refined Helium Co., 252 NLRB 1156, 1159 (1980).

Accordingly, Respondent will be required to offer jobs as quality area supervisors, with the salary grade 14, to discriminatees Roy Dailey, Eugene Kincaid, James Mason, and James Hurley, dismissing, if necessary, Morton Sadler, James Sisk, Don Murphy, Bobby Richardson, Robert Meyers, and any other individual (except discriminatees Lee Roy Kemp and William Douglas) hired or transferred into such a job since 12 April 1986, without prejudice to the seniority, or other rights and privileges, they would have enjoyed if they had not been terminated about 11 April 1986. Because at the time of the July 1986 hearing discriminatees Kemp and Douglas were in fact working for Respondent as quality area supervisors, Respondent will not be required to offer them employment as such, but will be required to afford them the seniority, and other rights and privileges, they would have enjoyed if they had not been unlawfully terminated about 11 April 1986.

Up to this point, I have failed to discuss any affirmative relief to be afforded to the seventh discriminatee, Lizzie Mae Watson. She is the discriminatee with the lowest seniority, and the record affirmatively shows that Respondent customarily uses seniority as the basis for determining the identity of salaried employees to be terminated for economic reasons within a particular job classification. Although Respondent unlawfully terminated seven quality control technicians, Respondent may have initially employed only six persons to replace them (see supra, fn. 21). Moreover, when Respondent did add another quality area supervisor (Robert Meyers), Respondent transferred him from another job and transferred at least some of the duties of that job to the quality area supervisors. However, the record otherwise fails to show the circumstances surrounding Meyers' transfer or Respondent's usual practice in determining whether to fill salaried vacancies by transfer, recall, or otherwise. Moreover, because the 14 April selection of only six quality area supervisors was part of a design to conceal Respondent's discriminatory motivation by concealing the seven discriminatees' replacement, it cannot be assumed at this point that Respondent decided in good faith that as of 14 April it needed only six persons instead of seven. Accordingly, if no vacancy for Watson is left following the other discriminatees' responses to Respondent's job offers and the dismissal (if necessary) of Sadler, Sisk, Murphy, and Richardson, Respondent will be required to put Watson on a preferential hiring list. Any other job and related rights she may have will be determined at the compliance stage.

Further, Respondent will be required to make all seven of the discriminatees whole for any loss of pay or other benefits they may have suffered by reason of their unlawful termination, less net interim earnings, to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), with interest as called for in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).[49] Because Respondent's unlawful scheme for concealing its discriminatory motivation was directly responsible for the 1-week interval between the discriminatees' last day on the active payroll as quality control technicians and the first day of work by the quality area supervisors, that week is to be included in the backpay period, and gross backpay is to include what the discriminatees would have been paid during that week but for their unlawful termination. In addition, Respondent will be required to expunge from its files any reference to the unlawful teminations, and to notify the seven discriminatees that this has been done and that evidence of such unlawful actions will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982). The General Counsel's request for a "visitatorial clause" will be granted in view of the possible complexity of computing the "make-whole" remedy here. Hilton Inn North, 279 NLRB 45 (1986); but see Westwood Industries, 280 NLRB No. 12 (May 30, 1986) (not reported in Board volumes).[50] Also, Respondent will be required to post appropriate notices.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[51]

ORDER

The Respondent, The Armstrong Rubber Company, Madison, Tennessee, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discouraging membership in International Union of the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local Union No. 670, AFL–CIO–CLC, or any other labor organization, by terminating employees, converting one job into another job, or otherwise discriminating in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

(b) In any like or ralated manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necesary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer jobs as quality area supervisors, at salary grade 14, to Roy Dailey, Eugene Kincaid, James Mason, and James Hurley, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.

(b) Afford Lee Roy Kemp and William Douglas the seniority, and any other rights or privileges, they would have enjoyed if they had not been terminated about 11 April 1986.

(c) If no position as quality area supervisor is available for Lizzie Mae Watson, place her on a preferential list, and offer her such a job as such employment becomes available and before other persons are hired for such work.

(d) Make Dailey, Kincaid, Mason, Hurley, Kemp, Douglas, and Watson whole for any loss of pay or benefits they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

[50] Such problems may include, without limitation, determining the wage rate at which the discriminatees' gross backpay is to be computed. As the General Counsel points out, when Respondent hired discriminatees Kemp and Douglas as quality area supervisors, Respondent paid them about 5 percent more than they had received as quality control technicians.

[51] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(e) Remove from its files any reference to the unlawful terminations and notify the employees in writing that this has been done and that the terminations will not be used against them in any way.

(f) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary or useful for analyzing the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(g) Post at its facility in Madison, Tennessee, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[52] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 26, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(h) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply. For the purpose of determining or securing compliance with this Order, the Board, or any of its duly authorized representatives, may obtain discovery from the Respondent, its officers, agents, successors, or assigns, or any other person having knowledge concerning any compliance matter, in the manner provided by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Such discovery shall be conducted under the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order and may be had on any matter reasonably related to compliance with this Order, as enforced by the court.

[52] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

After a hearing at which all sides had an opportunity to be heard and state their positions, the National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and had ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discourage membership in International Union of the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum and Plastic Workers of America, Local Union No. 670, AFL-CIO-CLC, or any other union, by terminating employees, converting one job into another job, or otherwise discriminating in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 the Act.

WE WILL offer jobs as quality area supervisors to Roy Dailey, Eugene Kincaid, James Mason, and James Hurley, without prejudice to their seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed.

WE WILL afford to Lee Roy Kemp and William Douglas, who are now working as quality area supervisors, the seniority, and any other rights and privileges, they would have enjoyed if they had not been terminated.

If no position as quality area supervisor is available for Lizzie Mae Watson, WE WILL put her on a preferential hiring list, and offer her such a job as such employment becomes available and before other persons are hired for such work.

WE WILL make all seven of these employees whole, with interest, for any loss of pay or benefits they may have suffered by reason of the discrimination against them.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the unlawful terminations of all seven of these employees, and notify them that these terminations will not be used against them in any way.

THE ARMSTRONG RUBBER COMPANY

C.S.E. Contract Cleaning and Service Employees International Union, Local 254, AFL–CIO. Case 1–CA–23800

14 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by Service Employees International Union, Local 254, AFL–CIO (the Union) 30 April 1986 and an amended charge filed 12 June 1986, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint 23 June 1986 against C.S.E. Contract Cleaning (the Company or the Respondent) alleging that it has violated Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) and 8(d) of the National Labor Relations Act. Although properly served copies of the charge and complaint, the Company has failed to file an answer.

On 9 February 1987 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 12 February 1987 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Company filed no response. The allegations in the motion are therefore undisputed.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

Section 102.20 of the Board's Rules and Regulations provides that the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed admitted if an answer is not filed within 10 days from service of the complaint, unless good cause is shown. The complaint states that unless an answer is filed within 10 days of service, "all of the allegations in the complaint shall be deemed to be admitted to be true and shall be so found by the Board." Further, the undisputed allegations in the Motion for Summary Judgment disclose that by letter dated 25 August 1986 the Company was notified that unless an answer was received by 8 September 1986 a Motion for Summary Judgment would be filed. In addition, on 9 October 1986, copies of the charge, amended charge, complaint, and notice of hearing were hand-delivered to the Company.

In the absence of good cause being shown for the failure to file a timely answer, we grant the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a corporation with an office and place of business in Brookline, Massachusetts, is engaged in the business of providing cleaning services to the New England Conservatory of Music. During the calendar year ending 15 June 1986, the Company provided services valued in excess of $50,000 directly to the New England Conservatory of Music. During the calendar year ending 15 June 1986, the New England Conservatory of Music derived gross revenues in excess of $1 million, which amount excludes contributions which, because of limitation by the grantor, are not available for operating expenses. During the calendar year ending 15 June 1986, the New England Conservatory of Music received goods and materials at its Boston, Massachusetts location valued in excess of $5000 from points directly outside the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. We find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Unit and the Union's Representative Status

The following employees of the Respondent constitute a unit appropriate for collective-bargaining purposes within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All full-time and regular part-time employees employed by the Respondent engaged in the Contract Building Cleaning Industry, wherever employed in the covered territory performing janitorial services, including all janitors, porters, cleaners, doormen, elevator operators, starters, handymen and groundsmen, maintenance tradesmen if not previously covered by agreements with other unions, but excluding all executive employees, salaried supervisors, sales employees, clerical employees, hourly paid supervisors, foremen, and employees who do not regularly work in excess of fifteen hours per week.

Since 1981 the Union has been the designated exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit, and since 1981 the Union has been recognized as such representative by the Respondent. Such recognition has been embodied in successive collective-bargaining agreements, the most recent of which is effective by its terms for the period of 1 September 1984 to 31 August 1987.

At all times since 1981 the Union, by virtue of Section 9(a) of the Act, has been, and is, the exclusive representative of the unit employees for the purposes of collective bargaining with respect to rates of pay, wages, hours of employment, and other terms and conditions of employment.

B. The Refusal to Bargain

About January 1986 the Respondent failed to continue in full force and effect all the terms and conditions of the 1984–1987 contract by failing and refusing to remit contributions to the Service Employees Pension Fund as required by article XIII of the 1984–1987 contract, payments for employee health benefits to the Boston Building Service Employees Trust Fund as required by article XII of the 1984–1987 contract, and union dues to the Union as required by article XXXIII of the 1984–1987 contract.

The terms and conditions of the agreement which the Respondent failed to continue in full force and effect are terms and conditions of employment of unit employees and are mandatory subjects of bargaining. The Respondent engaged in such conduct without prior notice to and without having afforded the Union the opportunity to negotiate and bargain as the exclusive representative of the Respondent's employees. We find that the Respondent has failed and refused to bargain collectively with the representative of its employees and has thereby violated Sections 8(a)(5) and (1) and 8(d) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By failing and refusing to remit contributions to the Service Employees Pension Fund, payments for employee health benefits to the Boston Building Service Employees Trust Fund, and union dues to the Union, as required by the 1984–1987 contract, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1), Section 8(d), and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, we shall order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

We shall, inter alia, order the Respondent to make all contributions to the Service Employees Pension Fund and payments for employee health benefits to the Boston Building Service Employees Trust Fund required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union.[1] We shall also order the Respondent to reimburse its employees for any expenses ensuing from its unlawful failure to make payments to the fringe benefit funds, as set forth in Kraft Plumbing & Heating, 252 NLRB 891 fn. 2 (1980), enfd. 661 F.2d 940 (9th Cir. 1981). All payments to employees shall be made with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp, 231 NLRB 651 (1977). We shall also order the Respondent to pay union dues to the Union,[2] with interest as prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., supra.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, C.S.E. Contract Cleaning, Brookline, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Failing and refusing to make contributions to the Service Employees Pension Fund as required by its 1984–1987 contract with the Union.

(b) Failing and refusing to make payments for employee health benefits to the Boston Building Service Employees Trust Fund as required by its 1984–1987 contract with the Union.

(c) Failing and refusing to pay union dues to the Union as required by its 1984–1987 contract with the Union.

(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

---

[1] Because the provisions of employee benefit fund agreements are variable and complex, the Board does not provide for the addition of a fixed rate of interest on unlawfully withheld fund payments at the adjudicatory stage of a proceeding. We leave to the compliance stage the question whether the Respondent must pay any additional amounts into the benefit funds in order to satisfy our "make-whole" remedy. Depending upon the circumstances of each case, these additional amounts may be determined by reference to provisions in the documents governing the funds at issue and, where there are no governing provisions, by evidence of any losses directly attributable to the unlawful withholding, which might include the loss of return on investment of the portion of funds withheld, additional administrative costs, etc., but not collateral losses. Merryweather Optical Co., 240 NLRB 1213, 1216 fn. 7 (1979).

[2] It is not clear from the complaint whether the Respondent's remission of union dues to the Union, as required by art. XXXIII of the contract, is pursuant to checkoff authorizations signed by the unit employees. We therefore shall require the Respondent to remit such dues to the Union only if the employees have executed the appropriate checkoff authorizations.

[3] The General Counsel has requested a visitatorial clause authorizing the Board, for compliance purposes, to obtain discovery from the Respondent under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure subject to the supervision of the United States court of appeals enforcing this Order. Under the circumstances of this case, we find it unnecessary to include such a clause. Accordingly, we deny the General Counsel's request.

(a) Make contributions to the Service Employees Pension Fund required by its 1984–1987 contract with the Union, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Make payments for employee health benefits to the Boston Building Service Employees Trust Fund required by its 1984–1987 contract with the Union, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(c) Pay union dues to the Union as required by its 1984–1987 contract with the Union, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(d) Make unit employees whole for any loss of benefits suffered as a result of the Respondent's failure to make the fringe benefit fund payments required by its collective-bargaining agreement with the Union, as provided in the remedy section of this decision.

(e) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amounts due under the terms of this Order.

(f) Post at its facility in Brookline, Massachusetts, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 1, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(g) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

C.S.E. CONTRACT CLEANING

National Association of Letter Carriers (United States Postal Service) and Marvin Hill. Case 10–CB–4823(P)

14 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 21 January 1987 Administrative Law Judge J. Pargen Robertson issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[1] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, National Association of Letter Carriers, Dunwoody, Georgia, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] Member Johansen notes that the same result is reached if we construe the authorization to continue but that, as the amount of dues owed is zero, zero is the amount to be deducted and remitted.

Mary L. Bulls, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Richard N. Gilberg and Devon Lee Miller, Esqs., for the Respondent.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

J. PARGEN ROBERTSON, Administrative Law Judge. This case was heard in Atlanta, Georgia, on 2 October 1986. The complaint, which was filed on 29 August 1986, was based on a charge filed 5 August 1986. It is admitted that the Employer in this case, United States Postal Service, provides postal services for the United States of America and operates various facilities throughout the United States, including the facility in Dunwoody, Georgia, involved in this proceeding. Additionally, Respondent, National Association of Letter Carriers, is admitted to be a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act. I find that the Board has jurisdiction over Respondent by virtue of the provisions of the Postal Reorganization Act, 39 U.S.C. § 1209(a).

FINDINGS OF FACT

This case involves the unsuccessful efforts of union member Marvin Hill to resign from the Union and to revoke his checkoff authorization. Respondent and the Postal Service are parties to an existing collective-bargaining agreement which expires on 20 July 1987. Marvin Hill is employed in the unit encompassed by that collective-bargaining agreement. The collective-bargaining agreement does not require employees to become members of the Union or to pay dues to the Union.

Marvin Hill is employed by the United States Postal Service as a letter carrier. During his employment Hill has been a member of the Union. Hill signed a dues-checkoff authorization (form 1187) on 23 November 1984.

In early June 1986, Hill phoned Union Branch Vice President Charles Windham that he wanted "to withdraw from the Union." Windham testified that he was phoned by Hill and that, among other things, Hill told Windham that "he wanted to get out of the Union." According to Hill, Windham told him that he could not withdraw until his "anniversary date."

Hill wrote Windham on 13 June 1986:

> This letter is to inform you that I am withdrawing my membership to the Union immediately and would like for dues not to be taken out of my check. I will complete whatever forms are necessary to oomplete the transaction. I formally request a response concerning this matter within 10 (ten) days to the address provided below.

On 20 June 1986 Windham responded:

> We have received your request to withdraw your membership from the NALC. As we discussed in our phone conversation, ours is an open shop and you are not forced to belong to our labor organization.
>
> Our records indicate that your application was processed in December, 1984. As I told you at the time of our conversation, Form 1188 must be executed to withdraw your membership. This is a personnel controlled form used by the Postal Service. The union cannot process this form for you nor can we change the requirements under Section B of Form 1187. I have attached a copy of form 1187 for your inspection. Section B is self-explanatory and the reason why you will not be able to withdraw your membership until your anniversary date. I trust that this response is satisfactory.
> In closing, if you have some problems that we are not aware of, President Taylor and myself remain willing to discuss them with you. You could contact us by phone or set up an appointment to come in. I feel that you lose far more than you could ever gain by dropping your membership.

Hill again wrote Windham. The second letter, which was received by Windham on 2 July 1986, stated:

> This letter is to request a copy of the form I signed making me a union Member. Also it is to inform you that your Answer to my request to withdraw from the Union was unacceptable. There are legal questions concerning voluntary deductions from an Individuals paycheck. We will find an answer to legal question at a later date. The necessary Complaints and Motions are being filed with legal couns [sic] State & Federal labor boards, (Including a letter of complaint to the National headquarters about the problem and especially about your attitude in your conversation with me), and consumer complaint agencies. (Since I am paying for a service). I hope we can avoid litigation in this matter for the good of everyone involved. I wish you would be so kind to respond to the letter within seven (7) days.

Hill also contacted the United States Postal Service. By letter delivered 11 July 1986, Hill told the Postal Service that he was resigning from the Union effective immediately. Hill also submitted a signed form 1188, which is the form used by the Postal Service employees to cancel payroll deductions. Hill's form 1188, which was dated 30 June 1986, shows that he canceled his authorization for the deduction of dues of the National Association of Letter Carriers.

Neither the Union nor the Postal Service accepted Hill's resignation or his cancellation of dues-deduction authorization. Dues continued to be deducted from Hill's pay and accepted by the Union.

During the hearing and again in its brief, Respondent argued that Hill's only efforts to resign and withdraw dues-deduction authorization were directed to the branch and to the United States Postal Service and that the branch was not acting as agent for the Union in that regard. Hill did indeed admit that he did not contact the Union.

However, in response to my questions during the hearing, Respondent's attorney admitted that a member's resignation request may be presented locally.

The evidence illustrated that Hill's contacts were all with the branch as opposed to the Union. Local Vice President Windham testified the branch presents an "orientation package" to new employees, which includes a copy of form 1187. Form 1187 is the dues-deduction authorization form. Additionally, the branch's shop steward provides form 1187 to employees and, on request, form 1187 will be mailed to an employee by the branch union office.

CONCLUSIONS

In Pattern Makers v. NLRB, 473 U.S. 95 (1985), the Supreme Court approved the National Labor Relations Board policy regarding unrestricted rights of union members to resign. The Court stated:

> The Board has found union restrictions on the right to resign to be inconsistent with the policy of voluntary unionism implicit in § 8(a)(3). [See Machinists Local 1414 (Neufeld Porshe-Audi), 270 NLRB 1330 (1984); Machinists Local 1327 (Dalmo Victor), 263 NLRB 992 (Chairman Van de Water and Member Hunter, concurring), enf. denied 725 F.2d 1212 (1984).] We believe that the inconsistency between union restrictions on the right to resign and the policy of voluntary unionism supports the Board's conclusion that League Law 13 is invalid. [Footnote omitted.]
> . . . .
> By allowing employees to resign from a union at any time, § 8(a)(3) protects the employees whose views come to diverge from those of his union.

The authorization for dues deduction signed by Hill on 23 November 1984 links payment of dues to union membership by specifying that the deduction is limited to "regular and periodic membership dues." In Postal Service, 279 NLRB 40 (1986), the Board found a violation where the employer refused to honor dues-checkoff revocation by an employee that had effectively resigned from union membership.

In Postal Service, 280 NLRB 1439 (1986), the Board held that resignations from the union are effective without regard to the union's efforts to place limitations on the time of resignation. In that case the Board also stated that the Postal Service dues-checkoff authorization provides "for the payment of dues as a quid pro quo for union membership and was therefore revocable when union membership ceased to exist by virtue of an effective resignation from membership."

Those cases control the instant controversy. Respondent argues, however, that the branch of the Union was not acting on behalf of the National and, for that reason, Hill's letters to the branch could not serve as resignation from the the National. The National is the only party charged by the complaint. However, Respondent's counsel admitted that it was a practice of the branch to accept resignations. Obviously, Respondent cannot hold Hill to a more onerous requirement that it customarily follows in resignations. Therefore, Respondent's point is without merit.

By its letter to Hill dated 20 June 1986 the branch specifically refused to accept Hill's resignation until his "anniversary date" and until Hill executed form 1188 with the Postal Service. By attempting to limit Hill's resignation, Respondent thereby violated Section 8(b)(1)(A). Additionally, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) by continuing to accept membership dues from the Postal Service on behalf of Marvin Hill.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. United States Postal Service is subject to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board by virtue of 39 U.S.C. § 1209.

2. Respondent is a labor organization as defined in Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By refusing to honor his resignation from the Union and the revocation of dues-checkoff assignments by employee Marvin Hill where those dues-checkoff assignments were in consideration of union membership, Respondent violated Section 8(b)(1)(A) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in and is engaging in unfair labor practices, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action necessary to effectuate the purposes of the Act. I recommend that Respondent be ordered to make employee Marvin Hill whole for any monetary loss he may have suffered by reason of Respondent's unlawful refusal to honor his resignation and revocation of dues-checkoff assignment. Those amounts are to be computed in the manner consistent with the Board policies stated in Ogle Protection Service, 183 NLRB 682 (1970), with interest in accordance with the formula prescribed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

Additionally, Respondent is directed to cease maintaining or enforcing all provisions of governing documents which unlawfully restrict the rights of members to resign from the Union. To the extent Respondent may legally remove those written restrictions unilaterally, it is directed to do so and, if those provisions require actions by the Employer, Respondent is directed to advise the Employer of the effect of this decision and of its desire to remove all unlawful restrictions to a member's right to resign from all governing documents including the form used by the Employer to authorize checkoff of union dues. Auto Workers Local 73 (McDonnell Douglas), 282 NLRB 466 (1986).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[1]

ORDER

The Respondent, National Association of Letter Carriers, Dunwood, Georgia, its officers, agents, and representatives, shall

1. Cease and desist from restraining and coercing employees by refusing to permit them to resign their union membership, by refusing to honor revocation of dues-checkoff assignments by employees having effectively resigned from union membership, by maintaining or enforcing provisions in governing documents which unlawfully restrict members' rights to resign from the Union, or by in any like or related manner restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Reimburse and refund to Marvin Hill the dues unlawfully collected from him, with interest, from the time of his resignation from union membership and revocation of dues-checkoff assignments, as set forth in the remedy section of this decision.

(b) Delete provisions in its governing documents, and advise the Employer of its desire to delete provisions in governing documents maintained by the Employer, which unlawfully restrict members' rights to resign from the Union.

(c) Post at its facility in Dunwoody, Georgia, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[2] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 10, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to members are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[1] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

[2] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

NOTICE TO MEMBERS
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to honor valid resignations by employees from union membership.

WE WILL NOT refuse to honor revocation of dues-checkoff assignments by employees having effectively resigned from union membership when the employees' dues-checkoff assignments are in consideration of union membership.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner restrain or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL delete all provisions in our governing documents, and request the United States Postal Service to delete provisions in documents which it maintains or enforces, which unlawfully restrict members' rights to resign from the Union.

WE WILL reimburse or refund to Marvin Hill dues unlawfully collected from him, with interest, for the time following his valid resignation from union membership and revocation of dues-checkoff assignments.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS

Donald Browne d/b/a Bailey Distributors and Timothy Nevins. Case 2–CA–18022

14 April 1987

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 21 January 1986 the Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding[1] dismissing the complaint.[2] The Board determined that dismissal was appropriate because a prior arbitration between the Respondent and the Union, which "met the Spielberg and Raytheon standards for deferral,"[3] has resolved the issues raised by the complaint. On 23 June 1986 the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit remanded the case to the Board for further proceedings.[4]

The court determined that the Board's deferral to the arbitrator's decision had been appropriate regarding the allegation that the Respondent discriminated against Nevins by not affording him the same terms and conditions of employment as union members also employed as "helpers."[5] The arbitrator determined that from November 1977 to January 1981 Nevins had never worked as a helper, only as a relief driver and driver. The arbitrator determined that when Nevins worked as a relief driver and driver he had been afforded the same terms and conditions of employment as union members. In affirming the Board's decision to defer on this allegation, the court said:

> As to Nevins's first statutory claim, discriminatory treatment in his employment as a helper, we have little difficulty in concluding, as did the NLRB, that the arbitrator's determination of Nevins's employment status disposed of the issue.[6]

Accordingly, this allegation is not before the Board.

The allegation that is now before the Board pursuant to the court's remand is Nevin's second statutory claim—that on 5 January 1981 the Respondent conditioned its offer of employment (as a helper) on Nevins' accepting subscale wages, i.e., wages below those specified in the collective-bargaining agreement for an employee performing the job of helper. The court determined that deferral on this allegation was not appropriate as the Olin standard had not been satisfied. The court held that the issues before the arbitrator were not factually parallel to those of the second statutory claim.

The Board accepted the remand and the General Counsel filed a brief on 22 October 1986.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Having accepted the remand, the Board must observe the court's opinion as the law of the case and, necessarily, its judgment that the Board improperly deferred to arbitration on Nevins' second statutory claim.

The Board has considered the entire record, the court's decision, and the General Counsel's brief and has decided to adopt the judge's rulings, findings,[7] and conclusions but only as to Nevins' second statutory claim.

The Respondent is engaged in the nonretail sale and distribution of beverages from its warehouse located in the Bronx, New York. The Board's prior decision contains an extensive discussion of the facts and positions of the parties regarding the nature of the employment relationship and the actual jobs that Nevins performed during the period from November 1977 to 5 January 1981.

The record shows that on 2 January 1981, a Friday, Nevins worked for the Respondent as a relief driver. On 5 January 1981 Nevins was

[2] The pertinent part of the complaint alleged that the Respondent discriminated against Timothy Nevins, a nonunion member of the bargaining unit, with regard to his "hire or tenure or terms or [sic] conditions of employment." The complaint alleged that the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by paying Nevins "lower wages and rates of pay and lesser benefits than members of the Union" who also held the position of "helper." The complaint further alleged that on 5 January 1981 the Respondent violated Sec. 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act by conditioning "its employment of Nevins [as a helper] upon Nevin's [sic] relinquishment of his rights to those wages, hours and other terms and conditions of employment set forth in the then current collective-bargaining agreement."

On 3 January 1983 Administrative Law Judge Robert T. Snyder issued a decision in which he determined that the Respondent had discriminated against Nevins. Judge Snyder found both 8(a)(3) and (1) violations. Subsequent to the judge's decision, Olin Corp., 268 NLRB 573 (1984), was issued and the Board remanded the present case to the judge for further consideration. Judge Snyder issued a supplemental decision on 25 June 1984 in which he found that deferral was not appropriate; he reaffirmed his previous decision.

[3] Citing Spielberg Mfg. Co., 112 NLRB 1080 (1955), and Raytheon Co., 140 NLRB 883 (1963), set aside on other grounds 326 F.2d 471 (1st Cir. 1964).

[5] Since 1974 the Respondent and the Soft Drink Workers Union Local 812 I.B.T. have been signatories to successive collective-bargaining agreements. One such agreement was in effect from 1 June 1978 to 31 May 1981. The collective-bargaining agreement covered three classifications of employees: route salesmen, route drivers, and utility drivers and helpers.

[7] The Respondent has previously excepted to some of the credibility findings in the judge's decision and supplemental decision. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

present in the Respondent's warehouse at the start of the business day. The Respondent's owner, Browne, was preparing to drive one of the delivery trucks on its scheduled daily route. Browne turned to Nevins and offered to employ him as a helper for that day if Nevins would accept $40–$50 for the day's work and would provide his own transportation. The $40–$50 offer was below that called for by the collective-bargaining agreement. Nevins refused to work for less than he was entitled to as a bargaining unit member. Nevins declined the job of helper and left the Respondent's warehouse. After this incident, Nevins never again worked for the Respondent.

The judge found that the Respondent's conditioning of its job offer on Nevins' accepting subscale wages deprived Nevins of his Section 7 rights. The judge found that the Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act. We affirm the judge's finding of the violation. Accordingly, as alleged in the complaint, the Respondent unlawfully refused to hire Nevins for discriminatory reasons.[8]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Donald Browne d/b/a Bailey Distributors, Bronx, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discriminatorily refusing to hire individuals for bargaining unit positions unless the individuals accept subscale wages.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer to employ Timothy Nevins in the position for which he is qualified and in which he would have been employed but for the discrimination against him or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or other rights and privileges, and make him whole for any loss of earnings or other benefits suffered as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the administrative law judge's decision.

(b) Remove from all personnel records and files, and any other records, any reference to Timothy Nevins' refusal to be employed by the Respondent under the discriminatory terms the Respondent offered him on 5 January 1981, and notify Nevins that it has done so and that its unlawful conduct on that date will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

(c) Preserve and, on request make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due.

(d) Post at its facility located in the Bronx, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[8] The judge and the court referred to this 8(a)(3) and (1) violation as a constructive discharge. We do not do so because the arbitrator (in that portion of his decision to which the Board properly deferred) decided that prior to January 1981 the Respondent had not employed Nevins as a helper. Therefore, on 5 January 1981 Nevins could not have been constructively discharged from the position of helper as he had never held the position of helper.

[9] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DONALD BROWNE D/B/A BAILEY DISTRIBUTORS

System Electric Co., Inc. and International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 440. Case 21-CA-21572

16 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS BABSON AND STEPHENS

On 12 September 1983 Administrative Law Judge Russell L. Stevens issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Decision and Order.

1. In the final paragraph of the discussion section of his decision, the judge concluded that the Respondent was not in the building and construction industry as that phrase is used in the Act. We reverse. Paragraph 2(a) of the amended complaint alleges, and the answer admits, "At all times material herein, Respondent, a California corporation, has been engaged in the business of electrical contracting in the construction industry . . . ." In addition, the complaint as amended at the hearing alleges, and the Respondent admits, that the appropriate unit comprises the Respondent's employees "engaged in electrical or electronic construction job work." Nothing in the record contradicts these admitted allegations. Accordingly, we find that the Respondent is "an employer engaged primarily in the building and construction industry" within the meaning of Section 8(f) of the Act.

2. In John Deklewa & Sons, Inc., 282 NLRB 1375 (1987), the Board overruled R.J. Smith Construction Co., 191 NLRB 693 (1971), enf. denied sub nom. Operating Engineers Local 150 v. NLRB, 480 F.2d 1186 (D.C. Cir. 1973), abandoned the conversion doctrine, and modified unit scope rules in 8(f) cases. As more fully set forth in Deklewa, supra at slip op. 8, the Board decided to apply the following principles in 8(f) cases.

> (1) a collective-bargaining agreement permitted by Section 8(f) shall be enforceable through the mechanisms of Section 8(a)(5) and Section 8(b)(3); (2) such agreements will not bar the processing of valid petitions filed pursuant to Section 9(c) and Section 9(e); (3) in processing such petitions, the appropriate unit normally will be the single employer's employees covered by the agreement; and (4) upon the expiration of such agreements, the signatory union will enjoy no presumption of majority status, and either party may repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship.

Applying Deklewa to the instant case, we conclude that the complaint should be dismissed. In 1975 the Respondent signed a letter of assent-A with the National Electrical Contractors Association, Southern Sierra Chapter, pursuant to which it became bound to the then-current collective-bargaining agreement. By letters dated 17 December 1981 the Respondent timely and properly terminated the then-current bargaining agreement effective as of its 31 May 1982 expiration date and revoked NECA's authority to bargain on its behalf. No further agreement was reached by the Respondent with the Union. Although the Respondent admits it was bound to successive NECA agreements from 1975 through 31 May 1982, it contends and we find that any bargaining agreement between the Respondent and the Union expired as of 31 May 1982. Thus, under the fourth Deklewa principle quoted above, the Union enjoyed no presumption of majority status, and the Respondent was free to repudiate the 8(f) bargaining relationship. The judge concluded that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by dealing directly with its employees and by failing to pay contractual wages and benefits and Section 8(a)(1) by telling job applicants that it would be a nonunion employer. As the judge's conclusions turn, however, on whether the Respondent owed bargaining or contractual obligations to the Union after 31 May 1982, which under Deklewa it did not, we shall reverse the judge and dismiss the complaint.

ORDER

The complaint is dismissed.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RUSSELL L. STEVENS, Administrative Law Judge. This case was tried in Indio, California, on June 16, 1983.[1] The complaint[2] is based on a charge filed September 10

[2] As amended March 2, 1983, and as again amended at trial with leave of the administrative law judge.

by International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 440 (the Union). The complaint alleges that System Electric Co., Inc. (Respondent) violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act).

All parties were given full opportunity to participate, to introduce relevant evidence, to examine and cross-examine witnesses, to argue orally, and to file briefs. Briefs, which have been carefully considered, were filed on behalf of the General Counsel and Respondent.

On the entire record, and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

At all times material Respondent, a California corporation, has been engaged in the business of electrical contracting in the construction industry, and operates a facility in Cathedral City, California. During the 12-month period following June 4, 1982, at which time Respondent activated its operations, Respondent, in the course and conduct of its operations, purchased and received goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 from suppliers located within the State of California, each of which purchased and received the same goods and products directly from suppliers located outside the State of California.

I find that Respondent is, and at all times material has been, an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

II. THE LABOR ORGANIZATION INVOLVED

International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union No. 440 is, and at all times material has been, a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

III. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Background[4]

Industrial Electric Supply is a California business wholly owned by John Gomes, who also has served as chief negotiator for National Electrical Contractors Association, Southern Sierra Chapter (NECA). Approximately in 1975 John Gomes organized Respondent and became its president. His son, James (Jim) Gomes, was Respondent's vice president until March 1982. On March 10, 1975, John Gomes signed the Union's form Letter of Assent-A, pursuant to which Respondent became bound by a collective-bargaining Inside Wireman's Agreement between NECA and the Union, effective June 1, 1973, until May 31, 1975, and thereafter until terminated in accordance with the Letter of Assent-A. The agreement had, inter alia, an exclusive hiring hall provision that has remained the same in successive bargaining agreements between the parties, including the one involved herein, which was effective from June 1, 1981, through May 31, 1982. The bargaining agreements also had continuous provisions for health and welfare trust fund contributions by Respondent, with the requirement that Respondent submit monthly trust fund reports, whether or not any unit employees were on the payroll.

Respondent was an inactive corporation until early in 1982. In December 1981 Michael Gomes, who was another son of John Gomes and who had been a field supervisor of Industrial Electrical Supply for several years, decided with his family to activate Respondent. Soon after the first of the year Michael began organizing Respondent's affairs and preparing to go into operation, and he became president of Respondent in March.

By letter dated December 17, 1981, Jim Gomes notified the Union of Respondent's termination of its collective-bargaining agreement effective May 31, 1982, when the then-current agreement expired, and also notified the Union that Respondent had revoked NECA's authority to bargain for it. Finally, Respondent offered to meet and bargain with the Union for a new contract on its own behalf. By letter dated December 17, Jim Gomes also notified the Association that Respondent had revoked its authority to bargain with the Union on behalf of Respondent.

By letter dated March 2, Gilbert Dovey, the Union's business manager, advised Respondent (Jim Gomes) of the Union's intention to terminate the agreement expiring May 31 and offered to meet and bargain for a new contract.

On March 12, R. Reincke, a labor consultant for Mike Sullivan and Associates, Inc. (Sullivan), replied to Dovey's letter, stated that Sullivan was Respondent's exclusive collective-bargaining agent, reaffirmed Respondent's withdrawal from NECA, and offered to meet and bargain with the Union, on behalf of Respondent, at a mutually agreeable date. The letter shows a carbon copy to Respondent.

On March 17 Sullivan again wrote to the Union (Dovey), and also to Local 569, reiterated that Sullivan was Respondent's exclusive bargaining representative, and made a second request to meet and negotiate. The lettter shows a carbor copy to Respondent.

On May 26 Leland Brand, the Union's business agent who replaced Dovey, wrote a letter to Respondent (Jim Gomes), stated that the Union had received Sullivan's letter of March 12, questioned Sullivan's representative status, asked confirmation of that status, and offered to meet and bargain on June 1, 3, or 4.

On May 27 Sullivan replied to the Union's letter of May 26 to Respondent, reiterated its status as Respondent's exclusive collective-bargaining representative, questioned the Union's fides in continuing to refuse to recognize Sullivan's status, advised the Union that Michael, rather than James, was Respondent's principal officer, and asked for a reply to Sullivan's letter of March 17. The letter shows a carbon copy to Respondent.

On June 11 Reincke wrote a letter to the Union (Brand), enclosed a letter from Michael advising that Sullivan was Respondent's exclusive bargaining representative, and offered to meet and bargain with the Union immediately on reply from the Union. The letter shows a carbon copy to Respondent.

[4] This background summary is based on stipulations of counsel, and on credited testimony and evidence that is not in dispute.

On June 14 Jim Gomes replied to the Union's letter of May 26, and reiterated that he no longer worked for, or represented, Respondent.

Between March 10, 1975, and June 4, 1982, Respondent submitted monthly trust fund reports to the Union, as required by the various collective-bargaining agreements. As of approximately June 4 those reports were discontinued, and since that date Respondent has not made any trust fund payments or reports, and has paid wages to employees that are lower than the Union's contract wages.

Andrew Amento was initiated into the Union on November 30, 1979, approximately at the time he was employed by Industrial Electric Supply. When he became a union member he was assigned the rating of wireman p.e. (pending examination). He kept that same classification all the time he was a union member. In April or May Michael called Amento, whom he had known for some time, on the telephone and asked if he would be interested in working for a new company Michael was starting. Amento had been working for a nonunion company,[4] and asked Michael about the new company's relationship with the Union. Amento said he assumed the new company would be nonunion, and Michael stated that it would not be affiliated with the Union. They agreed to meet later, and approximately 2 weeks after the telephone call Amento went to Respondent's shop to talk with Michael. They walked around in the shop, and Michael reiterated that the shop would not be signatory to a union contract—that it would be "a merit or open shop." Amento expressed his dislike of the Union, and made it clear to Michael that he did not want to work under a union contract. Amento said he had not signed the Union's out-of-work book, and had not paid his dues for some time. Michael and Amento talked about the latter's pay, which was to be a little more than $18 per hour. Michael said some fringe benefits later may be arranged, but there would be no pension arrangement. Amento went to work for Respondent a few days later at $19 per hour, which was less than the Union's contract rate, and has worked for Respondent continuously to date. Amento has had an unsatisfactory relationship with the Union, although he paid his membership dues through January 1982,[5] when he was laid off by the contractor he then was working for. He did not go to the union hall or attempt to work through the Union thereafter. On one occasion in 1978 Amento argued with Brand about hiring hall procedures and on another occasion he was given a verbal reprimand because he worked on a job with nonunion employees. Brand credibly testified that members are suspended after failure to pay dues 3 months, and are dropped from membership after failure to pay dues 6 months. On May 12, 1982, Brand advised Amento by letter of his 3-month dues delinquency, and requested payment of $182.28 for dues and reinstatement from suspension. By letter dated July 14, 1982, Brand notified Amento that he would be tried by the Union on July 28, 1982, on the charge of working for Respondent without going through the union hiring hall. By letter dated August 5, 1982, Brand advised Amento that, in Amento's absence at trial, he had been fined $3000, with $2000 suspended. Amento never paid the fine. By letter dated August 17, 1982, Brand notified Amento that he had been dropped from the union membership. During his employment by Respondent, Amento kept Micheal Gomes well-advised concerning his problems with the Union, gave Michael the letters he received from the Union, and frequently expressed to Michael his dislike of the Union.

Robert Hudson formerly worked for Industrial Electric Supply. Sometime prior to June 1982 Hudson called Michael on the telephone and asked about the possibility of working for Respondent. An interview was arranged and held, and during either the telephone call or the interview Hudson asked if Respondent would be operating as a union shop and Michael said it would not. Hudson was working for a nonunion contractor at the time he talked with Michael. No job opening was available at the time, but Hudson was hired soon thereafter, as a wireman at $14 per hour. He still is employed by Respondent. Hudson became a union member February 25, 1980, and was a union member at the time he was hired by Respondent. Hudson also had a strained relationship with the Union, although he paid his union dues through February 1982. The dues paid for December, January, and February of 1981–1982 were in amounts that show a nonwork status, rather than a work status. Hudson talked with Michael Gomes about the Union on several occasions, and expressed his dislike for the Union. By letter dated September 8, 1982, Brand informed Hudson that he had been dropped from union membership because of failure to pay his union dues.

Michael Jones became a union member October 28, 1977, and worked for Respondent 15 hours during June 1982, at an hourly wage of $14.

Counsel stipulated that Respondent had no employees between its inception and June 4, 1982, who were covered by the Union-NECA agreement. During the balance of June 1982 Respondent had two full-time employees, Amento and Hudson, and Jones worked a short time. Amento and Hudson continued thereafter as full-time employees, occasionally assisted by helpers.

Sometime in June Brand learned that Respondent had employed two persons, but that such fact had not been reported to the Union. Brand notified the Union's trust office of the apparent problem, and sent a union agent, Tom Brady, to Respondent's shop to investigate. Brady later reported to Brand that the two employees, Amento and Hudson, told him the Union was not giving them work and that they had to work some place, so they went to work for Respondent. Brady credibly testified without contradiction that his visit to Respondent's jobsite to talk with the employees was on July 6.

On July 16 the Union filed an NLRB charge against Respondent, alleging that Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act. On July 22 Respondent filed an 8(b)(1)(B) charge against the Union. Both charges were withdrawn August 26. In July, Amento called Brand on the telephone to complain about his name being on the Union's NLRB charge.

By letter dated August 26, 1982, Brand advised Sullivan that he was willing to meet with him concerning Respondent on September 1 or 2. Reincke called Brand on the telephone, and September 1 was agreed on as the date to meet.

On August 31 Respondent filed an RM petition with the Board, which later was dismissed on January 5 by the Regional Director of Region 21, on the basis of the Union's disclaimer on January 3 of interest in representing Respondent's employees.

The parties met as scheduled at the Union's office on September 1. Sullivan and Reincke attended for Respondent, and the Union was represented by Brand and Marvin Cook, the Union's International representative. The meeting lasted approximately 1 hour, and neither side presented contract proposals. A principal topic of discussion was the status of Amento and Hudson and the Union's representation of them. Sullivan asked for the Union's proof of representation because he doubted it, and the Union contended that it did, in fact, represent the two employees. The Union pointed out that Amento and Hudson were members of the Union at that time. A few other matters briefly were discussed, including a "favored nations" provision in some contracts, possible negotiation of an 8(f) contract, Brand's possibly meeting later with Amento and Hudson, ratification of the contract by Respondent's employees, and guidelines for future negotiations.

The parties have not met or negotiated since September 1.

B. Discussion

Several salient facts are not in dispute, or clearly are established by the report. (1) Respondent timely and properly notified NECA and the Union of Respondent's intention to withdraw NECA's bargaining authority for Respondent, and of Respondent's proposed termination of its contract with the Union effective May 31. (2) Amento and Hudson were hired in June, after the collective-bargaining agreement's termination date, without going through Respondent's hiring hall and at a wage rate lower than that provided by the terminated agreement. (3) Since approximately June 4, Respondent has submitted no reports to the Union's trust fund, and has not made any payments to union trust funds required by the terminated agreement. (4) Amento and Hudson were union members as of the date of their hire by Respondent. They were delinquent in payment of union dues as of that time, but they had not been dropped from union membership. (5) Amento and Hudson kept Michael abreast of their running feud with the Union, and freely discussed their dislike of the Union with Michael and fellow employees. (6) Prior to the date Amento was hired, Michael already had decided, in late April, that he was not going to be signatory to a contract with the Union. That fact was testified to by Michael.

On December 17, 1981, Respondent notified the Union of its willingness to bargain, on request, for a new contract. The Union took no affirmative action relative to Respondent's offer, but on March 2 told Respondent it was "ready to meet" at any mutually agreed time. On March 12, Reincke answered the Union's letter of March 2, but the Union refused to recognize Sullivan as Respondent's representative. Not until May 26 did Brand ask Respondent for confirmation of Sullivan's status, and that request was in Brand's letter to James Gomes. Brand offered conflicting statements at trial for his refusal to deal with Sullivan, none of which had the ring of truth. It would have been a simple matter for Brand to have questioned Sullivan's status, by telephone call or letter, either to Sullivan or Respondent or both, much earlier than May 26.[6] In any event, it is clear that the Union did not, or would not, until late May or early June, deal with Sullivan. However, that fact does not reach any of the basic issues.

The General Counsel avers that, by signing the Letter of Assent-A, Respondent became a member of a multiemployer bargaining group, but that matter is not in issue. Respondent acknowledges that fact, and Respondent timely withdrew from the multiemployer group. The withdrawal from the Letter of Assent-A was made December 17, 1981, with the existing contract to be terminated on its expiration date, May 31, 1982.

A basic question is whether the presumption of the Union's majority arising from Respondent's signing the Letter of Assent-A, i.e., its participation in the multiemployer bargaining group, survives Respondent's timely withdrawal on December 17, 1981, from the multiemployer group prior to expiration of the union-NECA contract on May 31, 1982.[7] Existence of the original presumption is not in dispute. So far as the post-10(b) period is concerned, it is fundamental that a contract, lawful on its face, raises a presumption that the union party to the contract was the majority representative of the employees at the time the contract was executed, as well as during the life of the contract, and thereafter.[8] The General Counsel argues that the presumption is irrebuttable, and cites Cauthorne Trucking[9] as authority for that proposition. Cauthorne Trucking did not involve a multiemployer unit, however—only a single employer was involved, and the principle relied on by the General Counsel was set forth in footnote 3:

> Rish Equipment Co., 173 NLRB 943 (1968), enfd. 407 F.2d 1098 (4th Cir. 1969). A collective-bargaining agreement, lawful on its face, raises an irrebuttable presumption that the union's majority status continued through the end of the contract. This presumption continues beyond the expiration of the contract, but becomes rebuttable. Of course, the burden of rebutting this presumption is upon the party that would do so. Eastern Washington Distributing Co., Inc., 216 NLRB 1149 (1975).

[6] In his letter of March 17 addressed to the Union, Reincke referred to a letter of February 8, which, he said, advised the Union of Sullivan's representative status with Respondent, but that letter of February 8 is not in evidence.

[7] Respondent does not, and legally could not, now challenge the Union's multiemployer majority as of the time the Letter of Assent-A first was signed on March 10, 1975, in view of Sec. 10(b) of the Act. Bryan Mfg. Co., 362 U.S. 411 (1960).

Rish Equipment Co., relied on in Cauthorne Trucking, is not proper authority for the footnote reference, however, because Rish arose from an RC case and involved refusal by an employer to bargain with a Board-certified union. In Rish, the administrative law judge stated, page 944: "[T]he continued majority status of the certified union is presumed, but an employer may rebut the presumption by an affirmative showing that the union no longer commands a majority." It is clear from Nevada Lodge, supra, which followed Tahoe Nugget,[10] that the presumption relied on by the General Counsel is rebuttable. In both Tahoe Nugget and Nevada Lodge, the evidence relating to the Union's majority that allegedly continued after timely withdrawal from a multiemployer bargaining group and until the contract expired was carefully examined and found to be an actual majority. In this case, it is quite clear that, at no time prior to expiration of the multiemployer agreement on May 31, 1982, did Respondent have any employees. As noted supra, counsel stipulated that Respondent had no employees between Respondent's birth and June 4, 1982, who were covered by the union-NECA contract. Therefore, the Union did not enjoy majority status in any employee complement of Respondent prior to June 4, 1982. However, that fact is not the end of the controversy.

Assuming the Union's lack of majority status at Respondent's plant at all times prior to May 31, 1982, the union-NECA contract was effective until that date, and Amento and Hudson were union members until, and beyond, that date, albeit both of them were not conducting themselves as loyal union members and were engaged in running controversies with the Union. Even if, arguendo, Respondent was not required to negotiate with the Union as the representative of its employees for a new contract to succeed the one that would expire May 31, 1982, such a fact would not release Respondent from the union-NECA contract, and its requirements, prior to that date. So much apparently was recognized by Jim Gomes, who advised the Union on December 17, 1981, that the existing union-NECA contract would be terminated so far as Respondent was concerned, effective May 31, 1982. Further, Respondent continued until June 4, 1982, to submit monthly employee reports to the Union's trust fund, as required by the union-NECA contract. It is found that Respondent was bound to the union-NECA contract, and all its provisions, until May 31, 1982, regardless of any questions relating to Respondent's obligation to bargain with the Union thereafter, as the representative of Respondent's employees. By directly negotiating with Amento and Hudson concerning their work conditions, within the term of the union-NECA contract and without notice to, or bargaining with, the Union, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, as alleged in the complaint.[11]

As noted in the background summary above, Michael Gomes made it clear to Amento and Hudson when he talked with them in May prior to their employment that he would be operating Respondent as a nonunion plant. As previously noted, Amento and Hudson were union members at that time, regardless of their poor relationship with the Union. They did not resign from their membership, as they could have, but rather, sometime after their employment by Respondent, they let their membership be terminated by the Union through failure to pay union dues. Also at the time of the statements to Amento and Hudson in May, Respondent still was a party to, and bound by, the union-NECA contract. Finally, about the same time as the statements by Michael, the latter freely discussed with Amento and Hudson their various problems with the Union. Admittedly, Michael did not want a union shop, so informed Amento and Hudson, and actively participated in widening the rift between the Union and its two members. Under such circumstances, Michael's statements to Amento and Hudson about his intention to have a nonunion shop were coercive and in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged in the complaint.[12]

A basic issue is whether Respondent had a good-faith boubt, based on reasonable and objective considerations, that the Union represented a majority of Respondent's employees after May 31, 1982. As discussed above, it is apparent that Amento and Hudson disliked the Union, stopped paying their union dues, and conveyed those facts to Michael Gomes. However, that does not determine any conclusion. In the first place, prior to May 31 Respondent already had committed two violations of the Act, found above. Michael made it plain to Amento and Hudson that he planned to operate without a union contract, and he negotiated direcly with those two potential employees, without regard to his contractual obligations to the Union. Those facts alone take Respondent outside the usual parameters of the good faith required in raising a doubt about the Union's majority.[13] But more is involved. Regardless of the fact that Amento and Hudson on several occasions made it clear to Michael that they disliked the Union, they did not resign their memberships. Rather, they just let them die a natural death, sometime after their employment by Respondent. Brady visited Amento and Hudson July 6, and sometime thereafter, according to Brand's testimony, credited on this matter, Brand decided that Amento and Hudson did not want to be represented by the Union. Later, on January 3, 1983, the Union formally filed a disclaimer of interest in representing the two employees. In view of Respondent's earlier violations of the Act, and in view of Michael's determination to go nonunion and his frequent talks with Amento and Hudson about their sentiments, there is no possibility of determining whether the two [12] Continental Inn, 186 NLRB 248 (1970), enf. in relevant part 453 F.2d 269 (6th Cir. 1971). Amento and Hudson were applicants for employment at the time the statements were made by Michael. They were, therefore, covered by the Act at that time. See, e.g., Daily Transit Mix Corp., 238 NLRB 879 (1978).

employees would have wanted union representatives in the absence of those facts. Respondent meddled in the relationship between the Union and the two employees, and cannot now claim any benefits that may flow from the meddling. When the two employees were hired they were union members, and that fact prima facie gave the union majority status. That showing is buttressed by the presumption flowing from the union-NECA contract that was terminated effective May 31. The Act requires that, on expiration of a contract, an employer must retain the same wages and working conditions that prevailed under the contract, and if changes detrimental to employees are made without giving the employees' representative prior notice and an opportunity to bargain about the changes, such action would constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.[14] The Union was the representative of Respondent's employees at the time Respondent ceased paying hourly wage rates and fringe benefits prevailing under the terminated contract, and thereafter continued such reduced wages and benefits. Such changes constitute a violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act as alleged in the complaint.[15]

Respondent argues that it was in the building and construction industry and offered to bargain with the Union for an 8(f) contract. That argument is without merit because it was not shown that Respondent was in the building and construction industry as that phrase is used in the Act. Such a showing was Respondent's burden, and the burden was not met. Respondent also argues that the changes in wages and working conditions were permissible because the parties had reached a bargaining impasse, but that argument also is without merit. Respondent had submitted no proposals to the Union, on which an impasse could be reached. Respondent's effort to establish that the union was intractable in its insistence that all area employers sign the Union-NECA contract was not persuasive.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.
2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.
3. The following employees constitute a unit appropriate for the purposes of collective-bargaining within the meaning of Section 9(b) of the Act:

> All employees employed by Respondent engaged in electrical or electronic construction job work, consisting of the handling and moving of all electrical or electronic material, equipment, apparatus and appliances, the installation of all electrical or electronic construction and/or erection work including the installation and connecting of motors or generators, of all fixtures, or area light diffusing systems, appliances, and electrical maintenance thereon, and of all electronic equipment, electronic systems, communication systems with all related control wiring and devices, to and including the final running test, and any related instrumentation work or radiation monitoring, the welding, burning, brazing, bending, drilling and shaping of all copper, channel iron, angle iron, I beams, and brackets to be used in connection with the installation and erection of electrical wiring or equipment, the chasing and channeling necessary to any electrical or electronic work, the installation and maintenance of all temporary wiring and of all electrical lighting, heating and power equipment, the operating of power equipment used for the installation of electrical or electronic work, the cutting, threading and bending of all conduit by hand or machine, the sound backgrond work, regardless of voltage, electronic and high frequency equipment installation and maintenance, the installation assembly, trouble-shooting and final checkout including outside and inside construction of closed circuit television, intercommunication, audio background music for private, commercial or industrial use, for all electrical apparatus by means of which electricity is applied to amplification transmission, transference, production recording or reproduction of voice, music and sound, and work on Nurse Call, Fire Alarm, Synchronized Clock and other similar control signaling and indicating systems; excluding all office employees, guards, and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by telling job applicants that Respondent would be a nonunion employer, at a time when Respondent's employees were represented by the Union.
5. Respondent violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act by bypassing the Union and dealing directly with its employees concerning wages and other terms and conditions of employment; and by failing and refusing until January 3, 1983, to pay hourly wage rates and fringe benefit contributions for its employees as required by the union-NECA contract in effect between the parties.

THE REMEDY

Having found that Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, it will be recommended that Respondent be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, and take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

It will be recommended that Respondent make whole employees for their losses in wages and fringe benefit contributions from June 4, 1982, until January 3, 1983, at which time the Union disclaimed further interest in representing Respondent's employees, as noted supra, with interest thereon to be computed in the manner prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

17 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

Upon a charge filed by the Union on 19 August 1986 and an amended charge filed on 26 September 1986, the General Counsel of the National Labor Relations Board issued a complaint on 3 October 1986 against the Company, the Respondent, alleging that it has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The complaint alleges that on 6 February 1986, following a Board election in Case 29–RC–5495, the Union was certified as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the Company's employees in the unit found appropriate. (Official notice is taken of the "record" in the representation proceeding as defined in the Board's Rules and Regulations, Secs. 102.68 and 102.69(g), amended Sept. 9, 1981, 46 Fed.Reg. 45922 (1981); Frontier Hotel, 265 NLRB 343 (1982). The complaint further alleges that since 9 April 1986 the Company has refused to bargain with the Union. Since 1 July 1986 the Union has requested the names and addresses of the employees in the unit, and the Respondent has refused to provide them. On 16 October 1986 the Respondent filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint.

On 27 January 1987 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. On 2 February 1987 the Board issued an order transferring the proceeding to the Board and a Notice to Show Cause why the motion should not be granted. The Company filed a response on 16 March 1987.[1]

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

Ruling on Motion for Summary Judgment

The Company's answer denies that the Union requested it to bargain with it; denies that the Union requested the names and addresses of the unit employees; and denies that the information is necessary for and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as collective-bargaining representative. The General Counsel argues that all material issues have been or could have been previously decided. We agree with the General Counsel.

The record, including the record in Case 29–RC–5495, reveals that an election was held 11 September 1981 pursuant to a Stipulated Election Agreement. The tally of ballots shows that of approximately 13 eligible voters, 5 cast votes for and 5 against the Union; there were 3 determinative challenged ballots.

On 17 September 1981 the Respondent and the Petitioner filed objections to the election. On 10 November 1981 the Regional Director issued a Report on Challenged Ballots and Objections, Order Consolidating Cases and Notice of Hearing.[2] On 20 November 1981 the Respondent filed exceptions to the report.

On 15 March 1982 the Board issued an unpublished Decision and Direction directing that other issues be considered as part of the hearing. On 5 August 1983 Judge D. Barry Morris issued a decision in which he concluded that two of the challenged employees, Libynski and Nannery, had been discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3) of the Act.[3] Judge Morris stated that "it is likely the opening and counting of these [two] challenged ballots will produce a conclusive result." The judge recommended that Case 29–RC–5495 be severed and remanded to the Regional Director. The Respondent filed exceptions.

On 10 September 1984 the Board remanded these proceedings to Judge Morris, consolidating them with Cases 29–CA–9764 and 29–CA–9811. On 29 November 1984 Judge Morris issued a supplemental decision in which he reaffirmed his earlier rulings. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

[1] The Respondent's response is titled "Respondent's Opposition to Motion for Summary Judgment and Issuance of Decision and Order." The response raises two issues.

The Respondent contends that the identity of the Union has changed in that Local 282 IBT was the certified bargaining agent of the employees in the bargaining unit, but the Respondent received written requests for bargaining from Building Material Teamsters, Local 282. We have examined the letters requesting bargaining and find that the Respondent could not have reasonably doubted the identity of the Union. Each letter bears along its left margin the phrase "Affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America"; and the Teamsters' "horsehead" logo.

The Respondent also contends that two affidavits, relied on by the General Counsel to show that the Respondent was requested to bargain and did not, are invalid because they were given "on information and belief." We note that certain portions of the affidavits were given "on information and belief," but the relevant portions were given on personal knowledge. Both affidavits were given by Franklin K. Moss, the Union's attorney. In his 27 August 1986 affidavit, par. 8, he stated that "[o]n August 8, 1986, I caused to be mailed to Synergy Gas Corporation by certified mail, return receipt requested, the letter annexed as Exhibit F. To date, I have received no response." This letter requested that the Respondent bargain with the Union and furnish it with information.

We find that both the Respondent's contentions lack merit.

[2] Cases 29–RC–5493 and 29–RC–5494 and Cases 29–CA–9116 and 29–CA–9117 were consolidated with the present case for the purpose of a hearing before an administrative law judge.

[3] The third determinative ballot was cast by employee Trypaulik.

On 11 June 1985 the Board affirmed Judge Morris' recommendation and ordered Case 29–RC–5495 severed and remanded to the Regional Director.[4] On 22 January 1986 the Regional Director opened the ballots of Libynski and Nannery; both ballots were for the Union. The revised tally of ballots shows seven votes for the Union, five against, with one nondeterminative challenged ballot.[5]

On 6 February 1986 the Acting Regional Director issued a certification of representative certifying the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the unit found appropriate.

By letters dated 9 April, 28 July, and 8 August 1986 the Union requested that the Respondent bargain, and since 9 April 1986 the Respondent has refused to bargain with the Union. By letters dated 1 July 1986 and 8 August 1986 the Union requested the names and addresses of the employees in the bargaining unit, and since 1 July 1986 the Respondent has failed to provide the Union with the employees' names and addresses.[6]

It is well settled that in the absence of newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances, a respondent in a proceeding alleging a violation of Section 8(a)(5) is not entitled to relitigate issues that were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding. See Pittsburgh Glass Co. v. NLRB, 313 U.S. 146, 162 (1941); Secs. 102.67(f) and 102.69(c) of the Board's Rules and Regulations.

All issues raised by the Company were or could have been litigated in the prior representation proceeding. The Company does not offer to adduce at a hearing any newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence. We do not find any special circumstances that would require the Board to reexamine the decision made in the representation proceeding. We therefore find that the Company has not raised any issue that is properly litigable in this unfair labor practice proceeding. Accordingly we grant the Motion for Summary Judgment.

On the entire record, the Board makes the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

The Company, a New York corporation, is engaged in the sale of propane gas at its facility in Patchoque, New York, where during the past year it purchased and caused to be transported and delivered to its place of business in excess of $50,000 worth of goods and materials located outside of the State of New York.[7] We find that the Company is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act and that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. The Certification

Following the election held 11 September 1981, the Union was certified on 6 February 1986 as the collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time office clerical employees employed by the Employer at its Patchoque, New York location; excluding all temporary employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

The Union continues to be the exclusive representative under Section 9(a) of the Act.

B. Refusal to Bargain

Since 9 April 1986 the Union has requested the Company to bargain. Since 9 April 1986 the Company has refused. We find that this refusal constitutes an unlawful refusal to bargain in violation of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

Since 1 July 1986, the Union has requested the Respondent to provide it with the names and addresses of the employees in the bargaining unit described above in section II, A; such information is necessary and relevant to the Union's performance of its function as collective-bargaining representative.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

By refusing on 9 April 1986 to bargain with the Union as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of employees in the appropriate unit, and by refusing since 1 July 1986 to provide the Union with the names and addresses of the unit employ-

---

[5] The Regional Director served on the parties a revised tally of ballots that showed that a majority of the employees in the stipulated unit selected the Union as their collective-bargaining representative.

[6] In its answer, the Respondent denied that it was asked to bargain with the Union and that the Union requested the employees' names and addresses. We note that the Union made its requests in writing, and the requests were forwarded to the Respondent by certified mail, return receipt requested.

[7] In its answer, the Respondent denied that its principal location was Patchoque, New York, and that it is engaged in the nonretail sale of propane gas. Counsel for the General Counel states that he does not contest these denials. We find that, as the Respondent admitted being engaged in interstate commerce, the denials do not raise issues requiring a hearing.

ees, the Respondent has engaged in unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 8(a)(5) and (1) and Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, we shall order it to cease and desist, to bargain on request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement; and to provide the Union with the names and addresses of the unit employees.[8]

To ensure that the employees are accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, we shall construe the initial period of the certification as beginning the date the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith with the Union. Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board orders that the Respondent, Synergy Gas Corporation a/k/a Glover Bottled Gas Corp., Patchoque, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Local 282, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

(b) Refusing to provide the Union with the names and addresses of the employees in the unit.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit on terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

> All full-time and regular part-time office clerical employees employed by the Employer at its Patchoque, New York location; excluding all temporary employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Provide the Union with the names and addresses of the unit employees.

(c) Post at its facility in Patchoque, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[9] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 29, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous piaces including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[8] The General Counsel's request for a visitatorial clause is denied, as such a clause is not necessary in the circumstances of this case.

[9] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Local 282, International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America as the exclusive representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

WE WILL NOT refuse to provide the Union with the names and addresses of the unit employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached on terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time office clerical employees employed by the Employer at its Patchoque, New York location; excluding all temporary employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL provide the Union with the names and addresses of the unit employees.

GLOVER BOTTLED GAS CORP.

Twistex, Inc. and National Association of Government Employees (SEIU/AFL-CIO). Case 1-CA-23472

17 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 30 October 1986 Administrative Law Judge Richard H. Beddow Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent and the General Counsel filed exceptions and supporting briefs.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[2]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Twistex, Inc., South Grafton, Massachusetts, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

Substitute the following for paragraph 1(d).

"(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

Ronald S. Cohen, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Richard G. Remmes, Esq., of South Boston, Massachusetts, for the Respondent.
Robert Weihrauch, Esq., of Worcester, Massachusetts, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD H. BEDDOW JR., Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Boston, Massachusetts, on 16, 17, and 18 June 1986. The proceeding is based on a charge filed 10 January 1986,[1] by National Association of Government Employees (SEIU/AFL-CIO). The Regional Director's complaint dated 20 March 1986, alleges that Respondent Twistex, Inc., of South Grafton, Massachusetts, violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the National Labor Relations Act by laying off and subsequently failing and refusing to recall two employees because of their union or other protected concerted activities and by attempting to cause another employer to discharge one of the same employees.

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is engaged in the manufacture, distribution, and sale of yarn products. It annually ships goods valued in excess of $50,000 from its South Grafton location to points outside Massachusetts and it annually purchases and receives goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside Massachusetts. It admits that at all times material it has been an employer engaged in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act. It also admits that the Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Twistex is primarily owned by Bruce Kiviat (as well as brothers Reed and Douglas Kiviat), however, it is not shown that he is actively engaged in company operations. His father, Jerry (Jerome) Kiviat, owns the building in which Respondent conducts its operations. Several other tenants are located in the same building. Jerome is shown to serve as Respondent's "engineering" consultant and he plays an active role in directing Respondent's fundamental operations. He is recognized by the employees as being personally engaged in labor relations matters and the day-to-day plant operations. Jerome receives consultant fees that exceed the annual salary paid Plant Manager Sam Vouna.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Member Babson and Member Stephens find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's application of the "small plant doctrine" in view of the other grounds relied on by the judge that establish the Respondent's knowledge of the union activity of employees Potter and Poulin. Additionally, Member Babson and Member Stephens note that no exceptions have been filed to the judge's finding that the Respondent did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1) based on Plant Manager Vouna's 8 October 1985 conversation with Potter.

[2] The General Counsel excepts, inter alia, to the judge's recommended remedy and Order to the extent that they provide backpay for Potter and Poulin based on their part-time status, contending that these employees were entitled to recall to full-time positions. We note, however, that the complaint alleges that the Respondent unlawfully refused to recall Potter and Poulin from layoff and that as of the time of their layoffs they occupied part-time positions. Furthermore, we find that the evidence is insufficient to establish that Potter and Poulin requested and were entitled to recall to full-time positions. Accordingly, we find the General Counsel's exceptions without merit.

The judge recommended that a broad cease-and-desist order issue against the Respondent. We have considered this case in light of the standard set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), and have concluded that the narrow cease-and-desist order is appropriate. We shall modify the judge's recommended Order accordingly. Despite his recommended Order, however, we note that the judge's recommended notice contains the narrow cease-and-desist language.

Jerome is also the president and owner of Brentwood Yarn Mills. This company owns the machinery used by Respondent, as well as the raw materials it processes. In effect Respondent contract processes Brentwood's yarn for a set fee per pound. Brentwood has a manufacturing facility of its own located on Long Island, New York. It also uses the processing services of BRD Industries, of New Jersey, an operation similar to that of Respondent and owned by Bruce, Reed, and Douglas Kiviat. Both Respondent and BRD contract exclusively with Brentwood; Richard Cadrin serves as the controller of both Respondent and Brentwood but maintains his office in South Grafton. Jerome Kiviat has his office at Brentwood but visits South Grafton frequently and otherwise is in almost daily phone contact with plant manager Vouna or Cadrin. Vouna also holds a position on the payroll of both Respondent and Brentwood.

Among other activities, Jerome Kiviat regularly has discussed employee wage levels with Vouna and Cadrin and Jerome, along with Vouna represented Respondent in a meeting with an investigator for the occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). Cadrin testified that the work capabilities of the three facilities are partially interchangeable and that Respondent has better machinery and can perform all the functions of the other plants plus handle heavier yarns that the other plants cannot process. The assignment of work to any particular plant is made by scheduling people who work under the direct supervision of Jerome Kiviat. Also, by letter dated 10 October Jerome notified Vouna of a decision to cut back production at Respondent's plant and directed Vouna to immediately layoff any "excessive part time help."

Although the Respondent disclaims any ownership status by Jerome Kiviat, I conclude that regardless of Bruce Kiviat's titular position as president, the record shows such close and intimate control over the operations by Jerome that it must be concluded that he served as a supervisor and agent acting for and on behalf of management and that his statements and actions pertinent to the charges herein must be found to be attributable to Respondent.

Respondent's manufacturing process involves three basic production operations; twisting, binding, and winding/reeling and for the most part the production operations are located on the fourth floor of the Kiviat's building. The main production room contains the twisting and binding operations together with two winders and the core winder. The tube winding operation is in a separate room on the same floor.

Because of a general drop in the overall business generated by Brentwood, Respondent started an experimental hand-knit operation in the spring of 1985. In conjunction with the hand-knit business, Respondent began planning for a retail store, which it opened on the fourth floor in the spring of 1986.

Tina Potter began working for Respondent in 1980 on a part-time basis. On graduation from high school in 1981, she became a full-time employee. Potter started on skeining and then at various times performed all other production tasks including reeling, binding, twisting, and cone and tube winding. She was laid off during the winters of both 1981 and 1982, but returned in April 1983. In late October 1984 she requested a raise from her base wage of $3.95 an hour and quit when Jerry Kiviat told her she would never make $5 an hour working for him. She returned to Respondent in April 1985 on a part-time basis and told Vouna she would consider going full time in September. During the latter half of September she performed twisting and binding on Respondent's new hand-knit project and returned to cone winding and pull skeining shortly before being laid off on October 11. Generally, she worked 4 morning hours, but often stayed latter at Vouna's request.

Sandra Poulin was first employed by Respondent from 1979 to September 1981 and again from August 1983 to July 1984, predominently part time. She returned with Potter on a part-time basis in April 1985. She worked in all production jobs except skeining and during the last period of employment performed binding cone winding, twisting, and, during the second week of October, tube winding.

During the greater part of 1985, Respondent generally employed approximately 22 production employees. And, until October, production ran on three shifts. Poulin held employee number 20, while Mary Richard, described by Respondent as the senior part-time employee (apparently because of her continuous service record) was number 22, and Potter was number 163. New employees hired in November received 400 series numbers.

In early September Potter and Poulin spoke with Vouna about their perceived unsatisfactory working conditions. They specifically referred to eye, ear, and lung protection and requesting a water fountain, eye goggles, and ear plugs. Vouna said he would see about a fountain and suggested that the Company would reimburse them if they purchased other items themselves.

Poulin testified that on two occasions in mid-September Vouna told them they could work all the overtime they wanted and when they mentioned the possibility of going full time he said to wait and see after the anticipated October raises went into effect. He also explained that they were going to hire some new people and start up a "skeining" operation involving the packaging of yarn in quantities suitable for retail sale.

Potter testified that Bouna said he had discussed their raises with Jerry and that they would get a 30-cent-an-hour increase but that they should not discuss it with others as the others would not be getting as much. She also confirmed Vouna's comments about available work, his offer of more hours, and the possibility of full-time work. When she indicated a reluctance to work more hours because of a dissatisfaction with her pay rate, Vouna said he was gong to hire others whether they went full time or not and repeated that they could work as much as they wanted as there was plenty of work. During the latter conversation with Vouna, he also indicated that they would receive 30-cent-an-hour raises. (The extra 10 cents apparently was designed to make up for a raise other employees had received the previous year when Potter and Poulin were not working.)

During mid-September, Vouna assigned Potter to the pull-skeining operation for several days of training on the best copy available

new job. Also in mid-September Poulin told Vouna that she did not want to work with employee Gina Perras who worked on a binding machine. The explanation for her statement was that Gina sat down much of the time and got away with a lot of things because she was the girl friend of forman Bruce Boisvert.

On 19 September Poulin, in Potter's presence and after discussing their dissatisfaction with working conditions, called the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, and shortly thereafter received a complaint form.

On 30 September Poulin, together with Potter, filled out, signed, and mailed a complaint to OSHA regarding nine areas of concern including lack of hearing protection, cotton, and wool contamination in nose, eyes, and lungs, and lack of drinking fountains.

On 2 October, Potter and Poulin met at the latter's home with Dave Surpernant, a representative of the Union. They received union literature and authorization cards that they then took to work and distributed the next day. Potter gave them personally to 4 or 5 employees and placed literature in the ladies' room and on windshields of vehicles in the employees' parking area, including Foreman Boisvert's truck. Potter testified that Boisvert was 15 feet away and looking at her while she distributed some literature in the twisting and binding room. On 4 October, additional literature, which specifically listed Potter and Poulin as the persons to contact for more information, was distributed in the same manner as well as at the lunch table where they were observed by Foreman Boisvert. Potter testified that Bosivert then approached them and stated they were not going to form a union as Jerry Kiviat would not let them. Boisvert admitted that he saw the union pamphlets on the lunch table and that he then went to Vouna's office and asked if Vouna knew what was going on out there. Vouna replied affirmatively and Boisvert observed that a union leaflet was on Vouna's desk. Boisvert denied that he identified any particular employees as being involved in the Union, however, he admitted that while a group of employees, including Potter and Poulin, were talking about the Union he said that "Jerry Kiviat would not let the union in here and would close down first."

Boisvert also testified that the literature he found on his truck and first saw in the plant did not have any employee names on them. He admitted, however, that he heard rumors going around that Potter and Poulin were trying to get a union in there, but denied that he told that to Vouna.

On 7 October, without prior notice to the staff, Jerry Kiviat, Vouna, and Cadrin held a meeting with all the day-shift production employees (approximately 10 people were in attendance). Cadrin had a pad and pen and took notes of what went on. Kiviat opened by stating that it had been a year since their last meeting, it was time for a meeting, and he wanted to hear any complaints the employees had. Respondent asserts that it has been Kiviat's practice to have an annual meeting near 1 October and to give a review of the company's condition. Potter, however, recalled that the last company meeting had been in August 1984, and that they had several days advanced notice prior to the meeting. Potter asked for a water fountain, clean lunch table, and a sanitary napkin machine in the ladies' room and spoke about her eyes being bothered. Poulin asked for hearing protection and mentioned ventilation, breathing dust, and not knowing the makeup of the yarn. Other employees made comments, both pro and con, regarding the suggestions. During the 45-minute meeting Kiviat also told the employees that work was slow but that of his three plants, Respondent would be the last place to have a layoff because he would take work from the other plants and keep Respondent going. Cadrin testified that in response to the complaints, Respondent ordered a water bubbler and sanitary napkins and that after acting on these matters, he discarded his notes of the meeting.

On 8 October Potter and Poulin both received of 20-cent-an-hour pay raises, rather than the 30 cents they had expected. The next day they both spoke with Vouna about it and he told them that because employees in the plant were complaining about discrimination, he decided to give everyone the same raise. During the same conversation Potter questioned why all the woman except for Potter and Poulin were asked their preference for the type of sanitary napkins and he replied it has all been done by his secretary.

Also on 8 October Potter and Poulin observed an OSHA inspector tour the plant in the company of Manager Vouna. Both were given "boxes" for the taking of some measurements and the next day when Potter asked Vouna what had been going on, Vouna responded with a question about who had made the OSHA complaint and Potter said she had no idea who it was. Poulin also saw Jerome Kiviat in the office but he did not look at her and, when she left, the company mechanic commented that Kiviat was upset about OSHA being at the plant.

Potter also recalled that on 8 October they spoke with Boisvert at the lunch table and he was upset because as a result of the presence of its OSHA inspector he had been required to vacuum the "fuzz" from the various machines.

On 10 October Vouna told Poulin and Potter that he was cutting back on their hours. Poulin recalled that they had been working more than 4 hours a day for 2 months. (Record indicates that for the last 3 weeks of September, they averaged 20 hours a week or less, however, the first week of September and the next 2 weeks in October generally reflect more than 4 hours a day.)

On 11 October Potter and Poulin were both told by Vouna that they were laid off because work was slow and because they had the least seniority of the part-time workers.

On leaving Respondent's area of the plant both went to another company, located in the same building, and applied for jobs. Both testified that the supervisor said he would love to hire them and indicated he was aware of something going on about some union activity upstairs. Subsequently, on 4 November, Potter obtained a job with Hospital Data.

During 1985 Hospital Data Systems rented portions of the second floor in the building owned by Jerome Kiviat and utilized by Respondent. Its president, Richard Anderson, testified that while he was absent his foreman had hired some additional help from within the building.

On his return in the early part of November, he visited Vouna's office at the latter's request Vouna told Anderson that he had a personnel problem because a girl he had hired, Tina Potter, was vindictive and a troublemaker and Vouna suggested that it would be in everyone's best interest if Anderson discontinued her employment. Anderson also recalled that Vouna had referred to some relationship she had with a union. Vouna admitted that Anderson's recollection was substantially correct but stated he said nothing about "union cards" Vouna added that he had just received the OSHA citation reflecting Potter's and Poulin's names, knew they were working downstairs, and he just wanted to tip Anderson off that they were troublemakers. Potter testified that her foreman from Hospital Data told her she might be laid off because Respondent had spoken with Anderson, said she was a troublemaker, and was upset that she had been hired.[2]

During the first week of December Poulin saw newspaper ads by Respondent for full-time employees. She called Vouna who told her he had no more openings at the time. Vouna admits that he was hiring at that time but did not consider Poulin because he assumed she was seeking part-time work and he wanted full-time binding and twisting operators.

On 14 January 1986, Potter listened on an extension phone while Poulin called Vouna and asked if any full-time employment was available. He answered in the negative and when she asked if he knew when she might be called back to work he said he had no idea.

Potter also testified that in a conversation with Vouna in September, prior to her layoff, she had learned of Respondent's plans to open a retail outlet and had told him she had 6 months of retail experience and would like to work in the planned store. Vouna indicated it would be a good idea but to just wait as he did not know when it would all happen. Vouna recalled the conversation but testified that he subsequently did not place the ads or do the hiring for the positions that were filled.

Plant Manager Vouna testified that at the end of August, Respondent had run out of wool orders, which resulted in the end of reeling (skeining) operations, and that a major cotton order being produced for a manufacturer of sweaters was placed on hold early in October. Consequently, it was decided that the third shift should be eliminated, effective 9 October, in order to stretch out the work and reduce the number of employees. Vouna stated the change to a two-shift operation automatically reduced production by one-third and resulted in there not being enough day shift work in tube winding to keep Poulin, Potter, and two other employees who performed that function, occupied. Potter and Poulin were considered to be the least senior employees in tube winding because both had returned to work in April 1985 after quitting in the early fall of 1984, and it was considered to be company policy that part-time employees be laid off first.

Vouna also indicated that in addition to the economic reasons for their layoff, he also considered their intractable attitude as evidenced by their past work history, including Poulin's leaving without notice in April after returning for only 1 week as a full-time employee (she then went to part time) and because she threatened to quit rather than work as a "binder" in the main production area because she could not get along with the First-Shift Foreman Boisvert and employee Gina Perras.

[2] Although Respondent objected to the hearsay nature of this statement, its objection was not pursued on brief.

III. DISCUSSION

The issues in this case arose from the events surrounding a brief union organizational attempt by two employees and their contemporaneous filing of a complaint with OSHA about working conditions. A review of the record leads to the conclusion that the Company responded with the layoff of the involved employees and a subsequent refusal to recall them.

As noted above, I conclude that Jerome Kiviat exercises effective control over Respondent and two other companies engaged in the same business and that he is a supervisor and agent of Respondent whose statements and actions pertaining to the involved complaint properly are attributable to Respondent. I also find Foreman Bruce Boisvert is a statutory supervisor within the meaning of Section 2(11) of the Act.[3]

Boisvert admitted that when he first saw union literature being distributed he told a group of employees, including Potter and Poulin, that Jerry Kiviat would not let the union in and would close down first. On cross-examination Respondent attempted to minimize the nature of this threat by obtaining an answer from Boisvert that this was only his personal opinion and was not based on any comments by Kiviat, however, it is well established that a supervisor's statement to employees that threatens plant closure if a union is organized constitutes illegal interference. Accordingly, I find that Boisvert's statement of 8 October is attributable to Respondent and that the statement interfered with the union activity of employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged.

Also on 8 October the plant was visited by an OSHA investigator and it is alleged that subsequently Vouna interrogated Potter about who had made the complaint. The only evidence relative to this allegation indicates that Vouna made a comment that he was trying to find out who made a complaint in response to Potter's question to him about what was going on with the presence of the OSHA investigator. Under these circumstances, I do not find that his answer rises to a level that would tend to restrain, coerce, or interfere with employees' rights, see Rossmore House, 269 NLRB 1176 (1984), and I find that Respondent is not shown to have violated the Act in this respect, as alleged.

Turning to the layoff and refusal to recall aspects of this proceeding, applicable law requires that the General Counsel meet an initial burden of presenting sufficient evidence to support an inference that the employees' union or other protected, concerted activities were the motivating factor in the employer's decision to lay off and not recall the employees. Here, the record shows that Potter and Poulin openly distributed union leaflets during the early part of October. This occurred in front of Foreman Boisvert and lead to his admitted comment that Kiviat would not let the Union in and would close the plant.

[3] The record shows that Boisvert was regarded as a supervisor by the employees, he admittedly could and did hire, fire, and discipline employees and he was a salaried worker who received essentially twice the rate other production employees were paid.

Secondly, after having first made certain personal complaints to Vouna about perceived unsatisfactory working conditions, Potter and Poulin filed a complaint with OSHA on 30 September. These complaints were also repeated by Potter and Poulin in the unannounced general meeting of all employees called by Kiviat on 7 October. On the morning of 8 October, when the OSHA inspector visited the plant and brought the complaint to the attention of Vouna and, apparently, Jerome Kiviat, the investigator's notes indicate that Vouna asked him to test the two employees he believed to be the "source of all this" with a "dosimeter" and that Respondent stated the "complaint arose from an ongoing effort to unionize the shop." Potter and Poulin were both tested. Later that same day Vouna met with Cadrin and assertedly made the decision to lay off both employees. The subject of the OSHA complaint involved working conditions and Potter's and Poulin's joint complaints to Vouna regarding the same matters (as well as pay rates), clearly constitute a protected, concerted activity, see A. N. Electric Corp., 276 NLRB 887 (1985). On 11 October they were told of their layoff and, subsequently, no effort was made to recall them, despite the fact that ads were placed for new employees, some new employees were hired, and Potter and Poulin both made inquires about returning to work. Under these circumstances, I conclude that the General Counsel has met his initial burden by presenting a prima facie showing sufficient to support an inference that the employees' union activity and their protected, concerted OSHA complaint were the motivating factors in Respondent's layoff decision as well as its apparent subsequent decision to not recall them from layoff status. Accordingly, the testimony will be discussed and the record evaluated in keeping with the criteria set forth in Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), see also NLRB v. Transportation Management Corp., 462 U.S. 393 (1983), to consider Respondent's defense and, in the light thereof, whether the General Counsel has carried his overall burden.

Although Respondent denies that Plant Manager Vouna had any knowledge of Potter's and Poulin's union activity at the time of their layoff, the record does establish that by 4 October, when Vouna was told about union activity by Boisvert, he already had possession of a union leaflet brought to him by his secretary and he had acknowledged that he was aware of what was going on. Although it was not established that the leaflet seen by Vouna specifically identified Potter and Poulin, Boisvert admitted that rumors were going through the plant identifying them as the persons trying to get a union started.

As noted, Respondent's operation involved 22 or fewer production employees (9 or 10 in a shift), working in an open environment in which Supervisors Boisvert and Vouna were regularly present and in which Potter and Poulin openly distributed leaflets, some of which carried their names. While Boisvert and Vouna deny that Boisvert identified the union activitis to Vouna, Boisvert testified that he assumed Vouna already knew and I do not credit Vouna's bear disavowal of knowledge. Under these circumstances, it is appropriate to apply the "small plant rule" and infer the presumptive likelihood that Vouna had knowledge of the employees' open activities, inasmuch as there is sufficient other information, including the admitted rumors and presence of leaflets with Potter's and Poulin's name, and the conveyance to Vouna of a leaflet by his secretary, to independently infer Respondent's knowledge of their union activity. See D & D Sewing Co. v. NLRB, 801 F.2d 636 (3d Cir. 1986).

Respondent also denies that it knew Potter and Poulin were behind the OSHA complaint until after the layoff, when, on 19 October it received a document that specifically carried their names. As otherwise noted, Respondent told the OSHA investigator that it believed it knew the source of the complaint and then specifically directed testing of Potter and Poulin. Otherwise, the sequence of direct complaints to Vouna and Kiviat on the same specific subjects covered in the OSHA complaint independently support an inference that Respondent knew or believed at the time Potter and Poulin were laid off that they were responsible and I cannot find Vouna's denial in this respect to be credible. While I conclude that these circumstances are sufficient to establish Respondent's knowledge, I also conclude that this inference is further supported by the timing of the layoffs and, as discussed below, the pretextual quality of Respondent's asserted justifications for its action and for its subsequent failure to recall them from layoff. These factors also establish a basis for the inference that Respondent was aware of the employees' protected activity and that such knowledge is directly linked to their respective layoffs and Respondent's subsequent failure to recall them. See Dr. Frederick Davidowitz, D.D.S. a Professional Corp., 277 NLRB 1046 (1985).

Respondent's principal defense rests on its claim that a reduction in its work force was required because of a decline in orders. Vouna testified that when there are layoffs Kiviat usually orders him to lay off "a certain amount of hours" and, when work decreased in 1984, Respondent cut hours back by 20 percent instead of laying off employees. However, in October Kiviat departed from the norm by ordering the layoff of "excessive" part-time employees.

Also, in 1982 Respondent asked for volunteers as an alternative to layoffs, however, no such request was made in 1985 even though it knew of two employees who were pregnant and had already indicated they would be leaving work in December. Vouna's attempted explanations for the variance were contradictory and unpersuasive. For example, he first said he did not cut hours in 1985 because when he did that in 1984 it caused some third-shift employees to quit. However, Vouna also testified at the hearing, and in his affidavit, that he had decided to eliminate the third shift with the hope that this would cause the same third-shift employees to quit. Vouna further testified he did not cut back hours because he did not want to unfairly penalize all the employees, yet he attempted to force third-shift employees to quit. Subsequent to the alleged unfair labor practice in 1985, Respondent again utilized cuts in hours for reduced work loads in 1986, and there were no apparent layoffs.

Respondent presented an exhibit and testimony regarding the numbers of production employees at its several related plants. This shows that between weeks 42 (the week Potter and Poulin were laid off) and 43, Respondent's Twistex plant had a reduction of three production employees while the BRD plant showed an increase of one production employee and the Brentwood plant showed no change. It appears that the only involuntary cutback imposed on employees at any of the three plants was the layoffs of Potter and Poulin. This is to be contrasted to 1984 when during the months of October through December the number of production employees of Respondent increased while the number of production employees at BRD decreased from 52 to 14 and the number of production employees at Brentwood decreased by one in the same period. The 1984 practice was consistent with the assurance given in October 1985 by Jerome Kiviat that production would be shifted to Respondent from other plants (it was considered that the work force at both of its other facilities was considered to be more elastic and could be more readily replaced after a layoff than at Twistex, yet, only a week later, this practice was not followed.

During that period of time the union organizational drive activated by Poulin and Potter occurred and, as urged by the General counsel, the evidence establishes that Respondent departed from its normal practice in deciding to have a layoff at the plant and in implementing that layoff, thus supporting an inference that Respondent's actions were unlawfully motivated. See Heartland Food Warehouse, supra. Under these circumstances, I find that Respondent's principal stated economic reason for the layoff of Potter and Poulin is pretextual. Although some decrease in production occurred, it appears that this was manipulated by Jerome Kiviat to adversely affect Respondent's plant despite his assurances to the contrary.

Significantly, Respondent stated it selected Potter and Poulin as they were the least senior part-time workers (but based on then current time rather than total or original starting date) but also has asserted various other reasons, including the assertion that they were doing winding, a function no longer needed, and were reluctant to work in twisting and binding. These reasons must be contrasted with the showing that both Potter and Poulin were qualified and experienced in all job functions and that any reluctance to work was directed at working conditions in a particular location where management failed to correct a situation where foreman Boisvert gave preferential treatment to his girlfriend. Also, in a letter dated February 25, 1986, from Respondent to OSHA, Respondent listed seven reasons for selecting them for layoff including the assertation that their attendance was poor, that Potter had quit 1 year earlier after demanding a 25-percent pay increase and had been laid off twice before, and that Poulin had previously quit twice and had been fired once.

Under these circumstances, I conclude that the apparent shifting and subsequent buildup of additional reasons for their layoff only serves to further underscore its unlawful motive and the pretextual nature of their layoff. See J & G Wall Baking Co., 272 NLRB 1008 (1984).

Respondent's reasons and testimony also are rendered suspect by the timing of the layoff almost immediately after the visit of the OSHA investigator, by the apparent repudiation of Kiviat's assurances that Respondent's facility would be the last to have a layoff, and by the contradictory statements of its various principals. For example, Vouna testified that he made the decision to lay off the two employees on 8 October, yet a letter of instructions from Kiviat clearly implies that the decision was made by Kiviat on 10 October. However, Cadrin informed OSHA that the decision to lay them off was made on 11 October. Also, Vouna's affidavit stated that a decision was made on 1 or 2 October to lay off a full-time employee or two part-time employees. Vouna also testified that Kiviat told him to lay off one full-time employee and he then decided to lay off two part-timers, however, Kiviat's letter clearly states that Kiviat ordered the elimination of "all excessive part-time employees." Vouna attempted to portray the elimination of the third shift and the layoffs as part of the same decision-making process and testified that the decision to lay off the two employees was made at the same time it was decided to eliminate the third shift but in his affidavit he stated he made the decision to eliminate the third shift weeks before 8 October, and Cadrin's letter to OSHA clearly separated the two events.

I conclude that the totality of Respondent's motivational defense is pretextual and I find that Respondent has failed to show that it would have laid off either Potter or Poulin absent the start of the Union's organizational drive and the visit of the OSHA investigator and Respondent's suspicions that each of them was engaged in union activity and in the making of a complaint to OSHA.

Respondent has failed to meet its burden under Wright Line, supra, and, as the General Counsel otherwise has shown by a preponderance of the evidence that both Potter and Poulin were laid off because of their protected activities and I further conclude that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act as alleged.

The conclusion reached regarding Respondent's motivation for the layoff are reinforced by a review of Respondent's actions subsequent to the layoff.

After Potter was hired by another employer, in the same building as Twistex, a building owned by Kiviat (and after Respondent had received an OSHA document specifically identifying Poter and Poulin as the complaining parties), Vouna admitted asking her new employer to get rid of her because she was vindictive and a troublemaker. I also credit that the Company's president, who independently testified that Vouna made a reference to Potter's involvement with a union. This action by Vouna constitutes a separate violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged.

Production continued during the fall of 1985, and Respondent experienced some turnover of employees. Respondent placed newspaper ads for and hired several new production employees. Potter and Poulin both spoke to Vouna about coming back to work. Poulin specifically telephoned Vouna in December asking for work right after Vouna began advertising for full-time help. Vouna explained that he did not hire Poulin because he assumed she was calling for part-time work, yet the record shows that one former employee on disability and one new employee were put on in November as part-time employees.

Respondent's work records also show that numerous employees, including newly hired workers, consistently had weekly wages in the range between $98 and $62 (Mary Richards a retired, part-timer also consistently worked 20 hours), from November 1985 through January 1986, whereas a comparable 40 hour production wage apparently would be at least in the $135 range. Also, regular production workers regularly worked between 2 and 15 hours overtime each week and received significantly greater wages.

A comparison for the last half of 1985 of the numbers of production employees at Respondent and at the two other companies controlled by Kiviat also indicate that Twistex went from a consistent level of 20 employees in the third quarter to a fluctuation between 18 and 14 in the fourth, while BRD went from a third quarter 12–15 range to a higher 16–20 range in the fourth quarter, and Brentwood went from a third quarter 24–30 range to a consistent 27 in the fourth quarter. Under these circumstances, it appears that little effort was made to assign more production to Respondent's plant despite the fact that it had better machinery, Kiviat had promised the employees that he would do so, and that had been the practice in the past.

Under these circumstances, I find that Respondent had ample opportunity to recall Potter and Poulin from layoff but never sought to do so. Moreover, it specifically denied their request for recall. I further find its attempt to find a distinction between their asserted status as part-time employees, qualified in only one area of operation, to be contrary to its operational practices and clearly pretextual. Respondent clearly knew of Potter's and Poulin's OSHA complaint by this time and it also is shown that it mentioned Potter's union activity when it attempted to get an independent employer to terminate her. I therefore conclude that the motivating factor behind Respondent's failure to recall them from layoff was their union and protected concerted activity and I conclude that Respondent is therefore shown to have violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act in this respect, as alleged.

Under all these circumstances, I conclude that Respondent has not met its burden of showing that Potter and Poulin would have been laid off and not recalled absent their union activity and protected concerted activity in filing their OSHA complaint, compare Dorothy Shamrock Coal Co., 279 NLRB 1298 (1986). The General Counsel otherwise has met her overall burden of proof and I further conclude that Respondent thereby violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By threatening that the plant would be shut down before a union would be let in, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

4. By attempting to cause another employer to discharge Tina Potter, in retaliation for her union and protected concerted activity, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

5. By laying off employees Tina Potter and Sandra J. Poulin on 11 October 1985 and by subsequently failing and refusing to recall them from lay off because of their union activity and protected concerted activity, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act.

6. The Respondent has not otherwise engaged in conduct violative of the Act as alleged in the complaint.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having discriminatorily laid off and failed to recall employees Potter and Poulin, I find it necessary to order it to offer them reinstatement to their former positions with compensation for loss of pay and other benefits, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). It also shall remove from its files any reference to the separation and notify them that it has been done and that evidence of such unlawful action will not be used as a basis for further action against them. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982). Otherwise, because of the serious nature of the violations and an overall display of a general disregard for the employees' fundamental rights, I find it necessary to issue a broad Order, requiring the Respondent to cease and desist from infringing in any other manner on rights guaranteed employees by Section 7 of the Act. Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

As a part of the relief sought, the General Counsel also seeks imposition of a so-called "visitatorial clause" whereby the Board would be authorized to engage in certain discovery activities in order to monitor compliance. Although the imposition of such a provision recently has become a common practice, there is no showing that it is of particular applicability or usefulness in dealing with the type of unfair labor practice involved in this proceeding. Accordingly, the request is denied and no visitatorial clause will be imposed as part of the order herein.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and n the entire record, I issue the following recommend-d[4]

ORDER

The Respondent, Twistex, Inc., its officers, agents, uccessors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Threatening employees with the closure of its busi-ess before it would allow a union.

(b) Attempting to cause another employer to discharge ormer employees in retaliation for their union or other rotected concerted activity.

(c) Laying off or failing and refusing to offer recall to ny employees or otherwise discriminating against them or engaging in union organization activity or other pro-cted concerted activity.

(d) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, coercing employees in the exercise of their rights uaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to ffectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Tina Potter and Sandra A. Poulin immediate d full reinstatement to their former or equivalent posi-ons and make them whole for the losses they incurred a result of the discrimination against them in the anner specified in the section above entitled Remedy," and remove from its files any references to ese separations on 11 October 1985, and notify them in riting that this has been done and that evidence of this lawful separation will not be used as a basis for future rsonnel actions against them.

(b) Preserve and, on request, make available to the oard or its agents for examination and copying, all pay-ll records, social security payment records, timecards, rsonnel records and reports, and all other records nec-sary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the rms of this Order.

(c) Post at its South Grafton, Massachusetts, facility pies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[5] pies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional rector for Region 1, after being signed by the Re-ondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

IT IS FURTHER ORDERED, that the complaint be dismissed insofar as it alleges violations of the Act other than those found above.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

> To organize
>
> To form, join, or assist any union
>
> To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice
>
> To act together for other mutual aid or protection
>
> To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT threaten employees with the closure of our business before we would allow a union.

WE WILL NOT attempt to cause any other employer to discharge any of our former employees because they engaged in union organization activity or other protected concerted activity.

WE WILL NOT layoff or refuse to recall employees laid off or otherwise discriminated against for engaging in union organization activity or other protected concerted activity.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, coerce, or restrain our employees in the exercise of the rights set forth above.

WE WILL offer Tina Potter and Sandra A. Poulin immediate and full reinstatement to their former or equivalent position and make them whole for any losses they incurred as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner specified in the section entitled "Remedy."

WE WILL remove from our files any references to their separations, and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful separation will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against them.

TWISTEX, INC.

If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's es and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended er shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the rd and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all pur-es.

If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of eals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the Nation-abor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National or Relations Board."

Adair Standish Corporation and Flint Local 282-C, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL-CIO. Case 7-CA-25973

17 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS BABSON, STEPHENS, AND CRACRAFT

On 10 November 1986 Administrative Law Judge Bernard Ries issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Charging Party filed a brief in response to the Respondent's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Adair Standish Corporation, Standish, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

Dwight R. Kirksey, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Francis T. Coleman, Esq., and Scott R. Merrill, Esq. (Boothe, Prichard & Dudley), of Washington D.C., for the Respondent.
Donald B. Greenspon, Esq. (Greenspon, Sheff & Washington, P.C.), of Detroit, Michigan, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

BERNARD RIES, Administrative Law Judge. This case was originally consolidated for hearing with Case 7-CA-25059 by the Regional Director for Region 7, by his order consolidating cases, amended complaint and notice of hearing issued on 16 July 1986. As explained in my order granting motion to sever, dated 5 November 1986, and attached hereto as Appendix A, I granted the Charging Party's motion to sever the two cases for the reason set out in that order.

As shown in that order, following an election won by the Union on 11 September 1986, a hearing was held on objections filed by Respondent in which the hearing officer concluded that the objections were without merit, and a Certification of Representative issued by the Board on 27 May 1986.[1] The Regional Director issued a complaint in this case, based on a charge filed by the Union on 26 June 1986 and, on 16 July, consolidated it for hearing with the outstanding complaint in Case 7-CA-25059. The complaint in the present case alleges that, since about 6 June 1986, Respondent has refused the 30 May request of the Union to commence bargaining collectively with it and to provide certain information to it.

As the order granting motion to sever makes clear, the Respondent does not contest that it has refused to bargain and to supply information, and the only apparent basis for these refusals is its belief that its objections in the representation proceeding should have been sustained.

The Respondent has adduced no evidence or issues that it did not have the opportunity to litigate at the representation proceeding. There are no factual issues aside from the underlying objections themselves, because the record shows Respondent's refusal to engage in collective-bargaining negotiations and to furnish the requested information.[2]

Accordingly, I concude that by its refusal to meet with the Union and to furnish relevant information to the Union, in and after June 1986, Respondent has violated and is violating Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

2. The Union is a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2(5) of the Act.

3. By virtue of the representation election of 11 September 1985, the Union is the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its facility at 4334 Airpark Drive, Standish, Michigan; but excluding office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

4. By refusing, on and after 6 June 1986, to recognize and bargain with the Union and to provide relevant information requested by it, Respondent has violated, and is violating, Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act.

5. The aforesaid unfair labor practices affect commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) and (1) of the Act, I shall recommend that it be ordered to cease and desist therefrom, to bargain on [1] Not included in bound volumes. On 6 June, Respondent filed a motion for reconsideration of the Board's ruling; on 24 September, the Board denied the motion.

[2] The Respondent does not challenge, and there can be no doubt, that the information requested in the Union's 30 May letter—a list of current employees with their dates of hire, current pay rates, current classifications, holidays, vacation periods and qualifications therefor, fringe benefit plans, hours of work, and "all other conditions of employment"—constitutes the kind of core data to which a union is presumptively entitled. request with the Union, and, if an understanding is reached, to embody the understanding in a signed agreement and to provide the Union, on request, the information it requested on 30 May 1986.

To ensure that the employees are accorded the services of their selected bargaining agent for the period provided by law, the initial period of the certification shall commence as the date the Respondent begins to bargain in good faith with the Union. Mar-Jac Poultry Co., 136 NLRB 785 (1962); Lamar Hotel, 140 NLRB 226, 229 (1962), enfd. 328 F.2d 600 (5th Cir. 1964), cert. denied 379 U.S. 817 (1964); Burnett Construction Co., 149 NLRB 1419, 1421 (1964), enfd. 350 F.2d 57 (10th Cir. 1965).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[3]

ORDER

The Respondent, Adair Standish Corporation, Standish, Michigan, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Refusing to bargain with Flint Local 282-C, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL-CIO (the Union), as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its facility at 4334 Airpark Drive, Standish, Michigan; but excluding office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

(b) Refusing to supply the Union with requestd information necessary for, and relevant to, the Union's function as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) On request, bargain with the Union as the exclusive representative of the employees in the following appropriate unit concerning terms and conditions of employment and, if an understanding is reached, embody the understanding in a signed agreement:

(b) Furnish the Union with information requested by it 30 May 1986 in current form.

(c) Post at its facility in Standish, Michigan, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix B."[4] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 7, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(d) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

APPENDIX A

ORDER GRANTING MOTION TO SEVER

On 4 October 1985, the Charging Party filed a charge (Case 7-CA-25059) with Region 7, alleging that Respondent had violated Sections 8(a)(1), (3), and (5) of the Act by, about "13 Setpember 1983 [sic]," unilaterally changing conditions of employment and retaliating against employees by promulgating a new discipline policy, and about 15 and 17 September discriminating against four named employees. On 16 October 1985, an amended charge alleging two more violations of Section 8(a)(1) and "(2)(3)" was filed, referring to unlawful solicitation of employees to revoke membership cards since 3 October and unlawful surveillance, threats, and promises of benefits since June.[1]

On 15 November, the Region issued a complaint based on these charges. The complaint included allegations that the Charging Party had been selected as the exclusive bargaining representative of employees in an identified bargaining unit on 11 September and, by virtue of a unilateral change in certain policies and by laying off employees, Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5). The complaint also contained several allegations of Section 8(a)(3) and (1), including alleged discrimination against four employees.

The record shows that a representation election was held among the employees in the appropriate unit on 11 September 1985; that the tally of ballots disclosed that the Charing Party had won the election; that the Respondent filed objections to the election that were overruled by a hearing officer and thereafter by the Board, which, on 27 May 1986, issued a Certification of Representative; and that the Respondent then filed with the Board a motion for reconsideration about 6 June 1986. The motion for reconsideraton was denied by the Board on 24 September.

On 26 June 1986, the Charging Party filed a new charge (Case 7-CA-25973), in which it alleged that since about 28 May 1986, the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(5) in that it had "refused to bargain in good faith with the Union." On 16 July 1986, the Region consolidated the two cases and amended the existing complaint to allege that about 30 May 1986, the Union had requested the Respndent to "commence bargaining collectively"

If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of Appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

with it and to furnish it with information concerning the number of employees, their hire dates, classifications, benefits, and other conditions of employment, all of which, since 6 June 1986, the Respondent, by letter, has refused to do.

At the instant hearing, on 8 August 1986, Charging Party moved that the two cases be severed and that separate decisions be issued for purposes of each complaint. Respondent opposed the motion; the General Counsel stated that I should exercise my discretion in the matter. I took the motion under advisement and authorized the parties to file briefs on the issue by 12 September.[2]

Briefs were thereafter filed by the Respondent and the Charging Party. After consideration, however, I concluded that the circumstances of the case were such that a ruling on the motion for severance was not ripe; at the time that we resumed (and completed) the case on 22 September, Respondent had not finished presenting its evidence, and I thought it possible that Respondent might raise an issue or issues in doing so that would make severance inappropriate. Consequently, I deferred ruling on the motion until completion of the hearing. I have further deferred ruling on the motion prior to the filing of briefs in these cases, on the theories (1) that Respondent is entitled to file a brief in a completed case; and (2) that Respondent's brief might contribute some contention or insight that would affect the decision regarding severance. Briefs were received from the parties about 3 November.

Sections 102.33 (d) and 102.35 (h) of the Board's Rules and Regulatins, Series 8, as amended, authorize administrative law judges to order the severance of proceedings prior to issuance of their decisions. This seems a proper situation in which to exercise that authority. Compare Quaker Tool & Die, Inc., 169 NLRB 1148 (1968), in which the Board did not deny the authority of an administrative law judge to sever and decide after hearing, but, rather, only disagreed with his decision to do so, given the facts before him.

In refusing to recognize and bargain with the Union and to furnish information to it, Respondent appears to be engaging in what is usually referred to as a "technical" refusal to bargain, based on the claim, already twice rejected by the Board, that the Union should not have been certified as the collective-bargaining representative in the first place. Respondent thus apparently intends to "test" the certification in a circuit court of appeals by refusing to acknowledge the validity of the Board's certification. E.g., NLRB v. San Jose Care & Guidance Center, 652 F.2d 856, 858 (9th Cir. 1981).[3]

Routinely, in a technical 8(a)(5) case free of other controverted issues, the General Counsel will file motion for summary judgment with the Board; the Board will issue a decision and order finding the employer quilty of a refusal to bargain (or of various refusals); the employer will not comply with the Board's cease-and-desist order; and the General Counsel will petition a court of appeals for enforcement of the Board's order. In what may be anticipated to be a reasonably brief period, the court of appeals will decide whether the Board's certification was faulty or valid. In the first event, there may be required a new hearing, further consideration by the Board, or a nullification of the whole proceeding. In the second case, the employer must (short of a petition for certiorari to the Supreme Court) bargain with the union. In the great majority of cases, the issue is joined and conclusively settled relatively quickly, and the union will either capitulate and decamp, mount another organizing effort, or exercise the court-affirmed right to represent the employees. This same likelihood of a quick disposition is, of course, even greater if it should eventuate that Respondent chooses not to seek judicial review, but merely to exhaust its avenues of relief solely before the Board.

The possibility of a fairly prompt resolution of the representation issue becomes much more problematical if it is, as here, joined together with disputed allegations of violations of other sections of the Act. It is a fair wager that a determination of the separable and fundamental refusal-to-bargain question will be delayed by its inclusion in the overall complaint. My own schedule suggests that I might not issue a decision on the entire matter until well into the first part of 1987;[4] it seems probable that exceptions and briefs will then be filed with the Board; the Board's busy docket, and unforeseeable internal disputes about the disposition of any one of the several issues presented by the case, may delay the Board's own

[3] Respondent has not, in so many words, stated that it was generally refusing to extend recognition and supply information solely for the reason that it was testing the validity of the certification, but that conclusion is inescapable. In its answer to paragraph 10 of the original complaint, which alleged that the Union has been the exclusive collective-bargaining agent of the employees since the 11 September 1985 election, Respondent "denie[d] that the Charging Union was selected by an uncoerced majority of its employees" in the election, that the Union had not been certified, and "hence has not since September 11, 1985, been the exclusive representative" of the employees. In answer to paragraph 16 of the complaint, which alleges that since 13 September 1985, Respondent has refused to bargain by unilaterally changing personnel practices and laying off employees, Respondent replied that it "is under no legal duty to bargain with the Charging Union and therefore denies that it has refused to bargain. . . ." These responses were substantially repeated in the answer filed to the consolidated complaint, and Respondent simply filed denials to the new paragraphs regarding the refusal of the May 1986 requests for bargaining and for information (other than to admit that the requests were made). However, in G.C. Exh. 20, Respndent's letter of 6 June 1986 replying to the Union's earlier requests to negotiate a contract and to receive information, counsel for Respondent, noting its pending motion for reconsideration before the Board in the representation case, stated, "Accordingly, we see no need to engage in negotiations with your organization or provide the information requested until this matter has been finally adjudicated and resolved."

Furthermore, in its interim brief on this point, Respondent, treating with the Charing Party's statement at the hearing that "there are no factual disputes and it [the validity of the certification] is clearly a legal conclusion," did not take issue with these assertions, but simply replied that it "remains unclear how such action [severance] will conserve the resources of the Board. It is also unclear exactly how such 'legal conclusion' is different from any of the other portions of the consolidated complaint from [sic] which these are no factual disputes. . . ." (emphasis added).

Finally, at no point in the hearing did Respondent make any claim or present any evidence (such as testimony that might tend to show that the Union already had the information requested) that would signify that it was raising any issues other than its contention that the election was subject to meritorious objections, and its most recent brief simply fails to refer to the May 1986 requests altogether.

decision for an unpredictable length of time; and the same may be true of any judicial review to follow.

The Respondent argues—indeed, it is basically Respondent's only argument—that severance of the cases would be at the expense of judicial economy. That is true, although the economics involved do not seem very large. But it appears to me that a more important value is implicated here. If one of the purposes of creating this administrative agency was to provide for a prompt resolution of questions of employees desire for representation, then it would stand to reason that severance of the two cases clearly seems to be the more certain way of achieving that goal, without prejudicing any other significant interest that comes to mind. The issue of the right to representation would quite likely be put to rest more quickly; the due process rights of the employer would be fully safeguarded; and the disposition of the remaining allegations would not be affected. See Jessie Beck's Riverside Hotel, 231 NLRB 907 (1977), 909 ("[A]s the alleged 8(a)(1) and (3) violations involved conduct occurring after the election and certification herein, which are the underpinnings of the 8(a)(5) and (1) violations alleged herein, we find that there was not abuse of discretion in the refusal to consolidate and that the Peyton Packing, [129 NLRB 1358 (1961)] and Jefferson Chemical [200 NLRB 992 (1972) precedents cited by the Respondent are distinguishable and inapposite.")

Despite the foregoing, however, this case may seem, at first glance, to present special problems. As noted earlier, the original complaint issued in Case 7–CA–25059 alleged that Respondent had refused to bargain collectively, in violation of Section 8(a)(5), "by unilaterally and without giving the Charging Party notice and affording it a meaningful opportunity to bargain" with respect to changes in enforcement of its personnel policies and laying off employees since 13 September. The Charging Party has not moved to sever this allegation as well. One of the issues underlying it is the basic duty of the Respondent to bargain, which, of course, implicates the validity of the election. If these allegations remain in the original complaint, and the other Case 7–CA–25973 8(a)(5) allegations are severed and treated as a separate proceeding, then, it may be argued, the validity of the election might be subject to testing in two different forums.

I do not see this as a real problem, however. If the motion for severance is granted and the Board and the Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit[5] should agree that Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(5) by generally refusing to bargain and by specifically refusing to provide information, it is difficult to conceive that Respondent might later petition for review of any other 8(a)(5) allegations found against it by the Board by searching out another circuit in which to file its petition and there attempt to raise again the propriety of the certification—not only would few courts tolerate such naked forum-shopping, but they would probably also hold that, on the underlying question of the validity of the representation election, the matter was res judicata.

It is, in short, my view that the motion for severance makes good sense and is a rational and healthy exercise of the flexibility intended to be a major characteristic of the administrative process. Accordingly, the motion is granted.

The record in this case shall consist of the official record in Case 7–RC–17730;[6] the charge in Case 7–CA–25059 dated 4 October 1985, and the amended and second amended charges in that case (received in evidence in the consolidated unfair labor practice hearing as the General Counsel Exhibits 1(a), 1(c), and 1(e)); the complaint and notice of hearing and Respondent's Answer thereto in Case 7–CA–25059 (received in evidence in the consolidated unfair labor practice hearing as the General Counsel Exhibits 1(g) and 1(i)); the charge in Case 7–CA–25973 dated 26 June 1986 and the "Order Consolidating Cases, Amended Complaint and Notice of Hearing" in Cases 7–CA–25059 and 7–CA–25973, and Respondent's answer thereto (received as G.C. Exhs. 1(u), 1(aa), and 1(cc)); General Counsel Exhibit 19, a letter from the Union to the Respondent dated 30 May 1986; and General Counsel Exhibit 20, a letter from the Respondent to the Union dated 6 June 1986.[7]

It is hereby ordered that the motion to sever Case 7–CA–25973 from Case 7–CA–25059 is granted; that the two cases shall henceforth be regarded as separate proceedings; and that separate recommended Decisions shall be rendered by the administrative law judge in each such proceeding.

[7] Although this letter might be read as simply a refusal to recognize and bargain until the Board had decided Respondent's motion for reconsideration filed that day, it also states that Respondent would not negotiate or provide information "until this matter has been finally adjudicated and resolved." If, by this, Respondent were only to mean that it did not intend to pursue its remedies beyond the level of the Board, that would be all the more reason to grant the Charging Party's motion.

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT refuse to bargain with Flint Local 282–C, Graphic Communications International Union, AFL–CIO (Union), as the exclusive collective-bargaining representative of the employees in the following bargaining unit:

> All full-time and regular part-time production and maintenance employees employed by Respondent at its facility at 4334 Airpark Drive, Standish, Michigan; but excluding office clerical employees, guards and supervisors as defined in the Act.

WE WILL NOT refuse to provide the Union with requested information necessary for, and relevant to, the Union's performance of its duties as the exclusive bargaining representative of the unit employees.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL, on request, bargain with the Union and put in writing and sign any agreement reached regarding terms and conditions of employment for our employees in the aforesaid bargaining unit.

WE WILL furnish the Union, as requested in its 30 May 1986 letter, the information necessary for, and relevant to, the performance of its duties as the exclusive bargaining representative of the employees in the bargaining unit.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 30 April 1984 the National Labor Relations Board issued a Decision and Order in this proceeding[1] in which the Board adopted the finding of the administrative law judge that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by certain of its statements to and conduct toward Union Steward Roberto Sanchez. The Board further found, in disagreement with the judge, that the Respondent did not violate Section 8(a)(3) of the Act by discharging Sanchez, that the strike in protest of Sanchez' discharge was not a protected unfair labor practice strike, and that the discharges of the strikers and refusal to reinstate them were not in violation of Section 8(a)(3). Subsequently, the Charging Parties petitioned the United States Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit to review and set aside the Board's Order. On 11 March 1986 the court of appeals issued its decision granting the petition for review, modifying the Board's Order to find that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) by discharging Sanchez, and providing for the reinstatement of Sanchez. The court remanded the case to the Board for further proceedings with respect to the 8(a)(3) claims of the striking employees.[2]

The Board accepted the court's remand and notified the parties that they could file statements of position concerning the issues the remand raised. The General Counsel, the Respondent, and the Charging Parties filed statements of position.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board accepts the court's opinion as the law of the case. The Board has considered the record as a whole in light of the court's decision and the statements of position on remand and now makes the following findings.

Both the Respondent's drivers and floorworkers have been represented by Teamsters Local 202 since 1959 under separate collective-bargaining agreements that provide for union stewards and arbitration, and contain valid no-strike and union-security clauses. Many provisions of the agreements, including the union-security clause, were not being enforced when Roberto Sanchez became shop steward in July 1980. The Respondent had a telling history of hostility to union activities and of harassment of stewards. After Sanchez became steward, he was threatened and assigned more onerous working conditions. Part-owner Abe Solomon asked Sanchez why he was organizing the workers and said that Solomon would fight Sanchez every day. Sanchez was told to advance his own money for tolls, contrary to prior company practice, and he was assigned to the night shift contrary to seniority rules. The Respondent also sent letters to the Union complaining about Sanchez' work performance. The Board found that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act by threatening, warning, and interrogating Sanchez and assigning him more onerous working conditions because of his protected concerted activity.[3] Despite this harassment, Sanchez filed over 45 grievances.

On 25 September 1981[4] Sanchez had an accident in one of the Respondent's trucks, which was damaged to the extent of $2300. After the incident Abe Solomon told Sanchez he was being suspended and sent him a copy of a letter to the Union indicating Sanchez was being suspended indefinitely. Later, on 2 October, Solomon told Union Agent Mogilnicki that the indefinite suspension would be for 2 weeks. Neither Solomon nor Mogilnicki told Sanchez or any of the employees that the indefinite suspension had been converted to a 2-week suspension.

Believing he had been discharged, on 5 October Sanchez and about 40 employees set up a picket line outside the Respondent's plant to protest the action taken against Sanchez. On 6 October the Respondent sent a letter to all these employees except Sanchez informing them that they were engaged in a wildcat strike and that they would be discharged unless they returned to work on 9 October. Eventually, all striking employees were offered unconditional reinstatement except Sanchez and former steward Elva Rodriguez and her sister.

As stated above, the court granted the petition for review with respect to Sanchez' claim that the Respondent discharged him in violation of Section 8(a)(3).[5] Pursuant to the court's remand, the single

[5] The court found that the unlawful actions taken against Sanchez culminated in his removal from the payroll on 25 September. The judge and the Board agreed there was a prima facie case that the Respondent's action was unlawfully motivated. The Board found, however, contrary to the judge, that the Respondent had satisfied its burden under Wright Line, 251 NLRB 1083 (1980), enfd. 662 F.2d 899 (1st Cir. 1981), cert. denied 455 U.S. 989 (1982), of establishing that it would have taken the action against Sanchez even in the absence of protected activity because of his issue before us is whether the striking employees were discharged in violation of Section 8(a)(3). We must first decide if the strike was prompted by the unlawful action taken against Sanchez on 25 September. We find that it was.

All the employee witnesses testified that they decided to strike in order to seek the reinstatement of Sanchez, an active shop steward. The employees' picket signs indicated they were striking because they wanted their shop steward put back to work. Since the court has found that Sanchez' discharge violated Section 8(a)(3), we find that the strike in protest thereof rendered the strikers unfair labor practice strikers.

The remaining issue is whether the strikers were engaged in protected concerted activity in spite of the no-strike clause in the collective-bargaining agreement.

In Mastro Plastics Corp. v. NLRB, 350 U.S. 270 (1956), the Supreme Court held that a no-strike clause in a collective-bargaining agreement does not waive the right to strike against an employer for unfair labor practices. In Arlan's Department Store, 133 NLRB 802 (1961), the Board limited this rule to apply only in cases of serious unfair labor practices. The Union herein made little or no effort to enforce the collective-bargaining agreement. With Sanchez gone the employees had "virtually no representation," as the judge found. 270 NLRB at 457. We find, in agreement with the judge, that the Respondent's attempt to deprive its employees of proper representation was a serious unfair labor practice within the meaning of Arlan's. See also Lustrelon, Inc., 242 NLRB 561, 570–571 (1979). Therefore, we find that the no-strike clause does not apply, that the strike was protected, that the Respondent's 6 October letter discharged the strikers in violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1), and that they are entitled to reinstatement and backpay in accord with Abilities & Goodwill, 241 NLRB 27 (1979).[6]

Inasmuch as the court has already reinstated the portions of the judge's recommended Order providing for the reinstatement of Sanchez, it is unnecessary to repeat them here. Rather, we shall adopt those parts of the judge's recommended Order dealing with the reinstatement and backpay of the discharged strikers.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the pertinent portions of the recommended Order of the administrative law judge set forth below and orders that the Respondent, Goodie Brand Packing Corp., Bronx, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging or otherwise discriminating against any of its employees because of their participation in protected strike activities.

(b) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) To the extent it has not already done so, offer Jose Rodriguez, Ana La Roche, Santia Rodriguez, Elva Rodriguez, Maria Luisa Rentas, Isabel Bank, Nancy Santana, Mariliez Torrez, Rafael Larracuente, Jose Suarez, Andres Tejada, Juanita Sedano, Natalio Santiago, Victor Negron, and Raul Robles immediate and full reinstatement to their former job or, if those jobs no longer exist, to substantially equivalent positions, and make them whole for their lost earnings in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the administrative law judge's decision.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the discharges of the employees named above in (a), and notify each of the discriminatees in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful discharges will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its New York, New York place of business, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[7] Copies of the notice, on forms prodriving mishap. The court rejected the Board's finding and concluded that while the evidence suggests that Sanchez was merely suspended for a week or two because of the driving mishap, it does not support a finding that Sanchez was discharged for the incident. Under the court's analysis, the Respondent failed to sustain its Wright Line burden, leaving intact the prima facie case of unlawful discipline of Sanchez for union activity. While the court made no specific finding regarding the date of Sanchez' discharge, the discharge must have commenced at the time of Sanchez' 25 September removal from the payroll, as found by the judge. Our conclusion as to the date of discharge is supported by the court's analysis recited above and its order that those portions of the judge's decision concerning the rehiring of Sanchez be reinstated. 785 F.2d 409, 415. This would necessarily include the judge's conclusions on the discharge date for the purpose of calculating Sanchez' backpay.

[6] Chairman Dotson would overrule Abilities & Goodwill, 241 NLRB 27 (1979), and would date the Respondent's backpay obligation to the discharged strikers from the time they made an unconditional offer to return to work.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND BABSON

On 19 May 1986 Administrative Law Judge James M. Kennedy issued the attached supplemental decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Applicant filed an answering brief in response to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the supplemental decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions only to the extent consistent with this Supplemental Decision and Order.

The complaint in the underlying proceeding alleged that the Applicant violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) of the Act by discharging Raymond Atkinson and Kenneth Dulaney because they were the subject of a grievance filed by the Union on their behalf and because of their union and other protected activities.

On 25 November 1985 the Board[1] adopted the judge's findings that Atkinson was a supervisor and that the General Counsel did not prove that the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(3) and (1) by discharging Atkinson and Dulaney. The judge based his finding that Atkinson was a supervisor on the fact that he was a foreman, received a premium wage, attended supervisory meetings, and independently assigned work to other employees. Even assuming Atkinson was not a supervisor, the judge also found that the General Counsel was unsuccessful in proving either that the Respondent unlawfully discharged Atkinson and Dulaney because of their participation in union and other protected activities or that their discharges were inherently destructive of their Section 7 rights. The Board adopted the judge's recommended Order and dismissed the complaint.

In his supplemental decision the judge correctly noted that under Section 504(a)(1) of the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA)[2] a prevailing party may receive an award for fees incurred in connection with an adversary adjudication involving an administrative agency unless the agency was "substantially justified." He further noted that Congress clarified that phrase as meaning "more than merely reasonable,"[3] observing, however, that EAJA is not designed to deter the Government from advancing in good faith close questions of law or fact.[4] The judge concluded that in the face of objective factors, i.e., title, wage, and duties, the General Counsel at all times should have known that Atkinson was a supervisor. The judge also found that the General Counsel should have realized that established Board law rejects the application of the "inherently destructive" theory to nonanimus job loss and that as to the application of the traditional theories for an unlawful discharge allegation she was missing vital elements in proving a violation. The judge therefore concluded that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in proceeding with the case and awarded the Applicant $16,489.34 plus any additions and expenses it may incur in pursuing this EAJA claim if the General Counsel filed exceptions to the judge's supplemental decision.

In her exceptions the General Counsel contends that she was substantially justified in bringing this case to the Board because the case turned on credibility issues[5] and inferences to be drawn from the facts.[6] The General Counsel argues that the judge erred in equating what he believed to be easily resolved credibility issues with the absence of such issues[7] and failing to draw reasonable inference from the General Counsel's evidence. We agree.

The facts in the underlying case are as follows. The Applicant does construction and maintenance work in the Seattle, Washington area. The Applicant's construction department employees (pipefitters) install heating and air-conditioning equipment in buildings under construction while the refrigeration department employees (refrigeration mechanics) do service and maintenance. Some new construction employees' work had been assigned, however, to the refrigeration department employees. Approximately 90 percent of this work was assigned to Atkinson and Dulaney.

United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada, Local No. 32 (the Union), separately represents the refrigeration mechanics and the pipefitters and had a collective-bargaining contract for each department. The Union's refrigeration department contract expired in 1982 and was not renegotiated. The Applicant also had a collective-bargaining contract (the National Agreement) with the Union's parent International Organization. In the absence of a contract with the refrigeration mechanics, the Applicant invoked what it assumed were its rights under the National Agreement to assign new construction work to refrigeration department employees at the refrigeration mechanics' pay scale.[8] The Union believed that new construction work was subject to its contract with the Applicant covering the pipefitters and that refrigeration mechanics doing new construction work should be paid the pipefitters' wage scale (an additional $1.57 per hour) for this work.

On 18 July 1983[9] the Union mailed a memorandum to its members in the refrigeration department asking them to keep track of the time spent doing construction work so that the Union could be sure that they were being paid the correct amount. Atkinson was then shop steward, but did not keep records or report problems to the Union. Sometime in August, Dulaney complained to Union Business Representative John Fitzgerald that he was not getting the higher pay for the construction work he was doing. When the situation continued into mid-November, Union Business Manager Floyd Sexton asked the Applicant for a step 2 grievance meeting in accord with the pipefitters' contract. He asserted that the Applicant had violated the contract by not paying the proper wages and fringe benefits on new construction work. The grievance did not name the affected employees. It also skipped step 1 that required direct discussion between the aggrieved employee and his immediate supervisor. Virgil Timmerman, the Applicant's vice president, was confused by the grievance since he did not consider the new construction work assigned to the refrigeration mechanics to be pipefitters' work.[10] Timmerman also insisted that, to be valid, the grievance must start at step 1. He and Sexton could not agree on this point. They had many conversations in 1983 and January 1984 about the new construction work, with Sexton insisting that the pipefitters' wage rate applied and Timmerman remaining adamant that the refrigeration mechanics' wage rate was applicable.

In early January Foreman Lyle Schramm, suspecting that the new construction work might be transferred to the pipefitters, made some notes about the desirability of retaining Atkinson if this occurred. His notes included a list of Atkinson's shortcomings and the observation that Atkinson "makes comments to his fellow employees that [the Applicant] is anti-union implying mistrust by using negative comments to induce mistrust." During this time the Applicant hired four refrigeration mechanics. In late January Timmerman decided to assign the new construction work to the pipefitters.[11] On January he issued a memorandum announcing the change, citing his inability to resolve the new work construction grievance as the reason. That afternoon the Applicant decided to discharge Atkinson and Dulaney.[12]

Schramm met with them individually and gave each of them a copy of the Timmerman memorandum and a termination slip along with their final checks. During his interview Schramm told Atkinson that there was nothing wrong with his work but answered "no" in response to Atkinson's question whether he could do service work. The "for cause" box was checked on Atkinson's termination slip. Dulaney had a similar interview with Schramm. Dulaney asked Schramm if the discharge was permanent or until the grievance was resolved. Schramm replied it was permanent. Schramm also refused to discuss the quality of Dulaney's work but agreed that Dulaney was a "good mechanic." Dulaney's termination slip, like Atkinson's, had the "for cause" box checked. Dulaney asked Schramm for an explanation. In response, Schramm wrote in the explanation section of the slip: "per grievance from Local 32."[13]

I. ATKINSON'S SUPERVISORY STATUS

In his supplemental decision the judge found that the only credibility question to be decided "was when, not if, Atkinson became the new construction foreman." The judge further found that the General Counsel was not reasonable in taking the position that Atkinson was not a supervisor, citing Atkinson's title, premium wage, duties, and Fitzgerald's admonition to Atkinson that under the contract he could not simultaneously hold the positions of foreman and steward. The judge noted that Atkinson denied having had supervisory status but concluded that "in the face of the foregoing objective factors his denial should not have been given controlling weight."

[10] The grievance did not describe the work involved.

[11] In a memorandum written at the time, he observed that if the new construction work was assigned to the pipefitters then the refrigeration mechanics doing this work would have to be let go.

Atkinson was hired by the Applicant in May 1978. He was hired as a service mechanic in the refrigeration department but was paid the foreman rate. The Applicant paid the higher rate to selected service mechanics in order to keep them from leaving. Atkinson began performing new construction work in 1982. In March 1983 Atkinson learned that he had been made foreman. About this time the Applicant discontinued the premium rate to service mechanics who were not foremen.

As foreman, Atkinson attended meetings of the construction department where he reported on the status of refrigeration work on construction projects and was advised of new projects that would involve new construction work. Atkinson did not assign work. Rather, assignments were made by the dispatcher. However, in February 1983, he did recommend that Dulaney be given the Bellevue Square job. In late November 1983 Atkinson was told by Union Business Representative Fitzgerald that he could not be both foreman and union steward and that the Union must elect a new steward. An election was held shortly thereafter with Dulaney selected as steward.

The General Counsel concedes that Atkinson held the title of foreman at the time he was discharged but contends that his supervisory status and not his job classification was the issue to be resolved by the judge's credibility findings. She further contends that the judge erred in finding that the General Counsel acted unreasonably in failing to recognize that "objective factors" nullified Atkinson's denial that he was a supervisor, the applicability of the factors being dependent on the judge's discrediting Atkinson's testimony and his adverse interpretation of the General Counsel's evidence. We agree.

In an EAJA case the judge does not resolve conflicting testimony in determining whether the General Counsel had substantial justification in issuing a complaint. This determination is made on the basis of the General Counsel's evidence alone.[14] Contrary to the judge, we find that the "objective factors" covering Atkinson's status on which he relied do not negate a finding that the General Counsel was reasonable in relying on Atkinson's denial that he was a supervisor to overcome Atkinson's testimony that he was not a supervisor.

Atkinson testified that except for attending construction department meetings, there was no change in his duties and authority after the Company made him a foreman in March 1983. The judge asserted that Atkinson's testimony was patently unbelievable in light of his title, premium wage, duties, and Union Representative Fitzgerald's statement that the Union's contract with the Company precluded Atkinson from holding both the positions of foreman and steward. There is no question but that the fact that Atkinson held the title of "foreman" does not, standing alone, establish that he was a supervisor.[15] Nor did his "premium wage," especially because this was not an increase over what he had received before becoming foreman and the Applicant had a history of paying a higher wage rate to keep skilled employees. Similarly misplaced was the judge's reliance on Atkinson's supervision of Dulaney on the Bellevue Square project. Atkinson's testified that, at the Applicant's behest, he recommended Dulaney for the Bellevue Square job. He further asserted that he did not supervise Dulaney on the job but only periodically checked to see how the work was progressing. Moreover, Dulaney began work at the Bellevue Square project in February 1983 before Atkinson was made a foreman. Finally, Fitzgerald's conclusion that Atkinson could not be a "foreman" and a steward does no more than suggest the possibility that the Union's business representative thought Atkinson might be a supervisor. Thus, we do not agree that the objective evidence was such that the General Counsel should have rejected Atkinson's assertion that the change in his title in March 1983 did not result in any change in his responsibilities such that he became a supervisor. Accordingly, we find that the General Counsel was substantially justified in accepting Atkinson's denial of supervisory status.

II. THE TRADITIONAL THEORIES

In issuing the complaint the General Counsel employed traditional theories for litigating an 8(a)(3) discharge, namely, that the Employer discharged the employee because of his union activities. In the underlying decision the judge found that the General Counsel failed to prove employer knowledge and animus, two essential components for an 8(a)(3) discharge allegation under the traditional theories. He found that there was no evidence that the Company knew that Atkinson and Dulaney had engaged in union activity or that it had animus against them for engaging in such activity.

[14] See, e.g., Carmel Furniture Corp., 277 NLRB 1105 (1985); Western Publishing Co., 276 NLRB 1566 (1985); Derickson Co., 270 NLRB 516 (1984).

In his supplemental decision the judge found that the General Counsel knew at the time the hearing in this case began that the Applicant was unaware that Atkinson and Dulaney had voiced complaints to the Union about being underpaid. He observed that although the Applicant knew that Atkinson and Dulaney would be the individuals discharged when the new construction work was transferred to the pipefitters, this was not the same as its knowing that they were engaged in union activity. As to the General Counsel's failure to prove animus, the judge noted that the collective-bargaining relationship between the Union and the Applicant had existed over a long period of time and that it continues to exist.

The judge further noted that the General Counsel does not contend that Applicant unlawfully breached the terms of its collective-bargaining contracts with the Union and concedes that the Applicant's decision to transfer the new construction work from the refrigeration mechanics to the pipefitters was lawful. He concludes that it was patently illogical for the General Counsel to find the transfer of work to be lawful and then to find unlawful the discharges of Atkinson and Dulaney that resulted from the transfer of that work. This inconsistent position, he maintained, was tantamount to an admission by the General Counsel that the discharges were not discriminatory and that she could not prove animus. The judge further found no merit in the General Counsel's contention that proof of animus could be sustained on the grounds that Atkinson and Dulaney had been union stewards; the Applicant had hired four refrigerator mechanics shortly before discharging Atkinson and Dulaney; and Schramm's testimony that Atkinson's accusation that the Applicant was antiunion had been considered by Schramm when he suggested that Atkinson be discharged. As to Schramm's note concerning Atkinson's accusation, the judge surmised that Schramm probably considered Atkinson to be a supervisor whose accusations could have had a disruptive effect on employees who believed him, but the judge concluded that in any event Schramm's belief was obviously a non sequitur and could not be a basis for concluding that the Applicant harbored animus. For reasons set forth below, we find that the General Counsel was substantially justified in alleging that the Applicant knew that Atkinson and Dulaney were engaged in union activities and had animus towards them for engaging these activities.

The judge erred in not considering the reasonable inferences that could have been drawn from the General Counsel's evidence. With respect to knowledge, the Applicant knew that Atkinson was the steward at the time the grievance originated and that Dulaney became the steward close to when the grievance was filed.[16] The Applicant's knowledge, combined with its awareness that Atkinson and Dulaney would be the employees most affected by a resolution of the grievance favorable to the Union, could have led the General Counsel to reasonably infer that the Applicant had concluded that Atkinson and Dulaney had complained to the Union about their wage rates and that they were instrumental in having the Union bring the grievance.

As to animus, we find that the judge also erred by failing to consider reasonable inferences from the General Counsel's evidence. Having concluded that the Applicant suspected that Atkinson and Dulaney had prompted the Union to file the grievance, it was reasonable for the General Counsel to infer that the Applicant blamed them for the hostility between it and the Union which the grievance generated. Moreover, Schramm admitted that Atkinson's accusation that the Applicant was antiunion was a consideration in having him discharged. Given this admission, it was reasonable for the General Counsel to infer that Schramm believe that Atkinson was a troublemaker, and that the Applicant's labor relations would be smoother without Atkinson and Dulaney, another bothersome steward. Finally, the Applicant had hired four refrigerator mechanics shortly before it discharged Atkinson and Dulaney, suggesting that refrigeration work was available. Its discharge of Atkinson and Dulaney rather than assigning them refrigeration work reasonably suggests that the Respondent was retaliating against them as a result of the Union's pursuit of the grievance.

III. THE INHERENTLY DESTRUCTIVE THEORY

Normally, to sustain a finding that an employer has committed an unfair labor practice in discharging an employee, the General Counsel has the burden of proving that the employer's decision was motivated by either a desire to discourage union membership or to interfere with the exercise of protected rights. In NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967), the Supreme Court recognized an exception to the requirement of proving unlawful motivation where the employer's conduct is "inherently destructive" of the employees' right to strike or engage in collective bargaining. Such conduct carries with it "'unavoidable consequences which the employer not only foresaw but which he must have intended' and thus bears 'its own indicia of intent.'"[17]

[16] Schramm testified that he was present at the meeting in late November or early December when Atkinson stepped down and Dulaney became the steward.

The General Counsel alleged that discharging Atkinson and Dulaney because they were involved with and were the subject of the grievance brought by the Union was inherently destructive and violated Section 8(a)(3). The judge in his underlying decision found no merit in this assertion. Citing Monarch Machine Tool Co., 227 NLRB 1880 (1977), and P. W. Supermarkets, 269 NLRB 839 (1984), he found that the Board has rejected this theory in the context of a nonanimus job loss related to a grievance. The judge further found that even assuming for purpose of argument that the inherently destructive theory was applicable to the discharges of Atkinson and Dulaney, the Respondent effectively rebutted the presumption of illegality by showing under the test set forth in Fleetwood[18] that the discharges had a substantial and legitimate business purpose.

In his EAJA decision the judge found that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in advancing this theory to sustain the allegation in the complaint, and that she should have recognized the similarity between Monarch Machine Tool Co. and P. W. Supermarkets and the instant case and withdrawn the "inherently destructive" portions of the complaint. The judge found that the General Counsel failed to consider whether the Applicant's compliance with the grievance constituted a substantial business justification within the meaning of Fleetwood Trailer Co. and, as such, rebutted the General Counsel's allegation that its act of discharging Atkinson and Dulaney was "inherently destructive."

Monarch Machine Tool Co. and P. W. Supermarkets are factually distinguishable from the case at bar.[19] In those cases the grievance resulted in economic losses to the employers who thus had a substantial business justification for laying off or discharging the employees in question. Such was not the situation here. The Union did not grieve that the new construction work be performed solely by pipefitters, but rather insisted that the employees who were assigned this work be paid the pipefitters' and not the refrigerators mechanics' wage scale. Hence, arguably the Company had no substantial business justification for discharging Atkinson and Dulaney because the cost to the Company was the same if the work was done by them or by the pipefitters. Accordingly, we find that the General Counsel was substantially justified in contending that the Applicant's discharge of Atkinson and Dulaney was "inherently destructive."

We find, therefore, that the General Counsel's case had a substantial basis in fact and law. Based on evidence that she had at the time and inferences that could be drawn from the evidence, it was "more than merely reasonable" for her to proceed with the case. Further, the fact that the General Counsel's evidence was ultimately found insufficient to prove the allegations against the Applicant does not lead automatically to a conclusion that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in proceeding against the Applicant. Accordingly, we shall deny the application for fees and expenses.

ORDER

It is ordered that the application of the Applicant, MacDonald Miller Company, Seattle, Washington, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act is denied.

SUPPLEMENTAL DECISION

Equal Access to Justice Act

JAMES M. KENNEDY, Administrative Law Judge. On November 25, 1985, the Board issued its Decision and Order in the above case[1] adopting the conclusions and recommendation for dismissal set forth in my decision of August 16, 1985. Thereafter, pursuant to the Equal Access to Justice Act (EAJA), 5 U.S.C. § 504, MacDonald Miller Company (the Applicant), Respondent therein, filed on December 19, 1985, an application for an award of fees and other expenses of litigation. The Board transferred the application to me for ruling on December 26, 1985. On January 8, 1986, the General Counsel moved to dismiss with respect to certain perceived shortcomings in the Applicant's net worth statement and other eligibility matters. On January 15, 1986, I conducted a conference call with the parties and subsequently the Applicant filed a motion to amend its application. The proposed amendment corrected the apparent deficiencies seen by the General Counsel, dropped certain precomplaint reimbursement claims, and added a claim for fees incurred in opposing the General Counsel's exceptions to my decision, and a claim for work in seeking reimbursement, both of which it had previously omitted. As a result of these corrections, I granted the Applicant's motion to amend its claim and denied the General Counsel's motion to dismiss on February 3, 1986. On March 3, 1986, the General Counsel filed its answer to the application supporting it by a memorandum. On March 14, 1986, the [19] While it would have been desirable for the General Counsel in the underlying case to have included in its brief a comparison of Monarch Machine Tool Co. and P. W. Supermarkets and the instant proceeding, as well as a consideration of the Applicant's alleged substantial business justification defense to the "inherently destructive" allegation, we find that her failure to do so does not affect our conclusion that the General Counsel was substantially justified in relying on the "inherently destructive" doctrine in issuing the complaint.

Applicant filed a reply. The matter is not ripe for decision.

I. FACTS ESTABLISHED BY THE PLEADINGS

The pleadings first establish that at the time the complaint was issued the Applicant was a mechanical contractor having a net worth of slightly more than $3 million operating from two locations (Seattle and Anchorage) and having 137 employees in various stated job classifications. It had no affiliated businesses. The General Counsel, therefore, admits that the Applicant meets the EAJA eligibility standards, and I so find.

Second, the General Counsel admits that the Applicant is a prevailing party within the meaning of EAJA insofar as the complaint alleged that the Applicant had discharged two employees in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act. Specifically, the General Counsel admits that it failed to prove that Raymond Atkinson was a statutory employee and also failed to prove that Atkinson and Kenneth Dulaney were unlawfully discharged.

II. SUBSTANTIAL JUSTIFICATION

Under Section 504(a)(1) of EAJA a party prevailing in litigation before a Government agency is entitled to an award of attorney's fees and expenses incurred in connection with that litigation unless the Government can show that its position was "substantially justified." In 1985, the Congress amended EAJA to clarify, but not change, the definition of the phrase, "substantially justified." That phrase means "more than merely reasonable." See H.R. Rep. 99–120 at 9 (1985). See also Penco, Inc., 278 NLRB 1095 (1986). At the same time, however, EAJA is not designed to deter the Government from advancing in good faith close questions of law or fact. Shellmaker, Inc., 267 NLRB 20, 21 (1983).

The Applicant contends that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in issuing the complaint; contrariwise, the General Counsel contends that it was. After carefully analyzing the factual pattern presented here, I conclude that the Applicant's position should be sustained. The General Counsel approached this case with three different theories. The first was a reliance on the "inherently destructive" doctrine. The second and third theories can be combined for our purposes as the traditional unlawful discharge theory requiring the General Counsel to establish each of four elements to prove her case: the employee engaged in protected conduct, the employer's knowledge that the employee had engaged in such conduct, animus against the employee for doing so, all followed by a discharge. With respect to Atkinson, however, an additional issue was raised, whether he was an employee subject to the Act's protections or a supervisor unprotected by the Act.

The facts of this case were not in significant dispute. The only credibility question that was decided was when, not if, Atkinson became the new construction foreman. Even that matter was not particularly significant to the decision as his discharge occurred at least 2 months after he had been made foreman under his version. Contrary to his testimony, I found, however, that he had become foreman some 9 months before.

In any event, Atkinson and Dulaney were simultaneously discharged on January 25, 1984, when the Applicant transferred certain refrigeration construction work from its refrigeration department to its construction department. The Union represented employees in both departments, but in separate collective-bargaining units. Atkinson and Dulaney were in the refrigeration department. The Applicant had traditionally assigned new construction refrigeration work to employees in that department, particularly to those two individuals. Refrigeration department employees had previously enjoyed benefits paid under the so-called refrigeration contract. That contract specifically permitted refrigeration department employees to perform the new construction refrigeration work. When it was not renewed, for reasons not fully explained in the record, the Union asserted that individuals who were assigned that work should be paid under the construction contract. That would require a pay increase of $1.57 per hour as the construction contract did not incorporate the lower refrigeration rate. In furtherance of that aim, the Union filed on November 23, 1983, a step 2 grievance under the construction contract alleging that the Applicant was not paying the construction rate to individuals performing new construction refrigeration work. Neither Atkinson nor Dulaney was specifically named in the grievance. Unable to persuade the Union that it was privileged to assign the work as it always had, the Applicant, on January 25, 1984, transferred the work from the refrigeration department to the construction department, simultaneously discharging those two individuals. Each was given a copy of a company memo that referred to the company president's inability to resolve the grievance in the Applicant's favor and directed the work be transferred. When Dulaney asked for further explanation, his supervisor wrote on his termination slip that the discharge was "per grievance from Local 32."

The evidence also showed that Atkinson had been the Union's steward in the refrigeration department until late November or early December 1983 when the Union ordered him replaced. Atkinson, however, had never been an active steward and had never advised any of the Applicant's officials regarding his view of the grievance. After Dulaney's accession to stewardship, he did nothing about it either, preferring to rely on the previously filed institutional grievance. Both had, however, given the union officials some information with respect to their being assigned refrigeration construction work. Their cooperation, however, was unknown to the Applicant.

The Inherently Destructive Theory: The General Counsel's first theory was that because the Applicant admitted that Atkinson and Dulaney were discharged because of the Union's grievance, such an admission constituted a "per se" violation of the Act. Her representatives pointed to a line of Supreme Court cases following the "inherently destructive" doctrine including NLRB v. Erie Resistor Corp, 373 U.S. 221 (1963); NLRB v. Great Dane Trailers, 388 U.S. 26 (1967); and NLRB v. Fleetwood Trailer Co., 389 U.S. 375 (1967)

The General Counsel performed no analysis of the doctrine or why it applied to the facts of this case. The doctrine principally applies to an employer's treatment of strikers. Moreover, the doctrine has respectably been described as requiring evidence both bearing its own indicia of intent and having far-reaching effects, such as hindering future bargaining or discriminating solely on the basis of participation in strikes or union activity. Portland-Willamette Co. v. NLRB, 534 F.2d 1331, 1334 (9th Cir. 1976). Here there was no strike and the union activity was minimal. Moreover, the discharge on its face was not based solely on that supposed activity; it had another visible motive, compliance with a grievance. Finally, the inherently destructive theory is not without limits. In American Ship Building Co. v. NLRB, 380 U.S. 300, 309, 313 (1965), the Supreme Court had said that employees who exercise Section 7 rights do not immunize themselves from economic disadvantage—"where the intention . . . is merely to bring about a settlement of a labor dispute on favorable terms, no violation of Section 8(a)(3) is shown." Indeed, the Board has applied traditional analysis, not "inherently destructive" analysis, in a nonanimus job loss arising in a similar grievance context. Monarch Machine Tool Co., 227 NLRB 1880 (1977). The General Counsel seems to have been unaware of Monarch at the time it issued this complaint. Yet, less than a week after issuance, the Board decided P. W. Supermarkets, 269 NLRB 839 (1984), reaffirming Monarch and refusing to apply the "inherently destructive" doctrine to yet another nonanimus job loss arising from a grievance. Had the General Counsel been acting reasonably, he would have recognized the similarity between Monarch, P. W. Supermarkets, and the instant case. At the time P. W. Supermarkets was decided, 9 months still remained before this hearing was to open. Her representatives should have used that time to reflect on the similarities of the cases and should have withdrawn the "inherently destructive" portions of the complaint.

The Board, of course, agreed that the inherently destructive theory had no application to this fact pattern. But assuming it did, Fleetwood holds that if the employer can show a "substantial business justification" for its conduct, even that theory can be rebutted. Here there is no evidence that the General Counsel ever considered whether the Applicant's compliance with the Union's grievance would constitute a "substantial business justification" within the meaning of Fleetwood. Two of the Board's panel members agreed with me that it would. Member Babson said it was unnecessary to decide the question for the matter did not fall into the inherently destructive category in the first place. Yet, the point here is that the General Counsel thought it did, but failed to consider the Applicant's obvious defense as having any merit whatsoever.

Thus, on two fronts the General Counsel's representatives failed to act reasonably in advancing this theory: (1) they failed to recognize established law as rejecting the theory in the context of a nonanimus job loss related to a grievance, and (2) they failed even to consider a self-evident defense.

The Traditional Theories: Yet, the General Counsel must have recognized that the inherently destructive theory might not succeed for her representatives included two alternate, but traditional theories. They alleged that Atkinson and Dulaney had been discharged because of their union activities or because of their protected concerted activities. As noted above, however, four elements of proof are required. The most significant element is animus. Animus, of course, is established by evidence suggesting that an employer has an unlawful reason for the discharge—usually to discourage union or other protected concerted activities. Here, the record is remarkably devoid of any such evidence. First, the collective-bargaining relationship between the Applicant and the Union is a mature one, having existed for many years and through many contracts in at least two bargaining units. Although the refrigeration contract seems now to have come to an end, the General Counsel has not accused the Applicant of engaging in any unlawful activity with respect to its demise. Simultaneously, of course, the Applicant continues to have an ordinary relationship with the Union with respect to its construction bargaining unit. Second, there is no evidence of any independent 8(a)(1) conduct. Third, the Applicant has not been accused of unlawfully breaching any term of a collective-bargaining agreement. Fourth, and most significant, the General Counsel has always conceded that the Applicant's decision to transfer the work from the refrigeration department to the construction department to be lawful. Frankly, I have never understood the General Counsel's logic here. If the discharge of the two individuals was unlawful, as she contends, and if the discharge was the direct result of the transfer of work, why would she not also have alleged that the work transfer itself was unlawful? It seems to me that the concession that the transfer of work was lawful is tantamount to an admission that persons who lost employment as a result of that transfer were not victims of discrimination. To me the General Counsel's inconsistent position here is a direct concession that no animus could be proven.

The General Counsel, nonetheless, has argued vigorously that animus should be inferred from other facts. Her representative notes that Atkinson and Dulaney either were or had been union stewards; she notes that four individuals had been hired shortly before their discharge; and she makes a final observation with respect to the amount of nonconstruction work that these two individuals had performed, stating that similar amounts of work remained to be performed.

Yet, it is well settled that, standing alone, the discharge of a steward is not evidence of union animus;[2] neither is the fact that Respondent had recently hired others. Likewise, the availability of other work does not necessarily carry with it the suggestion of illegal motive. Finally, the General Counsel points to a rather obscure personal note made by Supervisor Schramm regarding Atkinson. Schramm said that he believed Atkinson was accusing the company of being antiunion and weighed that against Atkinson in deciding to let him go. Schramm no doubt considered Atkinson to be a supervisor. That being the case, he could see that Atkinson's accusations were inconsistent with his supervisory responsibilities and might well have a disruptive effect on employees who believed him. In any event, Schramm's belief was obviously a non sequitur and cannot be a basis for concluding that Respondent harbors animus.

Thus, it is clear that at all times the General Counsel either knew or should have known that she did not have in her possession any proof of the critical element of animus to support a traditional violation of Section 8(a)(3).

In addition, however, the General Counsel also knew that the Applicant was unaware that Atkinson and Dulaney had ever voiced any complaints to the Union regarding the wage rates they were being paid. On the first day of the hearing the General Counsel's representative conceded that she could not prove the Applicant's knowledge. Subsequently, her concession was borne out for the General Counsel never did. That is not the same as proving that the Applicant knew that Atkinson and Dulaney would be the individuals who would be discharged. Obviously, the Applicant knew that. But to know who the dischargees were going to be is not the same as saying that the Applicant also knew that they had engaged in protected activity.

Thus, the General Counsel did not have evidence of two of the four critical elements to support a traditional violation of Section 8(a)(3) and (1). Even evidence of the first element, union or protected activity, is scant.

Finally, had there been evidence of all four elements with respect to Dulaney, the General Counsel was unable to prove that Atkinson was a statutory employee. The General Counsel knew that Atkinson had become a foreman at least as late as November 1984. It also knew that the Applicant was contending that Atkinson had been made foreman much earlier. Indeed, the General Counsel knew that the Union considered Atkinson to be a statutory supervisor for it had directed him in November 1984 to relinquish his stewardship duties in favor of another. Moreover, Atkinson was paid the foreman wage and could readily be seen as supervising Dulaney in his work at the Bellevue Square project. Thus, it appears that the General Counsel at all times had reason to think that Atkinson was a statutory supervisor rather than an employee, by virtue of his title, his wage, and his duties. It is true that Atkinson denied his supervisory status but in the face of the foregoing objective factors his denial should not have been given controlling weight.

In conclusion, I find that the General Counsel acted unreasonably in pursuing this complaint. Recently the Board affirmed Administrative Law Judge Jerrold H. Shapiro who found a lack of substantial justification in a successorship case where the General Counsel proceeded knowing that he was without proof of one of the elements constituting a violation, i.e., whether the union enjoyed majority status of the successor's employees even though some of those employees had not been on the payroll of the predecessor at the time of the transfer. Evergreen Lumber Co., 278 NLRB 656, 661 (1986). In Evergreen the General Counsel, as here, failed properly to assess the existing law as it applied to the theory of the case. In some ways this case more strongly favors the Applicant because here the law was against the General Counsel on one theory, not just pregnantly silent as in Evergreen. Accordingly, following the teaching of Evergreen, I conclude that the General Counsel was not substantially justified in proceeding with this case. The law was against her on one theory and she was missing the elements of a violation in proceeding on the other.[3]

The General Counsel has not argued that there are special circumstances justifying the issuance of this complaint and I am unable to perceive any. Neither does the General Counsel argue that it was attempting to advance the development of the law as suggested in Shellmaker, supra.

III. THE AWARD

In its application, as amended, the Applicant seeks reimbursement for attorneys' fees and expenses incurred after June 4, 1984, including fees and expenses for time spent pursuing the EAJA application itself. In support of its claim it has submitted itemized billings demonstrating that its law firm expended 209.2 hours in both matters. At the statutory rate of $75 per hour, the attorneys' fees total $15,690. In addition, it claims expenses of $799.34 for a combined total of $16,489.34. The General Counsel has not opposed these figures as unreasonable and I find them to be proper.[4]

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. The Applicant is a prevailing party within the meaning of EAJA and meets the eligibility requirements of EAJA.

2. The position of the General Counsel in issuing and in prosecuting the complaint in this case was not substantially justified nor were there special circumstances that would make an award of attorneys' fees and expenses unjust.

3. The Applicant is entitled to attorneys' fees and expenses totaling $16,489.34, plus any additional fees and expenses that it may incur in pursuing this EAJA claim in the event the General Counsel files exceptions to this supplemental decision.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[5]

ORDER

It is recommended that the application of the Applicant, MacDonald Miller Company, Seattle, Washington, for an award under the Equal Access to Justice Act be granted.

---

[3] See also the analysis of reasonableness set forth in De Bolt Transfer, 271 NLRB 299, 302–303 (1984).

[4] Legal fees incurred in pursuing claims under EAJA are clearly recoverable. Evergreen Lumber Co., supra.

[5] If no exceptions are filed as provided by Sec. 102.46 of the Board's Rules and Regulations, the findings, conclusions, and recommended Order shall, as provided in Sec. 102.48 of the Rules, be adopted by the Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

IT IS FURTHER RECOMMENDED that the Applicant be awarded the sum of $16,489.34, plus any fees and expenses that it may occur in pursuing its application in response to any exceptions that the General Counsel may choose to file.

Case 2–CA–17955

21 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND STEPHENS

On 14 September 1982 Administrative Law Judge Steven B. Fish issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed an answering brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.

The judge found the Respondent violated both Section 8(a)(1) and Section 8(a)(3) by discharging employee Cheryl Resnick for the following reasons: (1) because she complained to other employees, and to the Respondent, about a change the Respondent made in its lunch hour policy; (2) because she contacted the United States Department of Labor regarding the change; and (3) because the Respondent mistakenly believed Resnick had engaged in union activities. In finding that Resnick engaged in "concerted activities" within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, the judge relied in part on the Board's decision in Alleluia Cushion Co., 221 NLRB 999 (1975). Since the judge's decision in this case issued, however, the Board overruled Alleluia in Meyers Industries (Meyers I)[2] and set forth a definition of "concerted activities" under which individual activity generally must be "engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself."[3] The Board recently reaffirmed its definition in Meyers II.[4] Pursuant to the Meyers decisions, we adopt the judge's conclusions, but only for the following reasons.

I.

The Respondent operates a New York City hotel and hired Cheryl Resnick in May 1980. All the Respondent's employees are represented by one of five different unions except those employees who work in the Respondent's executive office, accounting department, and front desk and reservation department. Resnick applied for a position as combination switchboard operator (a union-represented classification) and reservations clerk (an unrepresented classification). When interviewed, Resnick adamantly objected to becoming affiliated with, or a member of, any union. Consequently, the Respondent's president and chief operating officer, Willis Dadukian, who interviewed Resnick, had Resnick assigned to more hours as reservations clerk than as switchboard operator.[5]

In December 1980 the Respondent changed its lunch hour policy. Previously, the Respondent permitted its reservation desk employees to forgo their lunch hour and leave an hour early or report to work an hour later. In December it decided that it would require all employees to take a lunch hour break and work their entire shift. Although the policy change was to apply to all employees, Front Office Manager Chris LaPenta, who announced the change, indicated that only women were required to take the break. LaPenta testified that he at first told the employees "everybody ha[s] to take it." When employees asked LaPenta why, LaPenta responded, "Because it's the law. And women have to take a lunch hour."

According to LaPenta, "everybody balked" at the change and was "all up in arms." Employees, including Resnick, complained among themselves about the change, and Resnick and most of the others complained directly to LaPenta. Resnick proved to be the most vocal complainer.

Later, Resnick called the United States Department of Labor and asked whether the Respondent's new policy was lawful. The department told Resnick it was unlawful to apply the policy only to women and Resnick told this to LaPenta. LaPenta said he "stood corrected," and that "from then on everybody was taking lunch hours." Resnick also told Resident Manager Kurt Thomas what she learned.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

In sec. II, par. 15, of his decision, the judge erroneously stated employee Cheryl Resnick was assigned to fill in for employee Margaret Dean on 25 December 1980. The correct date is 27 December.

[5] The General Counsel has not alleged that Resnick's assignment violated the Act.

There is no evidence that any employees knew in advance that Resnick would call the department or that they authorized her to call on their behalf.

The Respondent decided to discharge Resnick in mid-December. Both LaPenta and Dadukian testified that at least one of the reasons for the Respondent's decision was Resnick's resentment towards, and complaints about, the Respondent's lunch hour policy. They decided to defer discharging her, however, because the holiday season was approaching, making it difficult to find a replacement.

On 28 January 1981 Dadukian called Thomas to his office and asked him if he had "heard of Cheryl's union activities." Thomas said he had not and asked Dadukian, "[W]ho told you[?]" Dadukian replied that it was Vito Marasio, who was present in the room. Dadukian told Thomas to "[g]et rid of" Resnick. Thomas asked, "On what grounds?" Dadukian replied, "Tell her she's incompetent."

Later that day LaPenta convinced Dadukian to delay Resnick's discharge to give LaPenta an opportunity to see if her replacement would "work out."

The Respondent, however, erroneously issued Resnick a severance paycheck along with her regular paycheck shortly after Dadukian's agreement. When Resnick asked LaPenta and Thomas about the checks, Thomas told her she was being discharged because she was incompetent. Resnick said she "didn't buy that," and LaPenta then told her, "Well, I'm the one with the big mouth. I'm going to tell you that you were let go because of union activity."

Resnick remained employed for several more weeks. During this period LaPenta told employees Thomas Castner and Maurice Azzopardi several times that Resnick was being discharged for "trying to form a union."

Resnick was discharged 22 February 1981. A separation report prepared for her discharge indicated she was discharged for insubordination.

In March employee Castner filed a wage and hour complaint with the Department of Labor. When Dadukian learned of the claim, he told Castner he was displeased with Castner's work performance and had heard that Castner had been complaining about his job and job conditions. Dadukian also said he "cannot tolerate" the Department of Labor being at the hotel to investigate Castner's complaint. Dadukian stated he would "deal" with Castner having called the department "severely." Dadukian also said, "I got rid of Cheryl because of her activity with the union, and . . . [I am] more than looking forward to" fighting "the unions." Dadukian said he would "get rid" of Castner as well. There is no evidence that any union or union activity played any part in Castner's call.[6]

The judge found, and we agree, that the Respondent discharged Resnick because she complained to other employees, and to the Respondent, about the change the Respondent made in its lunch hour policy; because she contacted the Department of Labor; and because the Respondent mistakenly believed she had engaged in union activity. An employer clearly violates the Act by discharging an employee whom the employer mistakenly believes has engaged in union activity.[7] In this case, however, that was not the Respondent's only reason for discharging Resnick. For the reasons set forth below, we find further unlawful motivation for Resnick's discharge.

II.

The Respondent contends that Resnick's complaints to other employees, her complaints to the Respondent, and her call to the Department of Labor are not "concerted activities" within the meaning of Section 7. Accordingly, the Respondent argues, Resnick's discharge did not violate the Act. We do not agree.

In Meyers I the Board held that individual activity will generally be concerted only when it is "engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself."[8] In Meyers II the Board made clear that its definition encompassed "activity which in its inception involves only a speaker and a listener, for such activity is an indispensable preliminary step to employee self-organization."[9] The Board further noted, however, that the communication of speaker to listener must appear calculated to induce, prepare for, or otherwise relate to some kind of group action.[10] Resnick's complaints to other employees fit precisely into this category of concerted activity.

Moreover, under the facts of this case, Resnick's complaints cannot be considered in isolation.[11] Al-

Member Johansen would find that a discussion between two or more employees regarding terms and conditions of employment is necessarily concerted activity because it is an "indispensable preliminary step to employee self-organization." Member Johansen would not further require that the discussion otherwise appear calculated to induce or prepare for group action, or that it otherwise be relate . to group action.

though there is no evidence that the Respondent's employees explicitly agreed to act together to change the Respondent's new lunch hour policy, they did at least tacitly agree that they had a grievance and that they should take it up with management.[12] Thus, Office Manager LaPenta testified that "everybody balked" at the new policy and was "all up in arms." The employees complained among themselves and most, including Resnick, brought the complaint directly to LaPenta. Accordingly, we find the employees were engaged in a concerted effort to convince the Respondent to change its lunch hour policy.[13] Resnick's complaints to other employees, as well as her individual complaints to the Respondent, were part of that concerted effort.[14]

We also find Resnick's call to the Department of Labor concerted under the facts of this case. Her call logically grew out of the employees' concerted efforts and is therefore a "continuation" of that concerted activity.[15]

Because we find that Resnick's activity was concerted and that she acted for the employees' mutual aid or protection, we conclude that Section 7 protected her activities[16] and that the Respondent's retaliatory discharge of her violated Section 8(a)(1).[17]

We find Resnick's discharge for calling the Department of Labor unlawful for the additional reason that, as the judge found, Dadukian confused or associated the Department of Labor with union activity. In support of his conclusion, the judge cited Dadukian's hearing testimony in which Dadukian seemed confused about the distinction. We agree, and draw further support for that conclusion from Dadukian's threats to employee Castner after Dadukian learned that Castner had called the department on another matter. As discussed above, when Dadukian learned of Castner's call, he told Castner, "I got rid of Cheryl [Resnick] because of her activity with the union, and . . . [I am] more than looking forward to" fighting "the unions." There was no indication that any union or union activity played any part in Castner's call. Thus, like the Respondent discharging Resnick in part because it mistakenly believed she was involved in union activity, its discharging her for calling the Department of Labor, which the Respondent associated with union activity, is similarly unlawful.

[17] The Chairman contends we have "resurrect[ed] the Alleluia presumption that individual actions regarding 'group concerns' are concerted." The Chairman made a similar contention in Every Woman's Place, 282 NLRB 413 (1986). As we stated in Every Woman's Place, the Board in Alleluia required no demonstration of common complaints; it assumed that any complaint to a government agency that could benefit others automatically qualified as a common concern. Here, however, as in Every Woman's Place, we need not rely on an assumption. The employees spoke for themselves and Resnick advanced their common interest with her call.

The Chairman also contends there is no evidence "that the Respondent knew of the alleged concerted nature of the call." To the extent we require such a showing, we find that the evidence overwhelmingly establishes it here. The Respondent knew that "everybody balked" at its new lunch hour policy and was "all up in arms." Employees complained among themselves and most brought the complaint to Front Office Manager LaPenta. Resnick told her managers, including LaPenta, that she had made the call and LaPenta clearly understood Resnick's purpose. Resnick told LaPenta that the department told her it would be unlawful to apply the new policy only to women, as LaPenta indicated when he announced the new policy, and LaPenta told Resnick that he "stood corrected." Accordingly, the Respondent knew both that its employees concertedly sought to change its policy and that Resnick's call was part of that effort.

AMENDED CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

Substitute the following for Conclusion of Law 2.

"2. By discharging and refusing to reinstate Cheryl Resnick for concertedly complaining to other employees and to the Respondent about a change the Respondent made in its lunch hour policy, and by discharging and refusing to reinstate Resnick for contacting the United States Department of Labor as a continuation of her and her fellow employees' concerted complaints, the Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act."

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent, Salisbury Hotel, Incorporated, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(a).

"(a) Discharging and refusing to reinstate any employee for concertedly complaining to other employees, and to the Respondent, and discharging and refusing to reinstate any employee for contacting the United States Department of Labor as a continuation of the employee's and other employees' concerted complaints."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(d).

"(d) Post at its place of business in New York, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[18] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

CHAIRMAN DOTSON, concurring.

While I do not agree with my colleagues' finding that Cheryl Resnick's call to the Labor Department constituted concerted activity, I agree, as explained below, that the Respondent's discharge of Resnick violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The judge found, and I agree, that the Respondent discharged Resnick for three reasons: (1) because of her complaints to employees and management about the change in the Respondent's lunch hour policy; (2) because of her call to the Labor Department regarding the legality of the change; and (3) because of the Respondent's mistaken belief that she had engaged in union activities. I also agree with my colleagues that Resnick's complaints to employees and management about the change in lunch hour policy constituted concerted activity within the Meyers[1] definition and that therefore the Respondent could not lawfully discharge Resnick for this activity. Further, I agree with my colleagues that the Respondent was not privileged to discharge Resnick because of its mistaken belief that Resnick was engaging in union activities.

I disagree, however, with my colleagues' finding that Resnick's call to the Labor Department constituted concerted activity and thus evidenced further unlawful motivation for the discharge. Rather, I find that the record fails to establish that Resnick's call was "engaged in with or on the authority of other employees, and not solely by and on behalf of the employee himself."[2]

My colleagues admit that there is no evidence that any employees knew in advance that Resnick would call the Labor Department or that they authorized her to call on their behalf. Nor is there evidence that Resnick made the call in an attempt to initiate, induce, or prepare for group action or that the Respondent knew of the alleged concerted nature of the call—a necessary element to establish a violation.

Yet, despite this lack of evidence, my colleagues make the finding of concerted activity, stating simply that "[h]er call logically grew out of the employees' concerted efforts and is therefore a 'continuation' of that concerted activity." This finding, made totally without regard to the record evidence, effectively resurrects the Alleluia[3] presumption that individual actions regarding "group concerns" are concerted, despite the Board's laying it to rest in its Meyers decision. As I have recently cautioned, the Board's continual creation of legal fictions as functional substitutes for record evidence runs contrary to the statutory scheme. See the dissenting opinion in Every Woman's Place, 282 NLRB 413 (1986).

In my opinion, the evidence establishes merely that Resnick, of her own accord, sought information from the Labor Department and, of her own accord, reported her findings to management. Accordingly, I find that the General Counsel has failed to establish that Resnick's action was concerted.

In sum, of the three reasons that motivated Resnick's discharge, I have found two of them to be unlawful and one to be lawful. However, applying the dual-motive analysis required by Wright Line,[4] I find that the Respondent did not establish that it would have discharged Resnick in the absence of the unlawful reasons.

The Respondent could escape being held in violation of the Act only by proving by a preponderance of the evidence that even absent the improper motives, it would have discharged Resnick in any event for her call to the Labor Department. The Respondent's defense, however, consisted of an enumeration of reasons for discharging Resnick, all of which were discredited by the judge.

The Respondent never attempted to establish that Resnick's discharge was justified by her call to the Labor Department. In fact, the Respondent contended that the call was not the motivation for the discharge. Under these circumstances, although the discharge was in fact motivated in part by the call to the Labor Department, the Respondent has failed to establish that it would have discharged Resnick for this activity absent the unlawful reasons found for her discharge, namely her concerted complaints about the lunch hour policy and her supposed union activities. Accordingly, I find that her discharge was violative of Section 8(a)(1) and (3).

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

WE WILL NOT discharge any of you for concertedly complaining to other employees and to us and WE WILL NOT discharge any of you for contacting the United States Department of Labor as a continuation of your and other employees' concerted complaints.

WE WILL NOT discharge or otherwise discriminate against any of you because we believe that you have engaged in union activities.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Cheryl Resnick immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from her discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL notify her that we have removed from our files any reference to her discharge and that the discharge will not be used against her in any way.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

STEVEN B. FIST, Administrative Law Judge. Pursuant to charges filed by Cheryl Resnick (Resnick or the Charging Party) the Acting Regional Director of the National Labor Relations Board for Region 2, issued a complaint and notice of hearing on May 5, 1981.[1] The complaint alleges in substance that Salisbury Hotel, Incorporated (Respondent) discharged its employee, Cheryl Resnick about February 22, because she made complaints to the Department of Labor about Respondent's lunch hour policy and to discourage employees from engaging in such activities and other concerted activities and because of its belief that Resnick joined, supported, or assisted a Union, and in order to discourage employees from engaging in such activities, in violation of Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

The hearing with respect to the violations encompassed by the complaint, was heard before me in New York, New York on April 26 and 27, 1982. Briefs have been received from the General Counsel and Respondent and have been duly considered.

On the entire record, including my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent, a New York corporation, is engaged in the operation of a hotel providing food and lodgings for guests. During the past year, Respondent derived gross revenues from its operations in excess of $500,000, and purchased and received at its facility, goods and materials valued in excess of $50,000 directly from points outside the State of New York. Respondent admits and I so find, that it is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. FACTS

Respondent employs approximately 75 to 80 employees. Of these employees about 65 are represented by five different unions, covering various job categories such as maids, housemen, switchboard operators, engineers, and painters. The only employees not represented by unions are those employed in Respondent's executive office, accounting department, and the front desk and reservations department.

Resnick was hired by Respondent in May 1980. She was interviewed by Willis Dadukian, Respondent's chief operating officer and president. She applied for a position as a combined switchboard operator and reservations clerk. Dadukian informed her that the switchboard operators were represented by a union (Local 153), and Resnick expressed adamant opposition to becoming affiliated with or a member of a union. It was therefore decided that Resnick would spend the majority of her time as a reservations clerk, and would fill in if needed on the switchboard.

The record establishes that all times material, there was no organizational activity going on at Respondent's hotel with respect to the reservations clerks, or any of Respondent's employees, by either the unions representing certain classifications of its employees or any outside labor organization.

Prior to December 1980, Respondent's reservations employees worked 8-hour shifts, which included a 1-hour lunch break. Respondent, however, permitted employees if they so desired, to forgo a break in the middle of the day, and to either leave an hour early or come in an hour later. Resnick worked a shift from 12 noon to 8 p.m., and was one of those employees who would choose not to take a break, and in effect work a 7-hour day.

In early December 1980, Dadukian decided that the present system was causing confusion because some employees would be working and others not, and Respondent could not plan on people being present during overlap periods. In addition Dadukian felt that as a personnel practitioner, it was a good policy for people to break their work shift, refresh themselves, and come back and assume their responsibilities. Accordingly, Dadukian instituted sometime in early or mid-December, a new policy, which required all employees to take a 1-hour lunch break, thereby requiring them to be present at Respondent's premises for a full 8-hour day.

The new policy was announced to the employees by Chris LaPenta, Respondent's front office manager, and an admitted supervisor. Although the policy was to be instituted for all employees, LaPenta mistakenly indicated to the employees that only women were required to take the 1-hour lunch break. Respondent's new policy produced much consternation among the employees affected, who preferred the old system, and resulted in discussions among the employees complaining about the change, of which LaPenta was aware. Complaints were also made directly to LaPenta about the change in policy by most of the employees.[2] Resnick was according to LaPenta, the most vocal complainer about the new policy, and was involved in discussions with other employees concerning this new policy.[3]

Resnick also called the United States Department of Labor, Wage and Hour Division to inquire about the legality of Respondent's action. She reported to LaPenta that she had called the Department of Labor and was told that it was illegal to apply the policy only to women. LaPenta as he testified, "stood corrected, and from then on everybody was taking lunch hours."

Resnick also reported to Kurt Thomas, Respondent's resident manager and an admitted supervisor, that the Labor Department had informed her that she could only be required to take a half hour for a lunch break. However, Resnick was still scheduled for and took a 1-hour break, as did the other employees.

Dadukian was informed by his supervisors (LaPenta and Thomas) that Resnick had made a call to the Department of Labor. In fact at "staff" meetings[4] held in December, it was mentioned to Dadukian that there was discontent about the lunch hour policy, that Resnick was the most vocal complainer and resented the new policy, and that she had called the Department of Labor about the change. Dadukian testified that it was reported to him, "that the biggest complainer was Ms. Resnick, that she took exception with this, which to me was just taking exception with one more situation in our hotel, or exception to her leadership, her instructions."

Dadukian also testified that Resnick's calling the Department of Labor did not bother him, but admitted that, "the fact of a call to the Department of Labor was, I felt, a manifestation, or I could not help but assume it was a manifestation of her discontent with the policy."

At a staff meeting in mid-December, shortly after the lunch hour problem, it was decided that Resnick should be terminated. Respondent's witnesses (Dadukian and LaPenta) admit that one of the reasons for the decision being made to discharge her was her resentment towards and complaints about its new lunch hour policy.[5] In addition, LaPenta and Dadukian cite a number of other reasons that allegedly contributed to the decision to discharge her, and that allegedly occurred since October or November 1980. These alleged reasons were Resnick's unwillingness to receive toll free "800" calls and her reference to patrons who use these calls as cheapies; her failure to properly operate the Western Union equipment to confirm reservations, her habitual tardiness, her arguments with LaPenta, and her habit of doing her hair and makeup while at her desk; her practice of asking the switchboard for wake-up calls; and her habit making personal phone calls while at work.

The record reveals that at no time did any supervisor of Respondent ever warn Resnick that her conduct in any of these areas was considered unsatisfactory to Respondent, nor that Respondent was considering or contemplating discharging or disciplining her for these or any other reasons.[6]

It was decided at the staff meeting that the approaching holiday season would not be an appropriate time to discharge her and/or to find a suitable replacement. It was therefore decided that she would be fired when LaPenta was satisfied that a capable replacement was available. Resnick was not informed of Respondent's decision in this regard.

On December 24, 1980, Dadukian gave Resnick a letter to type concerning a mortgage request.[7] Dadukian informed her that this was a highly confidential document, and instructed her that all copies of the letter be returned to him. Resnick typed the letter as requested. However, the next day, Dadukian was informed that a copy of the letter had been found at the switchboard by the switchboard operator. According to Dadukian, this incident was "the straw that broke the camel's back," and that now there was no chance that he would reverse the decision to terminate her. Dadukian testified that he was particularly concerned with the fact that Resnick was a tenant in a building located on the same block as Respondent and owned by a landlord named Shapiro. Since the letter contained a request for a large mortgage, Dadukian did not wish this information disclosed to anyone, particularly to a landlord on the same block. Thus, when he found out that a copy of the letter was left at the switchboard, Dadukian claims that he believed that Resnick was either going to give this letter or the information contained therein to Shapiro. Dadukian did not discuss the letter with Resnick at the time, nor ask her for an explanation as to why she had left a copy of the letter at the switchboard.[8]

[2] LaPenta testified "it was a new policy, everybody balked."

[3] LaPenta testified that Resnick spent a lot of time talking to other coworkers about her discontent, and a lot of discussion at this time was regarding the lunch hours. He further testified "everybody was all up in arms," but Resnick was more concerned than anybody else.

[4] These "staff" meetings were actually supervisory staff meetings, attended by Thomas, LaPenta, Dadukian, and one or two other supervisors.

[5] In fact, Respondent's attorney on the record referred to Resnick as "as pain in the neck regarding the lunch policy."

[6] Dadukian while admitting that he himself gave no such warnings, testified that he thought that his supervisors, LaPenta and Thomas, had done so. However, both LaPenta and Thomas deny or do not recall giving Resnick any warnings. Thomas in fact denies being aware of any dissatisfaction with Resnick's work.

[7] Resnick was not regularly assigned to type for Dadukian. However, it was essential that this letter be sent out quickly, and Dadukian's secretary had left, so he asked Resnick to type the letter for him.

[8] The record reveals that Resnick had previously had some problem with Shapiro with respect to her lease and that Dadukian had interceded on her behalf with Shapiro to help straighten out the situation.

As noted above, part of Resnick's job was to fill in on occasion as a switchboard operator. Resnick had been assigned to fill in for an hour between shifts of the switchboard operators. One of the switchboard operators, Margaret Dean had been hassling Resnick about performing the job of a switchboard operator since she was not in the union, and the job is a "union position."[9] On December 25, 1980, Resnick was assigned to fill in prior to Dean arriving for the next shift. At some point prior to Dean arriving, LaPenta noticed that the switchboard was unattended. LaPenta confronted Resnick and asked her why she was not there. Resnick replied that Margaret Dean did not want her to work there since it was a union job, and she did not want any hassles with Dean. LaPenta responded that it was not Dean's decison to determine who works at the switchboard. Resnick said she would not go to the switchboard giving the same reason. Finally Dean arrived and took over the board.

LaPenta reported this incident to Dadukian and then wrote up a memo to Resnick's file dated December 29, 1980. The memo reads that Resnick on December 27, 1980 left her position without authorization, and refused to return to her position when requested. The memo states further that "her stated reason for not returning was that some Union employees did not wish her at the switchboard." The memo concludes by stating that her reasons for not returning are groundless, and "I consider this to be an act of insubordination."

Although the record reveals that Dadukian had instructed his supervisory staff to write up and place in employees' files any incidents of unsatifactory performance by employees, the above memo detailing the switchboard incident, is the only such memo appearing in Resnick's file. Dadukin with regard to this incident testified, "a major issue was not made of it."

LaPenta recalls that he discussed the incident with Resnick sometime in January, but does not recall what was said, nor whether the possibility of discharge was mentioned. In fact, LaPenta does not recall whether Resnick ever received or saw a copy of the memo placed in her file.

On the morning of January 28, 1981, Thomas was called into Dadukian's office. Present in addition to Dadukian was Vito Marasia, Respondent's accounting manager. Dadukian asked Thomas whether he had heard of Resnick's union activities. Thomas replied that he had not. Thomas asked whom Dadukian heard this from. Dadukian replied that it was Marasia. Thomas asked Marasia where he had heard about this. Marasia responded that he would not divulge this information. Dadukian then told Thomas to get rid of Resnick. Thomas asked on what grounds. Dadukian answered, "tell her she's incompetent."[10]

Later that same morning Thomas informed LaPenta that Dadukian had decided to terminate Resnick. LaPenta then went to see Dadukian and requested more time before discharging her. He told Dadukian that he had just hired a new employee, Juan Guererro, and wanted to see how he would work out. Dadukian was adamant that LaPenta make a decision on when to fire her. He told LaPenta that he was upset about the mortgage letter that Resnick had left in a public place, Dadukian also talked about the lunch hour incident. He told LaPenta that he was concerned and upset that people were questioning management's institution of policies, specifically referring to the lunch hour problem, and he did not like the fact that people, particularly Resnick, were balking or fighting against this new policy. LaPenta also testified that Dadukian mentioned something about her having called the Labor Department about the matter, but he could not remember what Dadukian said about it. LaPenta could not remember whether anything about any labor union activity engaged in by Resnick was brought up by Dadukian. The meeting ended with Dadukian agreeing to give LaPenta a couple of more weeks to break in Guererro before discharging Resnick.

Apparently Thomas was not informed of LaPenta's discussion with Dadukian and the decision to give Resnick a little more time. Thus he instructed the payroll clerk to prepare two checks for Resnick, her regular check and a severance check. When Resnick received the two checks, she went to see Thomas and LaPenta and asked why she had received two checks. Thomas replied that she was being terminated. Resnick asked why, and Thomas replied that she was incompetent. Resnick replied that she did not buy it, there must be other reasons. LaPenta then stated, "well, I'm the one with the big mouth. I'm going to tell you that you were let go because of union activity."[11]

LaPenta then spoke to Dadukian and reaffirmed the understanding that Resnick would be permitted to remain employed for a couple of weeks, until a replacement was adequately trained.

[9] The record does not reflect what the Local 153 contract contains regarding the recognition clause, or the amount of unit work necessary to be performed by an employee to come within the contract's terms. Indeed the record contains no evidence of any terms of the Local 153 contract. Thus, the record does not reveal whether the contract contains a grievance or arbitration clause and/or a no-strike clause.

[10] The above findings with respect to this conversation are based on the credited testimony of Thomas over the denials of Dadukian. Marasia did not testify. Respondent contends that an adverse inference should be drawn against the General Counsel for failure to call Marasia as a rebuttal witness. I do not agree. The record discloses that Marasia was equally available to be called as a witness by either Respondent or the General Counsel. Therefore, no adverse inference can be drawn against either party for failure to call him to either corroborate or refute the testimony of other witnesses. Wayne Construction, 259 NLRB 571 (1981); Plumbers & Steamfitters Local 40 (Mechanical Contractors Assn. of Washington), 242 NLRB 1157 (1979); Local 259, U.A.W. (Atherton Cadillac), 225 NLRB 421 (1976). Although Thomas' testimony may be considered somewhat suspect in view of his having been terminated by Respondent, I am persuaded that he testified accurately and truthfully with respect to this conversation. I note that his testimony is consistent with and in effect corroborated by the testimony of employees Castner and Azzopardi, set forth infra, i.e. which they were told by LaPenta that Resnick was terminated because of alleged union activities. I note also that Thomas confirmed this to Azzopardi shortly after Resnick's discharge at a time when he (Thomas) was still employed by Respondent, and would have no reason to fabricate or furnish testimony adverse to Respondent's interests.

[11] The above based on Thomas' credited testimony. LaPenta did not deny making the above comments, stating he could not remember the events of the meeting or what was said, although he admitted that he well might have said that he had a big mouth. LaPenta explained that he was very upset and agitated at this meeting, since he had been under the impression after his discussion with Dadukian that Resnick would not be terminated at that time, and would not be informed of any decision to terminate her.

After Resnick's meeting with Thomas and LaPenta, she spoke to employee Thomas Castner and told him that she had been fired because Marasia had told Dadukian that she was trying to form a union. At that time Castner observed LaPenta who was upset and in tears because he had to fire Resnick. A week later Castner asked LaPenta why Resnick was terminated. LaPenta replied that he was told by Dadukian to fire her because she was trying to form a union. LaPenta reported that he said that he needed to give Resnick a reason, adding that he (LaPenta) had no reason to fire her. Dadukian informed LaPenta that he does not "need a reason. The only reason that you need is that I'm telling you to fire her."

During the next several weeks, Castner and LaPenta had a number of discussions about Resnick's discharge. Whenever the subject was mentioned, LaPenta informed Castner that Resnick was trying to form a union and this was the reason for the discharge.

On a couple of these occasions Castner replied to LaPenta that he knew that was not true.[12] LaPenta answered "What can I do? I was told to fire her, and that's what I did."

Similarly, employee Maurice Azzopardi, sometime in January, met LaPenta in the reservations office and asked what happened to Resnick. LaPenta replied that she was fired and "they say it, that she was trying to form a union. And there were rumors going around there, as far as the union."

About 2 days later, Azzopardi approached Thomas and asked him if it was true that Resnick was fired because she tried to form a union. Thomas replied "yes, it's true."[13]

On February 2, Dadukian met with her to explain why she was being terminated. He told her that she was overqualified for the job. He explained that Resnick had previously worked in places like the Stork Club and other hotels, where she dealt with important people, and her pleasant personality and ability to mix with people would be more useful than at Respondent, which is a relatively small hotel, with little public exposure. Thus, according to Dadukian, overqualified people like Resnick tend to be disruptive influences among fellow workers, and take issue with leadership because these people think they know more than their bosses. Dadukian goes on to testify that at first Resnick was happy to perform "humble" duties, but then "later it became a situation where she was uncomfortable, compounded with the introduction of the lunch hour." During the course of his meeting with Resnick the lunch hour incident as well as the Department of Labor came up. Resnick asked if she was fired because she called the Department of Labor. Dadukian replied that it had nothing to do with the decision, and Respondent was a law-abiding company.

The subject of the mortgage letter was also discussed. He told her that he was very disappointed in her, that it was a betrayal of trust and a question of her integrity and loyalty. Resnick responded that it was an inadvertent mistake.

Dadukian in his testimony on several occasions appeared to either confuse and/or associate the Department of Labor with union activity. When asked about the subject of the Department of Labor coming up at the February 2 meeting, Dadukian testified, "I believe the subject of going to the Department of Labor was brought up. Whether it was a matter of union, I think these people were a little confused too. . . . I'm referring to Resnick and others who refer to Department of Labor and/or union activity." At another point in his testimony when asked about the subject of union activities coming up during this conversation, he testified that Resnick brought the subject up. Dadukian was asked what she said about it and what his response was. His testimony is as follows: "That I guess, if I remember correctly, if it was a concern of mine that she was trying to organize the hotel, that I shouldn't worry about it. I recall, vaguely, the subject but again the Department of Labor."

Subsequent to this meeting, Resnick wrote two letters to Dadukian. The first letter dated February 9, dealt mainly with the mortgage letter incident. Resnick explained that she has had no dealings with Shapiro since their problems with the lease and in fact they were enemies since that incident. She added that she would never consider giving him any confidential information regarding the hotel. She also criticized Dadukian for not getting her side of the story.

No mention of her being terminated for union activities was set forth in the letter. However, she does seem to suggest that reasons other than the mortgage letter incident were responsible for the decision to discharge her. Thus, she wrote, "the conviction under which you're acting has to stem from something other than this which seems so utterly inconceivable." At another point in the letter she states, "I did sense your having become disenchanted with me at one point along the way for some unknown reason, but I never dreamed it was of this magnitude, or what was brewing within you."

Resnick sent a second letter to Dadukian dated February 22. She again talked about the mortgage letter incident, explaining that she took the letter to the switchboard in order to type the envelope. She reiterated more clearly in this letter her belief that the mortgage letter was not the real reason for the discharge, and that Dadukian was using it as a "convenient camouflage." Resnick referred to the Union, by stating that Dadukian was barking up the wrong tree and that she was totally against unions. She suggested that he check out other employees who had been clerks at other union hotels in order to find the troublemakers. She added that she had not participated in any union discussions, and she would like to confront the person responsible for accusing her of same, commenting that "he or she is a damned liar and probably covering up for their own provocations which were probably overheard."

Resnick was terminated on February 22. LaPenta prepared a separation report, dated February 18, 1981. The [12] Castner did not believe that Resnick was fired because of any union activities, since there were no union activities engaged in by Resnick nor going on at Respondent's premises.

[13] The above findings with respect to the conversations of Azzopardi and Castner with LaPenta and Thomas are based on the credited and undenied testimony of Castner and Azzopardi.

form lists boxes covering various areas of reasons for discharge. The only box checked by LaPenta was marked insubordination. Under explanation LaPenta wrote, "Insubordination to Superior. Cheryl Resnick was dismissed February 22, 1981. Her work deteriorated over several months; less productivity, tardiness became more frequent. She also, refused to follow orders given by her superiors. At the same time her attitude deteriorated as well." Thomas was given the form to sign by LaPenta and Dadukian. Thomas told Dadukian and LaPenta that this form was not accurate, but Dadukian ordered him to sign it and he complied. LaPenta also told Thomas that he hated to do this, but he had no other choice.

Subsequently, Resnick filed for unemployment insurance. Dadukian in a telephone conversation with the claims examiner said the following: Resnick was terminated for "incompatibility with work, (sic) environment, supervision which affected the quality of her work. Poor attitude reflected on numerous occasions which left serious doubt on the effectiveness of her work performance. Insubordination cited by her immediate supervisor. We are not contesting her claim for unemployment compensation benefits."

Sometime in March, Castner filed a wage-and-hour complaint concerning overtime with the Department of Labor. Sometime later in March, investigators from the Department of Labor appeared at the hotel. Dadukian told Castner that he was not pleased with Castner's performance, and that he heard from a number of people that Castner had been complaining about the job and conditions. Dadukian added, "don't think that Vito [Marasia] told me this." Dadukian continued that Castner was constantly complaining and accused him of going to the Department of Labor, commenting that they were across the hall. Dadukian also said that he could not tolerate the Department of Labor being there, and that because Castner had called the Department of Labor, Dadukian would "deal with that severely." Finally, Dadukian advised Castner, "I got rid of Cheryl [Resnick] because of her activity with the Union," and he was more than looking forward to, if he had to, to fight the unions. Dadukian concluded that he got rid of Resnick and if he had to he would get rid of Castner.

Castner replied that he did not go to the Department of Labor, and denied complaining to other employees. Castner continued that if Dadukian had definite facts that Castner had been complaining, he wanted to know who told him this. Dadukian replied that it did not matter, and he would not reveal that information, except to say that Vito had not been the source. The conversation concluded by Castner repeating that he was not complaining about anything.[14]

III. ANALYSIS

Resnick, although present in the hearing room throughout the trial, was not called as a witness to testify in this proceeding. The General Counsel offered no explanation as to why she failed to call Resnick as a witness. Respondent placed great reliance on and attached great significance to this failure to call Resnick, both in his brief and at the hearing. Respondent, although not actually articulating its objections to Resnick not having testified, appears to be arguing that her testimony was an essential element of the General Counsel's case, or at the very least calls for an adverse inference to be drawn against the General Counsel's case. Respondent specifically points to the fact that the charge filed by Resnick states that she was discharged, "because she engaged in concerted protected activities with respect to the formation of the Union and because she called the Labor Board." Respondent argues that the discrepancy between the charge, which alleges the discharge to be because she "engaged" in union activities, and the complaint, which alleges a mistaken belief in union activity as the reason, required Resnick to be called as a witness to explain such "inconsistency."[15]

It is well settled that where the record sustains the allegations of a discriminatory discharge, the testimony of the discriminatee is not a sine qua non for relief under the Act.[16] In the instant case, I find no basis for drawing of any adverse inference against the General Counsel for her failure to call Resnick as a witness. I note that the credibility of Resnick is not the significant issue herein. The motivation for Respondent in terminating her is determinitive, and I do not believe that Resnick's testimony was or is essential to such a determination. As outlined above, and as will be discussed more fully infra, Respondent's own supervisors and agents have given testimony and made statements to other employees, which are dispositive of the issues before me. Although it is possible that had Resnick been called as a witness, she might have cast some doubt on some portions of the testimony of these witnesses, she was present throughout the hearing in the courtroom, and Respondent was free to call her as an adverse witness. See Wayne Construction, supra.

Similarly, if Respondent felt that cross-examination of Resnick with respect to the alleged "discrepancy" between the charge and complaint[17] or any other matters,

[14] The above based on the credited testimony of Castner, which was largely undenied by Dadukian. Dadukian did not deny having such a conversation with Castner nor making any of the comments attributed to him by Castner, except to say that he never "chastised Castner concerning his call to the Labor Department."

[15] Insofar as this argument appears to be contending that this alleged "difference" between the charge and the complaint constitutes a substantial variation from same, sufficient to mandate dismissal, it is without merit. A charge merely initiates the investigatory process, and since the allegations set forth in the complaint are related to the charge, and based on the same events set forth therein, the charge is adequate to support the complaint. NLRB v. Fant Milling Co., 360 U.S. 301 (1959); Baton Rouge Water Works Co., 246 NLRB 995 (1979); Kern Bakeries, 227 NLRB 1329 (1977).

[16] Cutting, Inc., 255 NLRB 534 (1981); Riley Stoker Corp., 223 NLRB 1146 (1976), and cases cited therein.

[17] I note that although the record is clear that Resnick did not actually engage in any union activities, the record does establish that she and other witnesses were told by Respondent's supervisors that she was terminated because Respondent believed her to have engaged in such activities. I find that the alleged discrepancy between the charge and complaint to be minimal and a matter of semantics, and attach no significance to it.

would in any way undermine the General Counsel's case, it could have called her to the stand and made such inquiries.

I shall therefore proceed to evaluate the merits of the complaint, based on the testimony and evidence adduced on this record, notwithstanding the failure of Resnick to testify herein.

The first issue to be determined, is whether the General Counsel has shown that protected conduct was a "motivating factor" in Respondent's decision to terminate Resnick.[18] Respondent's own witnesses admit, and the record establishes that one motivating factor for the discharge was Resnick's activity in complaining about Respondent's lunch hour change. Thus, both Dadukian and LaPenta admit that Resnick was the most vocal employee complainer about the change, that Dadukian was upset about people questioning this policy, and that Respondent's initial decision to terminate her was made in mid-December, shortly after such complaints were made. Indeed, as noted above, Respondent's attorney urges a finding that Resnick was fired because "she was a pain in the neck regarding the lunch policy."

Respondent contends, however, that Resnick's activity in complaining about the lunch policy should be construed as individual griping and complaining, and more for her own satisfaction, and not for the purpose of encouraging or inducing any group action. Thus, Respondent argues that she was not engaged in protected concerted activity.[19]

However, I do not believe that Resnick's actions in the instant case can be characterized as "individual griping or complaining." The evidence is clear that most of the employees affected by the change discussed and complained about the new policy among themselves, and that Respondent was aware of such discussions. Moreover, many of the employees voiced such dissatisfaction directly to supervisors of Respondent, with Resnick being the most vocal complainer. The lack of formal organization of a group or the fact that Resnick was not appointed as a spokesman for a group does not establish that her activity is not protected or concerted.[20]

Here, Resnick was protesting a change in Respondent's past practice regarding lunch hour policy, clearly a term and condition of employment. Action in protest of the discontinuance of such past practice, particularly when other employees shared her concerns, involves matters of mutual concern and benefit to employees, and constitutes protected concerted activity.[21]

Such is not negated because this matter of mutual concern coincided with Resnick's personal preferences or reasons peculiar to herself for opposing the lunch hour changes.[22]

Thus, her actions in complaining about the lunch hour policy in and of itself constitutes protected concerted activity.

Moreover, the evidence reveals that Resnick made a call to the Department of Labor, inquiring about the legality of Respondent's actions. Contrary to Dadukian's testimony and Respondent's assertions, I am persuaded that her call to the Department of Labor also constituted a "motivating" factor in Respondent's decision to discharge Resnick. Thus, Dadukian admitted that he considered Resnick's call to the Department of Labor, to be a "manifestation of her discontent" with Respondent's changes in the lunch policy. Therefore I do not believe that her call to the Department of Labor can be so easily divorced from, as Respondent urges, her actions in complaining along with other employees about the change in conditions of employment. Moreover, specific animus by Respondent towards calls to the Department of Labor is established by Dadukian's threat to terminate employee Castner because of his call to the same Federal agency about a different problem. Respondent also argues that the call to the Department of Labor was not protected concerted activity, again arguing that her call was merely to enforce a personal gripe or complaint.[23] As noted, I have already found that Resnick's activity, being in conjunction with similar complaints made by and discussions with other employees, should be characterized as concerted, and that her call to the Department of Labor was merely an extension of that activity and was so considered by Respondent. Therefore a discharge motivated by such activity is violative of the Act.[24]

However, even in the absence of any evidence of any other employee support for Resnick's actions in calling the Department of Labor, and in fact even if I were to find that she was acting alone in making such a call, Board law provides that such activity is still concerted.[25]

The record also supports the conclusion that another "motivating" factor in Respondent's decision to discharge Resnick, was its mistaken belief that she was engaged in union activities. The testimony of Thomas, Respondent's former supervisor, that Dadukian told him to get rid of Resnick immediately after asking if Thomas had heard about her union activities, and instructing him to "tell her she's incompetent," is particularly significant in reaching my conclusion. Moreover, this testimony is confirmed and corroborated by the testimony of employees Castner and Azzopardi who were both told by two of Respondent's officials that Resnick was fired because of union activities.[26]

[26] Thus, Azzopardi was informed that this was so by LaPenta and Thomas. Castner was given this information by LaPenta and most importantly by Dadukian himself. The fact that Castner testified that he himself did not believe that Resnick's union activities were the reason for her dis-

Respondent argues that since it is admitted that Resnick engaged in no union activities, and that in fact the record reveals no evidence that any union activities were going on at Respondent's premises at the time, that no inference can be drawn that Respondent believed reasonably or otherwise that she engaged in such activities. I do not agree. The above-described credited testimony of Thomas, Azzopardi, and Castner is extremely compelling evidence,[27] and I need not and do not believe it is necessary for me to find the existence of any union activity, nor to ascertain what activities engaged in by Resnick, or others, formed the basis for Respondent's belief that she engaged in union activities. It is sufficient for me to find, which I do, that Respondent believed that she engaged in union activity and that its belief that she engaged in such activity was a motivating factor in the decison to discharge her.

However, I would note that the record does suggest some possible reasons for Respondent's belief. It is clear from Dadukian's own testimony that he confused and associated the call to the Department of Labor with engaging in union activities. Thus, it is not unreasonable for Respondent to have believed that the employee who was the most vocal complainer about its change in lunch policy and who called the Department of Labor to complain about it might tend to be involved in forming or supporting a union, perhaps in response to the employees' dissatisfaction with management's policies. Additionally, the record reveals that Resnick's refusal to fill in for the switchboard operator on December 29, was motivated by her at least indirect support of the position taken by the union representing the operators, that only bargaining unit personnel should perform such work. In fact, LaPenta's write-up of the incident, specifically mentioned her refusal in connection with union employees not wanting her to perform this work. Thus, this sudden "sympathy" for the union's position may have served to indicate to Respondent that she was becoming involved in some sort of union activity.

It is well settled that a discharge motivated by a mistaken belief that an employee engaged in union and/or protected concerted activity is violative of Section 8(a)(1) and/or (3) of the Act.[28]

Accordingly, I find that Respondent's mistaken belief that Resnick engaged in union activities, another instance of protected concerted activity, was also a motivating factor in Respondent's decision to terminate her. The next question becomes whether Respondent has shown that it would have taken the action against Resnick even in the absence of the protected conduct. See Wright Line, supra.

In my judgment, Respondent has fallen far short of making the necessary showing. Respondent's own witnesses testified that it made its initial decision to terminate Resnick in mid-December 1980. In addition to the lunch hour incidents, Respondent's witnesses contend that her discharge was also motivated by a long list of alleged problems with Resnick's performance. These include tardiness, doing her hair and makeup at her desk, asking for wake-up calls, failure to confirm reservations on Western Union, making personal calls at work, referring to patrons who use 800 reservation numbers as "cheapies" and refusing to answer their calls, and arguments with LaPenta. However, although Dadukian had instructed his supervisors to write up all incidents of unsatisfactory performance of employees and place them in their personnel files, no such write ups were made with respect to any of these incidents.[29] Moreover, Respondent never warned or cautioned her that recurrence of any of these "transgressions," might result in any kind of disciplinary action, much less discharge. The failure to caution or admonish her that her conduct might lead to dismissal is a highly significant indication of discriminatory motivation.[30]

In E. Anthony & Sons v. NLRB, 163 F.2d 22 (D.C. Cir. 1947), cert. denied 332 U.S. 773 (1947), a case often cited in this area,[31] Judge Prettyman speaking for the Court, set forth a respondent's failure to warn its employees of its dissatisfaction with their performance, and found that; "Such action on the part of an employer is not natural. If the employer had really been disturbed by the circumstances it assigned as reasons for these discharges, and had no other circumstances in mind, some word of admonition, some caution that the offending lapse be not repeated, or some opportunity for correction of the objectionable practice would be almost inevitable."

I find these comments particularly applicable to the facts at hand. Thus, if Respondent had really considered these incidents serious enough to warrant discipline or discharge, it is reasonable that it would have so informed Resnick. Its failure to do so, coupled with its failure to document these incidents in her file as required, as well as the other evidence of record, leads me to conclude that these reasons were pretextual and were not relied on by Respondent in its decision to terminate Resnick. Ipso facto then Respondent has not shown that it would have discharged Resnick for these reasons, absent her protected conduct.

Respondent relies most heavily on the mortgage letter incident in justifying the discharge, as according to Dadukian this incident was the "straw that broke the camel's back." I find this testimony to be quite suspect, particularly in view of the fact that Respondent's own witnesses testified that the decision to terminate Resnick charge essentially because she did not engage in any such activities, is irrelevant. The subjective evaluation of a witness as to his belief concerning the reasons for a discharge is not dispositive, since it is the judge and the Board's function, not the witness' to make such a determination.

[27] I note that even LaPenta, who was called as a witness by Respondent, did not deny making these statements to the employees, and when asked about Resnick's alleged union activities coming up during Respondent's deliberations in discharging her, had a sudden and convenient lack of memory, and could not recall whether the topic was mentioned.

was made in mid-December[32] before the mortgage letter problem occurred.

I would also note that despite Dadukian's testimony that he considered Resnick's behavior to constitute disloyality and lack of trust, and that he would never consider reversing the decision to discharge her as a result thereof, he did not ask Resnick for her version nor offer her an opportunity to explain until after she was notified of the decision to terminate her. The failure of Respondent to do so, supports an inference of discriminatory intent.[33]

I note also that despite the alleged seriousness of this conduct Respondent permitted Resnick to remain as an employee of Respondent for nearly 2 months after the incident occurred.[34] Additionally, when giving the reasons to the New York State Unemployment Agency for discharge, this incident was not mentioned as even one of the reasons for her discharge. Finally, Respondent's termination form filled out by LaPenta failed to disclose this incident, although it was allegedly the "straw that broke the camel's back." Accordingly, based on the foregoing, I find that Respondent has not shown that it would have discharged Resnick because of this incident, even in the absence of her engaging in protected concerted activity.

The final reason advanced by Respondent for terminating Resnick is the alleged insubordination incident on December 27, 1980, regarding the switchboard operator. As to this incident, Dadukian admits that "a major issue was not made of it." Further, as with the mortgage letter incident, it took Respondent nearly 2 months to finally terminate her, notwithstanding this insubordination. Thus, I find that Respondent has failed to show that it would have terminated Resnick for the conduct, absent her union and protected concerted activity.[35]

Accordingly, I find that Respondent discharged Resnick because of its mistaken belief that she engaged in union activity, and because of her activity in complaining about Respondent's lunch hour policy, both to management and to the Department of Labor.[36] Therefore, Respondent has violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act, and I so find.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Salisbury Hotel is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging and refusing to reinstate Cheryl Resnick because she called the United States Department of Labor concerning Respondent's changing its lunch hour policy and because she engaged in other protected concerted activities concerning such changes, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. By discharging and refusing to reinstate Cheryl Resnick because of its belief that she engaged in union activities, Respondent violated Section 8(a)(1) and (3) of the Act.

4. The aforesaid unfair labor practices are unfair labor practices affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

THE REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order Respondent to cease and desist therefrom and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having discriminatorily discharged its employee Cheryl Resnick, I shall recommend that Respondent be required to offer Resnick immediate and full reinstatement to her former position of employment, or in the event that such position no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges; and to make her whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits she may have suffered because of Respondent's discrimination against her. Her loss of earnings shall be computed as prescribed in F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as set forth in Isis Plumbing Co., 138 NLRB 716 (1962), and Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977).

I shall also recommend that Respondent remove from its files any reference to Resnick's discharge, and notify her in writing that it has done so, and that evidence of this discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel action against her. Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982).

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[37]

---

[32] This decision was made shortly after the lunch hour complaints and Resnick's call to the Department of Labor.

[33] United States Rubber Co. v. NLRB, 384 F.2d 660 (5th Cir. 1967); Elk Brand Mfg. Co., 253 NLRB 1038 (1981); Gulf States United Telephone Co., 253 NLRB 603 (1980); Hercules Bumpers Inc., 248 NLRB 1047 (1980); Waterbeds 'N' Stuff Inc., 238 NLRB 873 (1978).

[34] Thus, I find it unlikely that Dadukian really believed as he testified, that he suspected Resnick would or intended to pass the information contained in the letter to her landlord. His testimony in this regard is rather incredulous and incomprehensible. Thus, while he claims that he suspected her of transmitting this highly confidential information to her landlord, he requested that she type the letter knowing that she was a tenant in the building of this individual; and Resnick was not even his regular typist. If he was so concerned about Resnick's potential for disclosing this information to her landlord he could have waited until the next day and had his regular secretary type the letter. Moreover, Dadukian was aware that Resnick was not on the best of terms with her landlord, and I find that Dadukian had no basis for any suspicions that she might pass this information on to him.

[35] Although I need not, and I do not make such a finding, it is arguable that Resnick's conduct in this incident could be considered protected concerted activity. Thus it appears that her refusal to obey LaPenta's instructions to perform the switchboard operator's job was based on her implied support for the position of the Union representing the operators, that she should not be performing this unit work. The Board has held that activity can still be protected and concerted, even though such activity embraces the disobedience of an order of management. Bob Henry Dodge, 203 NLRB 78 (1973). I note in this connection that the record reveals no evidence of the existence of either a no-strike clause or a grievance procedure in the Local 153 contract.

ORDER

The Respondent, Salisbury Hotel, Incorporated, New York, New York, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Discharging, or otherwise discriminating against employees, because they contact or complain to the United States Department of Labor or any other governmental agency charged with responsibility for administering laws relating to wages, hours, and terms and conditions of employment, or because they engage in any other protected concerted activity concerning their working conditions.

(b) Discharging, or otherwise discriminating against employees, because of its belief that they have engaged in union activities.

(c) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing its employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them in Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Cheryl Resnick immediate and full reinstatement to her former job or, if her former job no longer exists, to substantially equivalent employment without prejudice to her seniority or other rights and privileges and make her whole for any loss of pay she may have suffered by reason of her unlawful discharge, in the manner set forth in the remedy section of the decision.

Board and all objections to them shall be deemed waived for all purposes.

(b) Remove from its files any reference to the discharge of Cheryl Resnick, on February 22, 1981, and notify her in writing that this had been done and that evidence of this unlawful discharge will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against her.

(c) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents for examination and copying, all payroll records, social security payment records, timecards, personnel records and reports, and all other records necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this Order.

(d) Post at its place of business in New York, New York, copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[38] Copies of the notice, on forms provided by the Regional Director for Region 2, after being signed by the Respondent's authorized representative, shall be posted by the Respondent immediately upon receipt and maintained for 60 consecutive days in conspicuous places including all places where notices to employees are customarily posted. Reasonable steps shall be taken by the Respondent to ensure that the notices are not altered, defaced, or covered by any other material.

(e) Notify the Regional Director in writing within 20 days from the date of this Order what steps the Respondent has taken to comply.

[38] If this Order is enforced by a judgment of a United States court of appeals, the words in the notice reading "Posted by Order of the National Labor Relations Board" shall read "Posted Pursuant to a Judgment of the United States Court of Appeals Enforcing an Order of the National Labor Relations Board."

DECISION AND ORDER

BY MEMBERS JOHANSEN, BABSON, AND STEPHENS

On 15 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge Richard H. Beddow Jr. issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the General Counsel filed limited cross-exceptions and a supporting brief. Charging Party Raymond Combs filed an answering brief to the Respondent's exceptions, and the Respondent filed an answering brief to the General Counsel's limited cross-exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order as modified.[3]

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge as modified below and orders that the Respondent,MCI Mining Corporation, Bulan, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order as modified.

1. Substitute the following for paragraph 1(d).

"(d) In any like or related manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act."

2. Substitute the following for paragraph 2(a).

"(a) Offer Raymond Combs immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges previously enjoyed and make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge in the manner specified in the remedy section above, and remove from its files any references to his termination on 9 April 1985 and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful separation will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him."

3. Substitute the attached notice for that of the administrative law judge.

APPENDIX

NOTICE TO EMPLOYEES
POSTED BY ORDER OF THE
NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD
An Agency of the United States Government

The National Labor Relations Board has found that we violated the National Labor Relations Act and has ordered us to post and abide by this notice.

Section 7 of the Act gives employees these rights.

To organize

To form, join, or assist any union

To bargain collectively through representatives of their own choice

To act together for other mutual aid or protection

To choose not to engage in any of these protected concerted activities.

WE WILL NOT suspend, discharge, or otherwise discriminate against any of you for engaging in a strike for the purpose of securing satisfactory resolution of your work-related grievances.

WE WILL NOT threaten you with termination for engaging in a strike.

[1] The Respondent has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

[2] In agreeing with the judge's finding that "the record is more than ample to show concerted activity," we additionally rely on our decision in Meyers Industries (Meyers II), 281 NLRB 882 (1986). Member Johansen, who did not participate in Meyers, agrees the activity was concerted. We, however, find it unnecessary to pass on the judge's reliance on his finding that the employees' concerns were "reasonable." We also disavow as unsupported by the record the judge's finding that employee Combs' attempts to avail himself of the Respondent's problem-solving process were "belittled and dismissed in the eyes of Respondent's personnel people." Finally, although we agree with the judge that the Respondent's loss of production is irrelevant to whether the strike here was protected activity, we disavow his reliance on East Chicago Rehabilitation Center, 259 NLRB 996 (1982), as authority for that proposition.

The Respondent has excepted to the judge's conclusion that it violated Sec. 8(a)(1) by repromulgating an unlawful rule regarding discipline of employees engaged in "any" work disruption. The Respondent argues that this conclusion was erroneous because the rule was originally published outside the 10(b) limitations period. We reject this contention of the Respondent based on the unrefuted evidence that this rule was maintained, republished, and enforced within the 10(b) limitations period.

[3] In his remedy, the judge found it necessary to issue a broad order requiring the Respondent to cease and desist from infringing "in any other manner" on the rights guaranteed employees by Sec. 7 of the Act. However, we have considered this case in light of the standard set forth in Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979), and have decided that the broad remedial language is not warranted. Accordingly, we shall modify par. 1(d) of the recommended Order to use the narrow injunctive language, "in any like or related manner." We shall also modify par. 2(a) of the recommended Order to require that the Respondent offer to reinstate Combs without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights and privileges enjoyed.

WE WILL NOT maintain or enforce any rule that threatens discipline, including discharge, for being involved in initiating a strike.

WE WILL NOT in any like or related manner interfere with, restrain, or coerce you in the exercise of the rights guaranteed you by Section 7 of the Act.

WE WILL offer Raymond Combs immediate and full reinstatement to his former job or, if that job no longer exists, to a substantially equivalent position, without prejudice to his seniority or any other rights or privileges previously enjoyed and WE WILL make him whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from his discharge, less any net interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL revoke the suspensions of Raymond Combs, Wayne Campbell, and Roger Jett, and make them whole for any loss of earnings and other benefits resulting from their suspensions, less any interim earnings, plus interest.

WE WILL remove from our files any reference to the discharge of Raymond Combs and the suspensions of Raymond Combs, Wayne Campbell, and Roger Jett, and WE WILL notify these employees in writing that this has been done and that the discharge and suspensions will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

WE WILL issue a notice revoking our notice of 8 October 1985, as repromulgated by a letter to all our employees dated 10 April 1986.

MCI MINING CORPORATION

Patricia R. Fry, Esq., for the General Counsel.
Donald P. Wagner, Esq., of Lexington, Kentucky, for the Respondent.
Tony Oppegard, Esq., of Hazard, Kentucky, for the Charging Party.

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

RICHARD H. BEDDOW JR., Administrative Law Judge. This matter was heard in Hazard, Kentucky, on 8 and 9 July 1986. Subsequent to an extension of the filing date, briefs were filed by all parties.

The proceedings are based on charges filed 18 April 1986, by individuals Roger Jett, Wayne Campbell, and Raymond Combs. The Regional Director's consolidated complaint, dated 29 May 1986, alleges that the Respondent, MCI Mining Corporation, of Bulan, Kentucky, violated Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act by suspending and discharging employees because they engaged in concerted protected activities and by maintaining a rule that employees would be disciplined for engaging in a work stoppage and threatening employees with discharge if they did not end a lawful strike. On a review of the entire record in this case and from my observation of the witnesses and their demeanor, I make the following

I. JURISDICTION

Respondent is a Kentucky corporation engaged in the mining and sale of coal. It annually sells and ships coal valued in excess of $50,000 directly to points outside Kentucky and it admits that at all times material it has been an employer engaged in operations affecting commerce within the meaning of Section 2(2), (6), and (7) of the Act.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE

Respondent, also known as Mountain Coals, Inc., is owned by Cyprus Minerals Company of Denver, Colorado, and it consists of three subsidiary companies—Star Fire Coals, Inc., Lost Mountain Mining, Inc., and Buckhorn Processing Company. Star Fire and Lost Mountain operate separate strip mining sites near Hazard, Kentucky. The coal is processed by Buckhorn Processing. Although none of Respondents employees are represented by a union, they have a history of engaging in strikes in order to obtain concessions from management and to remedy employee grievances. For example, a 3-week work stoppage by employees at all three facilities occurred in January and February 1985 (precipitated by the discharge of an employee for not wearing a hardhat inside a vehicle cab). That strike ended after negotiations between employees and management cumulated in a written commitment by Respondent to negotiate a written seniority policy, and to form an employee/-management communication committee that would meet regularly, as well as an agreement to modify the Company's policy regarding the wearing of hardhats.

On 13 February, after the first strike, Respondent sent a memo to its employees that included the following position statements:

> 2. Communications Committee: A communications committee will be established for each facility (Lost Mountain, Star Fire, and Buckhorn). Each committee will be composed of two hourly employees from each job at each facility, the Vice President and General Manager, and the Employee Relations Manager. The membership will rotate over a period of time, so that each employee and possibly additional management personnel have the opportunity to work on his or her company's committee. The purpose of the committee will be to discuss issues which remain unresolved after discussion with an employee's immediate foreman and the Mine Manager. We assure you that the committee will meet at least once a month.
> . . . .
> 12. Seniority Rights and Training: The Management of Lost Mountain Mining, Inc., Star Fire Coals, Inc., and Buckhorn Processing Company individually agree that the job bidding and layoff issues need to be clarified and list the following information as a starting point to better understand job bidding and lay-offs. These procedures will be reviewed with committees for each of the companies before implementation.

Job Bidding: If a permanent job vacancy occurs in an operating job line (such as dozer operator, mechanic, truck operator, sampler, blasting operator, etc.) the job will be offered to the employee in that same job line on that same shift starting with the most senior in that particular line. When one horizontal move in that job line is made, the resulting vacancy will be filled by offering the job to the employee in that same job line beginning with the most senior on the remaining shifts. In the event the existing employee in a job line does not want to move to fill a vacancy, the posting proccedure [sic] will be used to select a qualified operator outside that job line. The resulting vacancy will be filled by an employee working outside that classification by publicizing the job throughout the individual company for three working days. Any interested employee may bid on that job. Jobs created by the addition of new equipment will be treated as above.

Mine seniority will govern in filling job bids provided the employee has the physical ability to perform the job and has reasonable knowledge of the job that will enable him or her to begin performing job duties.

An employee will be given a trial period of thirty (30) working days to prove he or she is qualified for the new position. If at the end of the trial period the employee has not demonstrated the ability to perform the job in a safe and efficient manner, he or she will go back to his or her original job.

Job changes through the bidding process, from one job line to another, must be limited to one per employee per year. When employees change job lines, they give up their previous seniority in their previous job line. An employee can hold seniority in only one job line at any one time.

Management and employee representatives subsequently discussed the seniority policy for Star Fire in several of the communications committee meetings. The company proposed creating training positions for some of its jobs, including mechanics and operators. The Company wanted to designate the positions as mechanic I and mechanic II, and operating I and operator II, with the "II" designation being the training position for the "less than full qualified" employee. Employees, through the communications committee, objected to the creation of the training position, but the Company nonetheless issued a seniority policy on 18 April that contained a provision establishing the training positions. Employees immediately threatened to either go on strike or to contact the United Mine Workers Union if the training positions were not abolished. The Company relented and on 22 April Star Fire issued a revised seniority policy, which did not include the training positions.

In May 1985, a layoff of employees occurred at Star Fire. At the same time, its maintenance department needed to hire four additional mechanics. Respondent posted openings for four repairmen, a new job classification that was established so that Respondent could retain some existing employees that otherwise would be laid off rather than going outside the Company to hire fully qualified mechanics. Respondent created the repairman job, which was the equivalent of a training position, without consulting with the communications committee. Nothing was stated to employees or put in writing as to whether mechanics and repairmen would be in the same job line or different job lines for seniority purposes. Four employees, Larry Sloane, J. B. Spencer, Virgil Fredericks, and James Osborn were assigned to the repairman jobs.

When the repairman classification was created, employees Ed Mullins and Roger Jett, who both were communications committee members, objected to the establishment of the new position. Mullins told Mine Manager Bill Harris that Star Fire had agreed not to create a training position without the approval of the employees and Jett warned him that it would lead to a strike. Mullins and Jett both equated the repairman's job with that of the mechanic II proposition that had been rejected by the employees only a month before.

Several strikes occurred during the summer and fall of 1985 after an employee was disciplined for refusing to work on a shift that included working on Sunday, an employee who had not received a job bid notice (while on vacation) walked off the job, and after additional pay was given to the drag line crew. No employees were disciplined as a result of their participation in these strikes.

On 8 October 1985, Respondent issued a notice to all employees that stated:

> During the past several months, our companies operations have been marked by a series of work disruptions . . . . This makes it difficult, if not impossible, to keep current contracts or win additional contracts . . . the work disruptions jeopardize our very livelihood yours and mine—and possible [sic] the existence of Mountain Coals.
> Means of communications for all our problems and concerns have been firmly established and are open to everyone—from the hourly employees up through the uppermost levels of management. Therefore, it should be known by every employee that Mountain Coals will not tolerate the actions of individual[s] that promote and initiate any disruptions of our companies operations. Individuals involved in initiating any such disruptions will be subject to disciplinary actions by the Company, up to, and including discharge."

Mine Manager Harris testified that, in the Company's view, the June and July strikes each had been caused by one individual and the notice was directed only at the specific individuals who had shut the job down, not at employees generally, however, the notice specifically referred to and was issued to "every" employee.

Raymond Combs was employed as a mechanic by Star Fire from 1983 until his discharge on 9 April 1986. Combs originally worked the first (day) shift but was moved to the second shift when Star Fires changed its operation from two shifts to three shifts in October 1985. One of the new repairman, J. B. Spencer, remained on the first shift. Although Combs had family-related reasons for preferring the first shift, he did not protest being moved to the second shift because he believed Spencer had more "company seniority" and he understood that company seniority was the determining factor for shift assignments under the new shift alignment.

In January 1986, Star Fire moved repairman Larry Sloane from second shift to first shift. Combs felt that he should have been given the opportunity to move to day shift ahead of Sloane because he had more job line seniority than Sloane and he successively brought his complaint to Maintenance Superintendent Henry Cherpak, Mine Manager Harris, Human Resources Representatives Tim Johnson and Sharon Maynard, and MCI Vice President and General Manager Robert Slack, arguing that mechanics and repairman were in the same job line, and therefore he should have been given the day shift job ahead of Sloane. Slack ultimately decided that Star Fire's decision to move Sloane to the day shift was in accord with the Company's seniority policy.[1]

Wayne Campbell, a third-shift mechanic who had taken part in the negotiations regarding the seniority policy as a member of the communications committee, testified that there was talk among the men about the moving of the repairman and that he believed that he, Combs, and Vernon Earl, another mechanic, all had been "bypassed," however, he did not voice his concern to management at that time.

In March 1986, the Company decided to move another repairman, Virgil Fredericks, to the day shift to replace Spencer, who had been injured on the job. Combs immediately complained to Cherpak but was told that his opinion had not changed. Combs then met with Maynard, and again complained that Star Fire was violating its job line seniority policy by moving a less-senior repairman around him and he requested a meeting with Robert Migliaccio, the new mine manager.

The following week Combs and Ed Mullins met with Migliaccio and Maynard. Mullins was a day-shift mechanic who previously had been selected by the employees to serve as a spokesman with management during the 1985 conflicts. He did most of the talking with Migliaccio and argued that the repairman position should be abolished because the Company had previously agreed not to establish a training position without the employees' approval. Mullins argued that if the repairman position was not abolished, it should be in the same job line as the mechanic position because the mechanics and repairmen did essentially the same work. Mullins also argued that the Company had violated the seniority policy in another instance when it put two new bulldozers on the job and hired new employees to operate them rather than offering the new equipment to the most senior dozer operators. Migliaccio promised he would investigate these matters further.

The following day, Mullins gave Maynard the original seniority policy proposal that had been presented to the communications committee in 1985 by Star Fire's management as his "proof" (inasmuch as the revisal did not reflect any training positions) that the employees had earlier rejected the mechanics I and II positions. The next week, on 31 March, Mullins met with Migliaccio alone and again discussed the seniority policy issue. At the conclusion of this meeting, Migliaccio announced that he was going to uphold the Company's original position that mechanics and repairmen were two separate job lines for seniority purposes. Mullins told Migliaccio that his decision "could result in a walkout."

That same evening, Migliaccio met with over 70 of Star Fire's first- and second-shift employees. He handed out a copy of the 22 April 1985 seniority policy with a cover memo dated 31 March 1986 and he discussed the employees' concerns regarding the seniority policy.

Combs and Mullins, as well as several other employees, including Buddy Engle, George Short, Blake Haddix, Lathan Nix, and Randy Hurt, argued that Star Fire was violating the seniority agreement. Mullins again mentioned the bypassing of senior operators for the new bulldozers. Operator Lathan Nix testified that he and other employees were "ready to go to the foot of the hill" (an expression that means to go on strike) but were dissuaded by Combs who said he would talk with management further and asked the employees to hold off a few weeks to see if something could be worked out.

Migliaccio held a similar meeting that night with the third-shift employees. Wayne Campbell told Migliaccio that mechanics were also being affected by the decision to allow the repairmen to bypass Combs on to the first shift. Roger Jett, a third equipment operator, who also was selected to represent employees at committee meetings, confirmed that he, as well as other employees, was upset by the creation of the repairman job but that because of concern over jobs and confusion at the time of the May layoff, no earlier complaint was made to management. After the 31 March meeting, however, both Campbell and Jett asked their night-shift foreman to have Migliaccio set up a communications committee meeting to discuss the job line security issue (after the initial meetings in 1985, no further meetings of the committee were held after September, despite the fact that Respondent had indicated that it would hold monthly meetings).

Subsequent to the latter meetings, Nix twice spoke with Migliaccio on the jobsite and told him that if "we" could not settle the job line seniority issue, it would "go to the foot of the hill." Nix and others also told Migliaccio of past agreements between management and the employees on the issue and Migliaccio requested that they produce a company-signed agreement that there would be no repairman. In response, Mullins provided a copy of Respondent's proposal dated 18 April, and another employee provided a group of negotiation documents from the 1985 strike negotiations, which resulted in the memo of 13 February signed by Morris and reflected the above-noted seniority provisions. Migliaccio testified that he subsequently called Morris at his new job assignment for Respondent's parent company and said that Morris gave him no specific confirmation of an agreement. Migliaccio then saw Combs on the road, stopped him, and asked for any additional documentation. Combs' said he did not have any and Magliaccio then said "My decision won't make you happy." Combs returned to his work area and told the other four shift mechanics of Migliaccio's decision and they agreed it was time to meet at the foot of the hill Monday morning.

[1] Harris left Star Fire in late January 1986. He was replaced by Robert Migliaccio, who began work on February 24, 1986. Slack replaced Jim Morris (who had participated in negotiations of the seniority policy) as vice president and general manager on January 21, 1986; and Larry Manzanares replaced Bill Pebley as manager of human resources in May 1985.

On 8 April Combs arrived at the foot of the hill between 5:30 and 6 a.m. and began letting arriving Star Fire employees know there was a strike. One employee continued to the jobsite, but all others pulled over and between 50 and 100 employees joined the picket line.

Shortly thereafter Migliaccio was notified of the employees work stoppage and went to the site with Maynard. Maynard testified when they first stopped she saw Combs and, after she asked him what was going on, he replied, "Its about this repairman thing, Sharon. I'm the one that stopped these boys here." Migliaccio, however, mentioned no such conversation, but did say everyone crowded around them. Migliaccio told them that there was a company policy against any strike and asked that they go back on the hill and work it out. Combs testified that he initially said nothing, but that someone else yelled out to Migliaccio that: "the only way we can get your attention is to come to the foot of the hill." When Migliaccio then accused Combs of stopping the entire Company from working, Buddy Engle spoke up and told Migliaccio: "He didn't stop me, we stopped ourselves. He wasn't the one that stopped us, because we knowed what was going on." Then, several employees including Combs, Mullins, and Jett spoke to Migliaccio about the repairman-seniority problem. It was decided that the employees would chose a committee to develop a proposal for ending the strike and present it to Migliaccio. The strikers chose Combs, Mullins, and Sloane. These three went on the jobsite and me with Migliaccio, Maynard, and Joel Davis, Star Fire's production superintendent. The committee proposed that the employees would end the strike if Respondent would move Combs to first shift, retain Sloane on first shift, mingle repairmen and mechanics seniority in a single job line, and permit repairmen to take a test to qualify for vacant mechanic positions. The meeting ended without an agreement. Later, on the afternoon of 8 April, some employees from Respondent's Lost Mountain mine stopped at the picket line and told the strikers that the Lost Mountain employees would honor the strike if a few Star Fire employees would come to the Lost Mountain jobsite.

That evening Migliaccio called Combs at his home and arranged to meet him in Hazard. Migliaccio met Combs and handed him a suspension notice, which stated that Combs was immediately being placed on suspension for a period of 10 working days without pay for his admittedly causing a work stoppage at Star Fire on 8 April 1986. The suspension also referred to Respondent's policy notice of 7 October 1985 and warned Combs that if he continued disrupting the work force, it would be forced to discharge him.

After receiving the suspension notice, Combs went to speak with a "spokesman" for Respondent's Lost Mountain facility. The suspension notice and the job line seniority dispute were discussed and the spokesman reasserted an offer, made earlier that day, that the Lost Mountain employees would support the Star Fire strike if some of their employees came to the Lost Mountain site the following morning.

The next morning, Combs went to the Lost Mountain site and found one Lost Mountain employee, Carlin Jones, already at the picket line. Soon thereafter, Wayne Campbell and Roger Jett arrived, as well as two Lost Mountain "spokesmen" who began stopping other employees as they arrived.

Most employees parked their vehicles and did not report to work. Later that morning, Larry Manzanares, Respondent's new human resources manager, and Maynard, Star Fire's human resources representative, arrived at the Lost Mountain picket line and spoke briefly with Combs, Campbell, and Jett. During their discussion, Combs told Manzanares that Star Fire was violating the job line seniority policy. That evening, a letter was delivered to Combs' home, stating that he was terminated: "because of your continued activities in causing further work stoppages at the Lost Mountain Mining and Buckhorn Processing operations."

On Thursday, April 10, most employees went up to the Star Fire office to get their paychecks. All employees received a letter from Respondent stating that "failure on your part to report for your regularly scheduled shift beginning Sunday night, April 13, 1986, will leave the Company no choice but to assume that you have abandoned your job and your services will be terminated effective on date you last worked." The letter also told employees that the employee who had initiated the "disruptions" had been terminated. Attached to each letter was a copy of the 8 October 1985 policy notice.

After learning of the warnings, Combs told the other employees to return to work and that he would handle his case through the Labor Board. Employees returned to work on 11 April 1986, however, when Campbell and Jett reported they were informed that they were suspended for 10 days "as a disciplinary action . . . for causing a work stoppage at Lost Mountain Mining and Buckhorn Processing."

III. DISCUSSION

The issues in these cases arose over a brief work stoppage that followed a series of actions by Respondent in which Raymond Combs was bypassed for transfer to first shift. As discussed below, Combs and other employees perceived Respondent's action to be violative of their seniority rights that they believed the Company had endorsed as part of an agreement that followed their return to work after some earlier work disruptions in 1985.

A. Concerted Activity

Respondent, citing Meyers Industries, 268 NLRB 493 (1984), argues that Combs' dispute with management involved a purely personal gripe rather than a protected, concerted activity. It further contends that, in any event, it lacked any knowledge of the alleged concerted nature of Combs' complaint, and that its discipline of the three employees was motivated by its desire to avoid costly work stoppages rather than retaliate against alleged protected concerted activity.

Contrary to Respondent's argument, I find that the record is more than ample to show concerted activity by Combs, Campbell, Jett, and other employees. Respondent also had contact with several employee representatives or "spokesmen" (including Mullins, Campbell, and Jett), both in the context of communications committee meetings and subsequent informal contacts where these spokesmen expressed their concerns over the same matter that most directly affected Combs. It is clear that the issue of job line security was a matter of particular concern to many employees and the subject also was discussed in meetings and written about in management documents during and after the work stoppage that occurred in early 1985.

In May, when the repairman position was created, committee members Mullins and Jett both complained to Mine Manager Harris that the employees had not agreed to it and warned that it could lead to a strike. Combs' seniority concern was presented to management on two separate occasions when he first was moved to second shift after Star Fire began a three-shift operation. In January 1986, Combs attempted to bring his concern to all levels of management and the grievance expressed was tied in with the job line security issue, the creation of training positions, and the rejected proposal to create a mechanic II position, all subjects that employees had discussed with management during earlier communications committee meetings. Although it is apparent that nothing definitive subsequently was put in writing saying that the new repairman positions would be in the mechanics job line for seniority purposes, it is equally apparent that no understanding was reached that they would be separate job lines and clearly nothing was put in writing to this effect.

Committee member Campbell testified that when Combs was bypassed in January, he spoke with others who shared his belief that he, Combs, and other employees also had their seniority bypassed. Although Campbell did not speak to management at this time, Mullins joined with Combs and actively presented the employees' argument to Megliaccio.

It is noted that Respondent contends that because employees have access to a "Problem-Solving Process," it is entitled to legitimately impose discipline to maintain productivity when employees go beyond the process and engage in a work stoppage. It appears, however, that when Combs repeatedly tried to avail himself of the process, his attempts went unrecognized and effectively were belittled and dismissed in the eyes of Respondent's personnel people, especially human resources associate Maynard. Here, Maynard repeatedly gave self-serving testimony to minimize the nature of Combs' complaint and to support her alleged perception of the matter as an isolated personal case of no interest to anyone else. Yet, as she also acknowledged, Combs told her the only time "the Company" would listen is when "they" go to the foot of the hill, the same sentiment shouted out by another employee when, after Mine Manager Migliaccio asked employees to go back to the job and work out their problems.

Respondent also attempts to discount Mullins' participation in the January meeting with Migliaccio because it was Migliaccio who suggested that Combs be accompanied by a spokesman. Mullins, however, testified that Combs had voiced his complaint over Sloane's transfer when it first occurred and that Mullins twice recommended to Combs that he first go to the Company and try to work it out. Mullins' argument to Migliaccio also was made in terms of management's violation of what Mullins termed "our agreement" on seniority issues, as evidenced by Respondent's 18 April policy statement to all employees that omitted the mechanic II proposal that previously had been presented by management.

The independent testimony of several employees also shows that they had their own concern over the seniority policy prior to the actual work stoppage, which itself was supported by several hundred workers.

Specifically, it is shown that Migliaccio met with employees on 31 March and heard complaints from at least five different employees who expressed their concern over violations of the seniority policy. Employees said at that time that they were "ready to go to the foot of the hill" and Campbell specifically told Migliaccio he and others were being affected by the bypassing of Combs. Subsequently, both Campbell and Jett also asked their night-shift foreman to set up a committee meeting to discuss these concerns. Accordingly, I find that Combs' alleged "individual" complaint, clearly was already a matter of group concern and activity that had been communicated to Respondent's mine manager and other supervisors prior to the time of the actual strike.

Under these circumstances it is clear that the strike, with 300 employees participating at both locations, was a continuation of the employees' concerted complaints, regardless of the fact that it was precipitated by management's refusal to reconsider the alleged bypassing of one particular employee. It also is clear that management was well aware that several other employees had independently expressed or joined in the complaint over Respondent's practice of implementation of transfer without apparent regard to seniority. In this connection, I specifically find implausible the testimony by human resources representative Maynard and General Manager Robert Slack to the effect that Combs gratuitously volunteered to each of them that he did not have any backing (also attributed to Mullins), and that he said he individually started the strike. It is contrary to the weight of the credible evidence of other witnesses, and I find such testimony to be so self-serving and lacking in probative value that it cannot prevail over the clear and convincing evidence that numerous employees otherwise engaged in continuing, concerted complaints and that Mine Manager Migliaccio and other supervisors were well aware of the employees' complaints.

I also conclude that inasmuch as Mullins, Campbell, and Jett also were known by management to be "committee" representatives or "spokesmen" selected by the other employees, it should have known that their expressions relating to terms and conditions of employment reflected the mutual concerns of other employees. Otherwise, it is clear that Respondent understood that the strike concerned not only Respondent's failure to move Combs to first shift, but also the manner in which the repairman position was being used to interfere generally with seniority rights and it understood that employees in other job lines, including operations and truckdrivers, were concerned about possible changes in their job lines that could result in their loss of opportunities to move to a preferred shift or to a preferred piece of equipment.

The employee concerns directly related to terms and conditions of employment and are clearly reasonable concerns, regardless of the ultimate merit of the underlying complaint with respect to Combs.

Here, the employee concerns and the resulting strike were not based on bad faith or one individuals' personal benefit, see Interior Alterations, 264 NLRB 677 (1982), and there is no indication that the employees engaged in any violent, disloyal, or inherently egregious activity that, under some circumstances, might adversely affect their rights to protection under the Act. Respondent's argument that it lost several days of production due to the strike is irrelevant to the question of whether the strike was protected, see East Chicago Rehabilitation Center, 259 NLRB 996 (1982). And, accordingly, I conclude that the strike was a protected concerted activity based on the employees' reasonable belief that Respondent was engaged in practices that adversely affected the terms and conditions of their employment. I further conclude that management knew of the concerted nature of the activity when it suspended or discharged employees known to be participants in that activity, see Consumers Power Co., 282 NLRB 130 (1986).

B. Suspension and Termination

It is well established that when unrepresented (nonunionized) employees jointly participate in withholding their services (strike) for the purpose of pressuring their employer into resolving to their satisfaction grievances over their rates of pay, wages, hours, or working conditions, they engage in "concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection" within the meaning of Section 7 of the Act, and it is a violation of the Act for their employer to discharge, suspend, or otherwise interfere with, restrain, or coerce them for engaging in such activity. See San Diego County Assn. for the Retarded, 259 NLRB 1044 (1982), and cases cited. It also is unlawful for an employer to retaliate against an employee because he picketed, as did Combs, at a location other than his normal place of employment. Consolidation Coal Co., 266 NLRB 670 (1983).

Here, the record shows that shortly after the strike began Respondent met with Combs and two other employee representatives and was told that their demands included a specific request that Combs be moved to first shift and that repairmen and mechanics' seniority be in a single job line. Shortly thereafter Respondent gave Combs a letter suspending him for 10 days for causing the work stoppage at Star Fire. The following day management observed and spoke with Combs, Campbell, and Jett at the Lost Mountain Mine and Buckhorn Processing work stoppage. It then issued the same suspension letter to Campbell and Jett, as well as a followup letter of termination to Combs, stating in each instance that the disciplinary action was taken because of their causing a work stoppage. No contention was made or evidence presented to indicate that Combs, Jett, or Campbell blocked employees' ingress or egress or that they trespassed or otherwise engaged in any misconduct.

Under these circumstances it is undisputed that Combs, Campbell, and Jett were disciplined for their participation in activity that otherwise is shown to be protected and concerted. Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent's action in this regard is shown to be in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act, as alleged.

C. The Rule and Threat Against Work Stoppage

In the absence of binding collective-bargaining agreement containing a valid no-strike clause, employees have a right to strike and an employer may not interfere with that right by threatening without qualification to retaliate against employees who exercise such rights. Here, the records show that Repondent issued a notice 8 October 1985, to all employees, which said:

> Individuals involved in initiating any such (work) disruptions will be subject to disciplinary action by the Company up to and including discharge.

This same notice was attached and referred to in the letter that Respondent gave to all employees on 10 April, after the strike had started. This letter also stated that employees "will be terminated" on failure to report for their regular shifts beginning Sunday night, 13 April.

An employer's threats to terminate or discipline employees because they engaged in rights protected by Section 7 of the Act constitute illegal interference. As noted above, the concerted withholding of services in an attempt to resolve grievances over terms and conditions of employment is a protected right. Respondent was well aware of the nature and cause of the employees' strike when it made its termination threat and reissued its disciplinary rule pertaining to work stoppages. As noted by the General Counsel, while strikers may lose their protected status by engaging in serious misconduct or for certain other reasons, no such qualifications were incorporated in Respondent's letter or notice. Here, the timing of the threat and reissuance of the notice on Thursday, the second day of the strike, with an almost immediately effective date for termination after only one additional regular working day, clearly demonstrated the coercive and intimidating nature of Respondent's interference with its employees' rights. Although the rule seemingly threatens only the "initiator" of a work disruption, it threatens to discipline "any" employee who "initiates' a strike, regardless of the possible protected nature reasons for employees to initiate a grievance.

Accordingly, I conclude that Respondent's letter threat of 10 April to terminate employees if they did not return to work and Respondent's reissuance of its 8 October notice with its unqualified and overly broad rule providing for discipline, including discharge, for "individuals" involved in initiating "any" work disruptions, are both violations of Section (8)(1) of the Act, as alleged.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

1. Respondent is an employer engaged in commerce within the meaning of Section 2(6) and (7) of the Act.

2. By discharging Raymond Combs on 9 April 1986 and by suspending Combs on 8 April 1986 and suspending Wayne Campbell and Roger Jett on 9 April 1986 for engaging in a lawful strike, Respondent engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

3. By threatening to terminate employees who did not return by 13 April 1986 and by repromulgating a rule providing for discipline, including discharge, for individuals involved in initiating any work disruptions, Respondent has interfered with, restrained, and coerced employees in the exercise of their rights guaranteed them by Section 7 of the Act, and thereby has engaged in unfair labor practices in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of the Act.

REMEDY

Having found that the Respondent has engaged in certain unfair labor practices, I find it necessary to order it to cease and desist and to take certain affirmative action designed to effectuate the policies of the Act.

The Respondent having discriminatorily suspended Wayne Campbell and Roger Jett for 10 days and terminated Raymond Combs, I find it necessary to order it to offer Combs reinstatement to his former position and to revoke the suspension of Campbell and Jett, with compensation for loss of pay and other benefits, in accordance with F. W. Woolworth Co., 90 NLRB 289 (1950), plus interest as computed in Florida Steel Corp., 231 NLRB 651 (1977). It also shall remove from its files any reference to the suspensions and termination and notify them in writing that it has been done and that evidence of such unlawful action will not be used as a basis for further action against them. See Sterling Sugars, 261 NLRB 472 (1982). Otherwise, because of the serious nature of the violations and an overall display of a general disregard for the employees' fundamental rights, I find it necessary to issue a broad order, requiring the Respondent to cease and desist from infringing in any other manner on rights guaranteed employees by Section 7 of the Act. See Hickmott Foods, 242 NLRB 1357 (1979).

As part of the relief sought, the General Counsel also seeks imposition of a so-called visitatorial clause whereby the Board would be authorized to engage in certain discovery activities in order to monitor compliance. Although the imposition of such a provision recently has become a somewhat common practice, there is no showing that it is of particular applicability to the unfair labor practices involved in this proceeding. Accordingly, the request is denied and no visitatorial clause will be imposed as part of the order.

On these findings of fact and conclusions of law and on the entire record, I issue the following recommended[2]

ORDER

The Respondent, MCI Mining Corporation, Bulan, Kentucky, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall

1. Cease and desist from

(a) Suspending, discharging, or otherwise disciplining its employees for engaging in a strike for the purpose of securing satisfactory resolution of their work-related grievances.

(b) Threatening its employees with termination for engaging in a strike.

(c) Maintaining or enforcing any rule that threatens discipline, including discharge, for being involved in initiating a strike.

(d) In any other manner interfering with, restraining, or coercing employees for engaging in a protected concerted activity in the exercise of their rights guaranteed under Section 7 of the Act.

2. Take the following affirmative action necessary to effectuate the policies of the Act.

(a) Offer Raymond Combs immediate and full reinstatement to his former or equivalent position and make him whole for the losses he incurred as a result of the discrimination against him in the manner specified in the remedy section, and remove from its files any references to his termination on 9 April 1985 and notify him in writing that this has been done and that evidence of this unlawful separation will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against him.

(b) Revoke the suspensions of Raymond Combs, Wayne Campbell, and Roger Jett, and make them whole for the losses they incurred as a result of the discrimination against them in the manner specified in the remedy section, and remove from its files any references to these suspensions and notify them in writing that this has been done and that evidence of these unlawful suspensions will not be used as a basis for future personnel actions against them.

(c) Issue a notice to all employees revoking its notice of 8 October 1985, as repromulgated by its letter to all employees dated 10 April 1986.

(d) Preserve and, on request, make available to the Board or its agents, for examination and copying, all records, reports, and other documents necessary to analyze the amount of backpay due under the terms of this decision.

(e) Post at its Star Fire Coal, Lost Mountain Mining, and Buckhorn Processing facilities copies of the attached notice marked "Appendix."[3] Copies of the notice, on

23 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS JOHANSEN AND CRACRAFT

On 8 December 1986 Administrative Law Judge George Christensen issued the attached decision. The General Counsel filed exceptions and a supporting brief, and the Respondent filed a brief in response to the General Counsel's exceptions.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and record in light of the exceptions and briefs and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings,[1] and conclusions and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The recommended Order of the administrative law judge is adopted and the complaint is dismissed.

[1] The General Counsel has excepted to some of the judge's credibility findings. The Board's established policy is not to overrule an administrative law judge's credibility resolutions unless the clear preponderance of all the relevant evidence convinces us that they are incorrect. Standard Dry Wall Products, 91 NLRB 544 (1950), enfd. 188 F.2d 362 (3d Cir. 1951). We have carefully examined the record and find no basis for reversing the findings.

Additionally, the General Counsel excepted to alleged failures by the judge to make certain credibility resolutions of conflicts in the testimony of Lieutenant Hanner and the General Counsel's witnesses concerning the 16 April 1986 incident. Footnote 3 of the judge's decision addresses just such concerns. The judge notes that every conflict has not been specifically resolved, then gives the basis for his findings, and concludes "therefore, any testimony in the record that is inconsistent with my findings is discredited." Implicitly all conflicts are resolved by the footnote. Even resolving the conflicts in the light most favorable to the General Counsel, the evidence fails to establish a violation. The testimonial conflicts pertain to inconsequential facts, which are of no significance in determining whether the Respondent's conduct was violative of the Act.

We agree with the judge's dismissal of the complaint. We note that this case does not present an access issue. Rather, the issue is whether the Respondent, through its agent, Lieutenant Hanner, engaged in conduct that under the specific circumstances of this case tended to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of their Sec. 7 rights. The record evidence establishes that the Employer uniformly adhered to a policy of allowing only employees to distribute literature at its employee entrance gates. In furtherance of this policy the Respondent had a legitimate interest in determining the identity of the leafletters. In light of the fact that the Respondent employs over 2000 employees at the plant in question, it is reasonable that the Respondent would need to inquire as to the identity of those leafletting in order to ascertain that they were indeed employees. Further, it is clear that the Respondent, upon learning that the leafletters were employees (with one possible exception), did nothing which interfered with further distribution of the leaflets. Thus, we find that the Respondent's security guard's actions did not violate Sec. 8(a)(1).

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

GEORGE CHRISTENSEN, Administrative Law Judge. On 24 and 25 September 1986[1] I conducted a hearing at Phoenix, Arizona, to try issues raised by a complaint issued on 16 May based on original and amended charges filed on 17 and 18 April by the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace and Agricultural Implement Workers of America, AFL–CIO (UAW).

The complaint alleged on 16 April a security officer employed by McDonnell Douglas Helicopter Company (MDHC)—Guard Lieutenant Richard Hanner—surveilled, demanded and wrote down the names of several persons distributing UAW literature to employees entering and leaving MDHC's premises during a midafternoon shift change, thereby violating Section 8(a)(1) of the National Labor Relations Act (Act).

In its answer to the complaint, MDHC admitted at times material it employed Hanner as a guard lieutenant but denied Hanner was acting as its agent, denied Hanner committed the acts attributed to him, and denied violating the Act.

The issues raised by the above are: (1) whether at times material Hanner was an agent of MDHC acting on its behalf; (2) if so, whether Hanner committed the acts attributed to him; and (3) if so, whether MDHC thereby violated the Act.

The General Counsel and MDHC appeared by counsel and were afforded full opportunity to adduce evidence, examine and cross-examine witnesses, argue, and file briefs. Both counsels filed briefs.

Based on my review of the entire record,[2] observation of the witnesses, perusal of the briefs and research, I enter the following[3]

FINDINGS OF FACT

I. JURISDICTION AND LABOR ORGANIZATION

The complaint alleged, the answer admitted, and I find at all pertinent times MDHC was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce and UAW was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

[2] The General Counsel moved to correct the transcript by changing the word "counsel" at p. 100, 7, to "console." The motion is denied; instead, the word "personnel" shall be substituted.

[3] Although every apparent or nonapparent conflict in the evidence has not been specifically resolved below, my findings are based on my examination of the entire record, my observation of the witnesses' demeanor while testifying, and my evaluation of the reliability of their testimony; therefore, any testimony in the record that is inconsistent with my findings is discredited.

II. THE ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Facts

MDHC manufactures military helicopters at Mesa, Arizona. Its facilities include a flight line, hangers, a warehouse, an office building, a large plant, and a parking lot. All the facilities just named are on MDHC property. The buildings are enclosed by a high chain-link fence. After parking their autos within the parking lot, employees pass through one of three gates in proceeding to and exiting from their work stations. One gate has a turnstile released by a guard at a central control room following his comparison of the picture on an identification badge inserted by an entering employee in a slot at the turnstile with the face of the entrant reflected on a screen coupled to a camera at the turnstile. A gate next to the turnstile is opened at shift changes for the use of exiting employees, after displaying their badges to a guard stationed inside the gate. Another gate is the entrance to/exit from the main lobby of the office building. There, guards stationed inside the outer door to the lobby (the door between the parking lot and the lobby) scrutinize the badges of employees coming through the outside door and proceeding towards the inside door (the door leading from the lobby towards the plant) and employees coming through the inside door and proceeding towards the outside door. Guards are stationed at a guard shack inside a third gate in the chain-link fence and monitor the badges of employees passing between the parking lot and the plant.

UAW conducted an organizing campaign at MDHC's facilities in 1985. Early in the campaign (in March 1985), MDHC guards checked badges worn by persons distributing UAW literature to its employees during a shift change on MDHC property (on the parking lot, just outside the three gates described above), noted names of the distributors, checked the names against indexes maintained by MDHC and its parent company, ascertained some of the distributors were MDHC employees and some were employees of other divisions of MDHC's parent company, and barred the latter from further distribution on its premises.[4]

UAW supporters among MDHC's employees frequently destributed UAW literature at the locations described above during shift changes between March and 6 November 1985, when an election was conducted under Board auspices.[5]

Since 6 November 1985, UAW supporters distributed UAW literature at the three locations one in mid-March and on 16 April.[6]

The 16 April distribution occurred at the midafternoon shift change—between 3:20 and 3:50 p.m. Over 2000 employees pass through the three gates during that period. Doris Hunt, an MDHC employee scheduled to begin work on the second shift at 4 p.m., arrived at one of the gates about 3:20 p.m. and began to distribute UAW literature to entering employees and (after 3:30 p.m., when the first shift ended) to exiting employees. A guard stationed inside the gate came out shortly after Hunt began distributing literature, asked what Hunt was doing, was informed she was distributing union literature, asked for a copy, and received one. The guard reentered the gate and reported to someone unknown to Hunt literature was being distributed outside the gate.

Hunt was joined by first shift employee Lana Johnson about 3:35 p.m. and Johnson immediately began assisting Hunt in distributing literature. Distributors John Thomas, Guy Terry, George Johnson, Betty Johnson, and Jerry Fletcher appeared at the other two gates shortly after 3:30 p.m. All but Betty Johnson were first shift employees.[7] All but Betty Johnson wore MDHC identification badges.[8]

MDHC employs a guard force on shifts covering the full 24 hours of each day. Each shift is in charge of a watch commander carrying the rank of lieutenant. The guard force is equipped with sidearms and walkie-talkies while on duty. The guard headquarters are in a centrally located control room. The facility's radio and telephone communications, a control panel monitoring, inter alia, cameras covering the parking lot and the turnstile, are located within the control room. Guards man the control panel.

On 16 April, Guard Lieutenant Richard Hanner was the watch commander for a guard shift ending at 3 p.m. Lieutenant Carl Fullenwider was the watch commander for a guard shift commencing at 3 p.m. On completing his 16 April shift, Hanner turned in his sidearm and walkie-talkie, but remained in the control room to complete some paperwork. He received a message from one of the gate guards about 3:30 p.m. that literature was being distributed at one of the gates and transmitted that information to Fullenwider. The two scrutinized the screens projecting images from the parking lot and noted individuals distributing literature at all three gates but, due to the low resolution of the parking lot cameras, were unable to determine the identity of the distributors or whether they were wearing MDHC identification badges. Fullenwider telephoned MDHC's employee relations director, reported what he and Hanner observed, and on completing the call, informed Hanner he had been directed to get the names of the distributors and determine whether they were MDHC employees and asked Hanner to go to the three gates to carry out those instructions.[9] Hanner agreed to carry out the requested investigation.

[5] Pursuant to a direction of election issued in Case 28–RC–4300, UAW lost the election, filed election objections and unfair labor practice charges alleging MDHC conduct during the campaign prevented a fair election and violated the Act, a complaint was issued, the complaint allegations and election objections were consolidated for hearing purposes, and a hearing is currently under way.

[6] Two of the 16 April distributors—Doris Hunt and John Thomas—were distributors on 16 April, in mid-March and on numerous other dates between March and November 1985.

[7] Betty Johnson was George Johnson's wife and was employed by a contractor working within MDHC's premises.

[8] Contractor employees were required to surrender their badges before passing through an exit gate.

[9] Fullenwider was still getting his shift organized and had a spur on one heel, which made it painful for him to walk any distance.

About 3:35 p.m. Hanner took a clipboard and pad, left the control room, went to each gate, asked each distributor to display his MDHC identification badge, asked each for his or her name, and wrote the name of each distributor on his pad. He did not ask any of the distributors to cease distribution, he did not threaten any distributor with discipline, and he replied to their inquiries the reason for his actions with statements he was only doing his job, he was carrying out instructions, or the like.

Hanner spent about 1 minute addressing each of the seven distributors and returned to the control room about 3:50 p.m. On his return, he and Fullenwider checked MDHC's employee indexes, confirmed all the distributors other than Betty Johnson were current MDHC employees and identified Betty Johnson as the current employee of an MDHC contractor.[10] Hanner and Fullenwider subsequently prepared and forwarded to employee relations standard investigation reports containing the information employee relations requested; i.e., the names of the seven distributors and their current employee status.

There is no evidence any entries were made in the personnel files of the six MDHC employees, any disciplinary action was taken against the six or that Betty Johnson's employment status was affected.

B. Analysis and Conclusions

1. The agency issue

Although Hanner may not have been on paid time while carrying out Fullenwider's request that he investigate the employment status of the distributors,[11] he certainly was carrying out security duties assigned to the guard forces by MDHC management, as the alter ego of the man assigned to perform those duties—Fullenwider. I therefore find that while conducting his investigation and making his report Hanner was an agent of MDHC, acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

2. Commission of the acts alleged in the complaint

I have entered findings on 16 April, that Hanner asked the seven individuals distributing UAW literature on MDHC property to show him their MDHC employee identification badges, asked for their names, wrote their names on a pad, and wrote a report advising MDHC's employee relations director the names of the seven distributors and their employee status, all as alleged in the complaint and denied in the answer.

[10] Which differed from Betty Johnson's statement to Hanner at the gate; i.e., that she was an MDHC employee but had forgotten her identification badge that day and secured a temporary badge while working the first shift, which, in accordance with normal procedure, she turned in on completing her shift.

[11] The record does not disclose Hanner's pay status (salaried or hourly) nor whether he was paid for the time he spent carrying out employee relations' instructions.

3. Did MDHC violate the Act by virtue of Hanner's actions

Conflicts between the rights of a union to communicate with employees on their employer's property and their employer's right to limit union access to that property for that purpose has been the subject of voluminous litigation.

In cases concerning that conflict, the United States Supreme Court has ruled that it is the Board's function "to seek a proper accommodation between the two"[12] ". . . with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other"[13] and, as the Board noted in a recent case, "the claim of a party to one or the other of these rights will have varying degrees of strength depending on the facts of the particular case."[14]

In this case, most of the over 2000 employees who pass through the gates at the midafternoon shift change passed by the UAW distributors before Hanner arrived. It is doubtful more than a few were prevented from receiving UAW literature during the few minutes Hanner conversed with the seven distributors.

MDHC had a legitimate interest in identifying the distributors to see if they were lawfully entitled to distribute literature on its property and, having ascertained (with one possible exception) they were, neither interfered with nor prevented the distribution and neither threatened to nor instituted any disciplinary action against the distributors.

On these facts, I find MDHC's right to police its property in furtherance of its lawful policies had minimal impact on any employee rights under Section 7 of the Act, and therefore MDHC did not violate the Act by Hanner's actions.[15]

Conclusions of Law

1. At all pertinent times, MDHC was an employer engaged in commerce in a business affecting commerce and UAW was a labor organization within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

2. At all pertinent times Richard Hanner was an agent of MDHC acting on its behalf within the meaning of Section 2 of the Act.

3. MDHC did not violate the Act by Hanner's 16 April inspection of the employee badges of the persons distributing UAW literature on MDHC property, his requesting their names, his writing their names on a scratch pad, his checking MDHC employee indexes to determine current employee status, and his preparation and submission of a report to higher management detailing the foregoing.

23 April 1987

DECISION AND ORDER

BY CHAIRMAN DOTSON AND MEMBERS STEPHENS AND CRACRAFT

On 17 September 1986 Administrative Law Judge Howard I. Grossman issued the attached decision. The Respondent filed exceptions and a supporting brief.

The National Labor Relations Board has delegated its authority in this proceeding to a three-member panel.

The Board has considered the decision and the record in light of the exceptions and brief[1] and has decided to affirm the judge's rulings, findings, and conclusions[2] and to adopt the recommended Order.

ORDER

The National Labor Relations Board adopts the recommended Order of the administrative law judge and orders that the Respondent, Brinks, Incorporated of Florida, Fort Lauderdale, Florida, its officers, agents, successors, and assigns, shall take the action set forth in the Order.

[1] The Respondent has requested oral argument. The request is denied as the record, exceptions, and brief adequately present the issues and the positions of the parties.

[2] In adopting the judge's conclusion that the Respondent has not shown that Local 555, I.S.O.P.G.U. is directly or indirectly affiliated with Teamsters Local 390, we note the absence of any objective evidence that the conduct of Local 555's officers was a ruse designed to disguise the de facto control by Local 390, as well as the absence of any evidence that Local 390 even attempted to influence Local 555's affairs. As the judge found, the circumstances of this case are distinguishable from Board cases in which the fatal taint of affiliation has been established. However, we emphasize that should evidence of Local 555's loss of independence and separate identity and purpose be forthcoming, the Respondent's obligation to bargain with it concerning its guards may again be called into question.

Eduardo Soto, Esq., for the General Counsel.

Jeffrey W. Pagano, Esq. (Seligman & Seligman), of New York, New York, and Leo P. Rock Jr., Esq. (Gray, Harris & Robinson), of Orlando, Florida, for the Respondent.

Stephen Davis, Esq. (Davis & Davis), of New York, New York, for Local 555.

Thomas J. Pilacek, Esq. (Pilacek & Cohen), of Orlando, Florida, and Peter Chiafalo, of Miami, Florida, for Teamsters Local 390.[1]

DECISION

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

HOWARD I. GROSSMAN, Administrative Law Judge. Local 555, International Union of Police & Protection Employees, I.S.O.P.G.U. (Local 555 or the Petitioner) filed a petition in Case 12–RC–6236 on 15 March 1982 seeking to represent armored car guards employed by Brinks, Incorporated of Florida (the Respondent or the Company) at its Fort Lauderdale, Florida facility. The petition was withdrawn, and a similar petition was filed on 31 March 1982 in Case 12–RC–6244.

A first election was held on 3 June 1982, and the tally of ballots showed six votes for and seven against the Petitioner. The Petitioner filed objections which, after a hearing, were sustained by the Board on 3 December 1982. Thereafter, on 11 January 1983, a second election was held which resulted in eight votes cast for and three against the Petitioner, with no challenged ballots. On 14 January 1983 the Company filed objections that, inter alia, alleged that the Petitioner was "affiliated with Teamsters Local 390, which admits nonguards to membership," and, therefore, that certification would violate Section 9(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act (the Act).[2]

The Regional Director for Region 12 issued his Supplemental Decision on Objections, Order and Certification of Representative on 16 February 1983, in which he overruled all the Company's objections and certified Local 555 as the representative of the Company's guards at the Fort Lauderdale facility. With respect to the objections, the Regional Director noted the Company's evidence concerning membership of the Petitioner's officers in Teamsters Local 390, and rejected this evidence as a basis for disqualification of Local 555. He also noted the Company's position that one of the Petitioner's officers was a business partner of Teamsters Local 390, and one was a Teamsters Local 390 steward. This evidence was rejected because it was not shown to be newly discovered or previously unavailable. Finally, the Regional Director considered previously unavailable company evidence to the effect that Teamsters Local 390 President Lark told the Company at a bargaining session that he was prepared to act as an "interceding union" on behalf of Local 555 and negotiate wages for the Fort Lauderdale employees. The Regional Director also noted evidence from Locals 555 and 390 denying these contentions. He rejected the Company's evidence on the ground that, even if true, it did not establish that Local 555 had authorized Local 390 to act on its behalf.[3]

The Company thereafter filed a request for review, in which it repeated the foregoing arguments and requested a hearing.[4] On 2 August 1983 the Board denied the request for review, Member Dennis dissenting in part.[5]

[1] The Company served subpoenas on officers of Teamsters Local 390, which, although not a party to the proceeding, made a special appearance.

A complaint was issued on 14 September 1983, and alleged in essence that the Respondent had violated Section 8(a)(1) and (5) of the Act by failing to recognize and bargain with Local 555. On 21 September 1983 the Respondent filed its answer admitting in part and denying in part the allegations in the complaint, and also filed a motion to consolidate this case with another case, and to incorporate the record in Case 12–RC–6244. On 7 October 1983 the General Counsel filed a Motion for Summary Judgment. Thereafter, on 19 October 1983, the Board issued a Notice to Show Cause why the motions should not be granted, and the Respondent and the General Counsel filed responses.

The Board denied the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment in its Decision and Order dated 27 August 1985.[6] It noted the Company's contention that the certification contravened Section 9(b)(3) of the Act because Local 555 was affiliated with Teamsters Local 390, an organization which admits to membership employees other than guards. The Board restated the established rule prohibiting relitigation of issues in an 8(a)(5) hearing that were or could have been litigated in a prior representation proceeding in the absence of newly discovered and previously unavailable evidence or special circumstances. In the instant case, the Board found such special circumstances to exist because Local 555's possible affiliation with an organization which admitted nonguards to membership would statutorily preclude its certification. The Board recited the Company's evidence in support of this contention as set forth above.

In denying the General Counsel's Motion for Summary Judgment, the Board remanded the proceeding to the Regional Director for an evidentiary hearing before an administrative law judge on Local 555's "alleged affiliation with an organization that admits nonguards to membership." In the Order itself the Board directed a hearing "on the Company's allegations that certification of Local 555 . . . contravenes Section 9(b)(3) of the Act."[7]

The Regional Director for Region 12 issued a notice of hearing, and hearings were thereafter held before me on 16 and 30 December 1985 and 3, 7, and 8 January, 3, 10, and 21 February, and 28 and 29 April 1986, either on the telephone or in Miami, Florida. Thereafter, the Company submitted a brief. On the entire record and on my observation of the demeanor of the witnesses, I make the following

FINDINGS OF FACTS

I. ALLEGED UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

A. Procedural Rulings

At the hearing on 30 December 1985, I ruled that the issues before me under the Board's remand Order were limited to evidence previously submitted by the Company as described above and as set forth in the Board's decision. Following a special appeal by the Company from this ruling, the Board reversed, and held that "all relevant evidence" should be received on the Company's allegation that the certification of the Union "contravenes Section 9(b)(3) of the Act."[8]

The Company caused subpoenas to be served on various officers of Local 555, the International Security Officers, Police and Guards Union (I.S.O.P.G.U.), and Teamsters Local 390. The latter filed a petition to quash the subpoena issued to its officer essentially on the ground that it sought information irrelevant to the proceeding. Local 555's counsel protested that the subpoenas were so far-reaching as to constitute an invasion of privacy.[9]

I denied the petition in part and granted it in part, ruling that the Company was entitled to some of the requested documents outright. As to others, I held that I would examine them in camera and receive into evidence those portions which were relevant to this proceeding. Following a special appeal by the Company from this ruling, the same was affirmed by the Board.[10] Local 555 agreed to abide by this procedure. Thereafter, I examined numerous documents submitted by Teamsters Local 390 and Local 555 pursuant to the subpoenas, turned over to the Company those documents to which it was entitled, and read into the record relevant portions of other documents.

B. Teamsters Representation of Company Employees in South Florida

The Company has facilities in West Palm Beach, Fort Lauderdale, and Miami, Florida. Teamsters Local 390 at relevant times represented company employees in the West Palm Beach and Miami facilities, but not in Fort Lauderdale. The parties stipulated that Teamsters Local 390 President Lark demanded recognition in the Fort Lauderdale facility in February 1982, and Lark testified that he requested recognition there in almost every bargaining session that he had with the Company. The record contains two such demands in writing, in 1975 and 1981.[11] The Company did not comply with these requests.

C. The Origin of Local 555

1. Kenneth Jordan

Kenneth Jordan was the principal organizer of Local 555. Jordan was a tractor-trailer driver at a Consolidated Freightways terminal in the West Palm Beach area. Consolidated's employees were represented by Teamsters Local 390. Jordan was a dues-paying member of Local 390 from 1976 to about 1984, when he stopped working because of an injury sustained in an accident.

At times when he was organizing Local 555, Jordan was also Local 390's steward at Consolidated Freightways. The Company contends that this fact tends to establish impermissible affiliation between Local 555 and Local 390.

Jordan explained his steward's function as essentially the resolution of grievances. In this connection, he consulted both with his Teamsters superiors and with management. He tried to resolve grievances without "going to paper," i.e., becoming involved in formal proceedings. Jordan denied that he ever engaged in "negotiations" at Consolidated, by which, I infer, he meant contract negotiations. Jordan testified that he received no pay from the Teamsters as a steward. This testimony was corroborated by Teamsters Local 390 President Lark.

The Teamsters bylaws provide that stewards are appointed by the Teamsters local president, unless he considers an election to be advisable, and that the president may relieve a steward of his duties at any time. The steward's duties essentially are to examine dues books, report the presence of nonunion employees, give the secretary-treasurer addresses and telephone numbers, and settle grievances.[12] A steward's manual distributed by the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, of which Jordan had a copy, defines the steward as "that person at the worksite who handles the problems and concerns of the employees and the employees' union."[13] The manual describes the steward's role in resolving grievances, which includes maintenance of constructive relations between management and the union, acting as spokesman for the union, policing the agreement, attending union meetings, and promoting unionism.[14] Peter Chiafalo, a Teamsters steward for 25 years ending in 1980, testified that the Teamsters manual accurately defines the functions of a steward. He denied that stewards have picket line duties or attend executive board meetings (with occasional exceptions) because only "elected" officers attend such meetings.

The foregoing steward's duties appear in section 7 of article VII of Local 390's bylaws, entitled "Officers." Other officers consist of the president, vice president,[15] secretary-treasurer, recording secretary, trustees, warden, and conductors. Article VIII of the bylaws confers a wide range of managerial and policymaking functions on the executive board, whose members consist of the president, vice president, secretary-treasurer, recording secretary and three trustees. Wardens and assistant wardens may attend board meetings only on invitation of the president.[16] There is no provision for attendance of stewards at executive board meetings.

2. Organization of the Local

Jordan testified that his father, age 60, was an unarmed security guard in Florida. Jordan's father had trouble on his job, and relayed this to Jordan. The latter said that, as a Teamsters steward, this annoyed him.

Jordan visited New York in early 1981, and at that time saw Frank Mancini, secretary-treasurer of the I.S.O.P.G.U. Jordan discussed his father's problems with Mancini, who asked Jordan whether he would like to take on the responsibility of a local in Florida. Jordan said that he would think about it. He was "making good money and had nc headaches."

Mancini came down to Florida on a fishing trip in the spring of 1981, and invited Jordan and his son to go along. Mancini asked Jordan whether he had made up his mind, and Jordan answered affirmatively. Mancini then gave Jordan "instructional lessons" on Section 9(b)(3), which "kind of amazed" Jordan. There were further telephone conversations between the two on this subject, and Jordan requested a charter. He received one about June 1981.[17]

Jordan denied that he had any communication with Teamsters Local 390 about his capacity as a Local 555 representative, although he did have communication with the Teamsters as a Local 390 steward at Consolidated Freightways. Jordan also denied any communication with any other Teamsters local. Teamsters Local 390 President Lark denied that anybody from Local 555 ever discussed its organization with him. I credit Jordan's and Lark's consistent and unrebutted testimonies on this issue.

3. The first meeting and election of officers

Local 555's first meeting took place in June 1981 about a week after Jordan received the charter. According to Jordan, the purpose of the meeting was to establish a union of security guards in Florida. Seven persons were present at the first meeting: Jordan; his father, Charles Jordan; John Pluchino, Van Stafford; Marty Marciaro; Sam Cannigliario; and Steve Hochhauser. Of these, Stafford and Charles Jordan had worked as security guards. Although the record is not clear, the first meeting was apparently held either in an office or in Jordan's residence.

Kenneth Jordan was elected president and Marciaro vice president. Marciaro was an automobile mechanic in 1981 and a tractor-trailer driver in Miami in 1982. Marciaro's father, Vincent Marciaro, was then secretary-treasurer of Teamsters Local 390, but did not attend any Local 555 meetings. Marty Marciaro resigned from Local 555 about 1983.

John Pluchino was elected secretary-treasurer. He was a member of Teamsters Local 390, and worked as a tractor-trailer driver for one of the Ryder companies, where he was a Local 390 steward for about 6 months in 1982. In late 1983, Jordan asked Pluchino to resign from Local 555 because of alleged improprieties where he worked, and Pluchino complied. Jordan testified that he consulted with attorneys before asking Pluchino to resign, but did not consult with anybody else.

Steve Hochhauser was elected recording secretary. Like Jordan, Hochhauser was employed at Consolidated Freightways. Although the record is not specific, I infer that Hochhauser, like Jordan, worked as a truckdriver.

[12] R. Exh. 3, sSec. 7.
[13] R. Exh. 8, p. 2.
[14] Id. at 2, 3.
[15] Although there is no express provision for a vice president in art. VII, I infer that this is a missprint because that article skips from sec. 1 (president) to sec. 3 (secretary-treasurer), while art. VIII specifically refers to a vice president. R. Exh. 3.
[16] Art. VIII, sec. 1 (R. Exh. 3).
[17] The charter was proffered to the Company during the hearing.

As noted, Jordan left work because of an accident in 1984. About that time, according to the stipulation of the parties, Hochhauser became an "appointed"[18] Teamsters steward at Consolidated, a position which he continued to hold at the time of the hearing. On the basis of this stipulation, the Teamsters bylaws, and Chiafalo's testimony that stewards do not attend Local 390 executive board meetings because only elected officers do so, I infer that the other Local 390 stewards, including Jordan and Pluchino, were also appointed.

Charles Jordan, Cannigliario, and Stafford became trustees. Stafford was a member of Teamsters Local 390.

Jordan credidly testified that the individuals who were present "didn't realize why we could only accept guards [but] agreed to go on those guidelines of only guards."

Examination of Jordan by the Company's counsel reads in part as follows:

> Q. Isn't it true, Mr. Jordan, that with respect to your Union right now, that currently you have no members as such: is that true?
> A. Yes.

Jordan further testified on cross-examination that Local 555 was operating "temporarily" under the bylaws of the International, but that it could not adopt bylaws and a constitution "until [it had] members." Pursuant to the Company's subpoena issued to Jordan, the "constitution of the Independent Watchman's Association"[19] was turned over to the Company, and was utilized by it during cross-examination of Jordan, but was not introduced into evidence. Jordan agreed that he was a member of the Local 555 executive board according to the provisions of this document, that the constitution required him to be bonded, and that he was not bonded.

Local 555 records indicate that it held meetings beginning about July 1981.[20] Jordan testified that they were held monthly. Although the evidence is somewhat sparse, I conclude that some meetings were held in an office, which was moved at one time, and that some meetings were held in Jordan's residence after his injury about 1984.

D. Teamsters Local 390 President Lark's Bargaining Session with the Company in January 1983

1. Summary of the evidence

As set forth above, Local 555 won the second election with respect to the Fort Lauderdale employees on 11 January 1983. Teamsters Local 390 President Lark met with company officials in that month, ostensibly with respect to the wages of Miami and West Palm Beach employees.[21]

Company District Manager Norman Whitcomb testified that Lark opened the meeting with the statement that he was there to negotiate wages for Miami and Fort Lauderdale employees. Company official Tom Cannon corrected him, saying that the subject under discussion was the wages of Miami and West Palm Beach employees. At that point, according to Whitcomb, Lark said that he understood the Company had lost the election with Local 555 in Fort Lauderdale, and that he was there to represent the Fort Lauderdale employees. He asked the Company whether it was aware that the principals in Local 555 were members of Local 390. Lark also said it would be easier to deal with him on behalf of the Fort Lauderdale employees. The Company declined to do so.

The testimony of former company executive Tom Cannon, recorded in another proceeding, is substantially the same. Lark said that he was ready to negotiate for Miami and Fort Lauderdale, that the Company had lost the election in Fort Lauderdale, that the president of Local 555 was a member of the Teamsters, and that the Company would be "better off dealing with the Teamsters in the long run that the security union."[22]

The testimony of Local 390 President Lark is equivocal on the question of whether it was he or company official Cannon who first raised the issue of the victory of Local 555 in the 11 January election. And, Lark conceded, he may have said that some members of Local 555 were also members of Local 390. However, on the significant issue of whether Lark claimed to represent Local 555, the Local 390 president denied that he told the Company that he was there to negotiate on behalf of Local 555, and denied that the latter had ever authorized him to do so. He denied telling the Company that he was prepared to act as an "interceding union" for Local 555. Lark testified: "What the Company did was took a statement and turned it around to their advantage. I told the Company that if they didn't want to deal with 2 unions, I would negotiate a contract for the Fort Lauderdale [employees] on behalf of Local 390."

Local 555 President Jordan denied that he ever talked to Lark about the guard union.

2. Factual analysis

The evidence is insufficient to establish that Lark told the Company that Local 390 was prepared to act as an "interceding union" and to negotiate for the Fort Lauderdale employees on behalf of Local 555. Lark himself denied any assertion of such representative status and there is no testimony from the company witnesses explicity affirming that Lark asserted such status. Indeed, Company Official Cannon testified that Lark said the Company would be "better off dealing with the Teamsters." Local 555 never authorized Local 390 to act for it. What Lark did tell the Company is that Local 390

[19] Local 555's counsel represented that the Independent Watchman's Association was the former name of the current I.S.O.P.G.U., and that the name was changed in 1980.

[20] In describing Local 555 documents on the record, I originally mischaracterized a record of sign-in sheets (with no substantive discussion) as a record of meetings. Thereafter, I discovered the record of the meetings, with some substantive discussion of them, and made their contents available to the Company.

[22] R. Exh. 7.

was prepared to represent the Fort Lauderdale employees if the Company did not want to deal with two unions, and that this would be easier for the Company.

E. The Issue of Financial Assistance to Local 555

Teamsters Local 390 President Lark denied that his local gave any gifts or moneys to any affiliated local in 1983 other than the International. He was then shown the Local 390 LM-2 report to the Department of Labor for 1983, signed by him, which shows $120 as a contribution, gift, or grant to an "affiliated labor organization."[23] Lark stated that he did not know the recipient of the $120, but said that it may have been for a party or retirement dinner run by another Teamsters local. He denied that the report meant that Local 390 was affiliated with any organization other than the International, and denied that either he or Local 390 gave any money to Local 555.

The 1982 or 1983 tax return of Local 555 President Jordan was submitted by Local 555 to the Company and Jordan was interrogated on the basis of information in this document. According to Jordan, he commingled some of his own funds with those of the Local because the latter did not have a bank account. He denied receiving money from any labor organization other than Local 555 and denied paying out money to any labor organization. The only money that he received, other than a return of expenses from Local 555, was his salary from his employer and an inheritance.

The evidence is insufficient to establish that Local 390 gave financial assistance to Local 555.

F. Jordan's Relationship with Antonio Abaroa

The parties stipulated that Antonio Abaroa was a Teamsters Local 390 steward at the company location in Miami from December 1981 through about August 1982, and that he resigned about that time. The Company contends that Local 555 President Jordan's relationship with Abaroa establishes a conflict of interests on the part of Local 555 sufficient to warrant revocation of the certification.

Jordan testified that he received a telephone call from Abaroa in early 1982 which he did not fully understand. The two then met in a restaurant, and thereafter had telephone conversations in which Abaroa explained his problems. He was having trouble with District Manager Whitcomb, and was in danger of losing his job. According to Jordan's hearsay report, Abaroa was apparently dissatisfied with his representation by Teamsters Local 390. He asked Jordan to have the Teamsters "thrown out" of the company location in Miami, and replaced by Local 555. Jordan replied that it was difficult to get a union decertified, and that Abaroa needed the support of a certain percentage of the employees. Abaroa spoke to the Miami employees, with no results indicated by the record.

Jordan said that he was "trying to be a Teamster steward," and that Abaroa's request put him in "an extremely bad spot." Jordan was both a Teamsters steward and the organizer of Local 555 in Fort Lauderdale, he explained. He had no interest in what was going on in Miami, and believed it to be "none of [his] business." "And without the cards . . . I had no authority to go near it. And I wouldn't go near it," Jordan testified.

Local 555 records indicate that Abaroa was present at a Local 555 meeting on 14 August 1983. Jordan testified that the principal subject of discussion at this meeting was a possible strike at the Company in Fort Lauderdale, and that a strike was authorized. Abaroa did not participate in this discussion, according to Jordan. He merely stopped in to say, "Hello," and was in another room. Jordan testified: "All that I was worried about is that I got a hundred percent vote out of Fort Lauderdale. And I [was at] a very heated meeting. That's all I was interested in. I wasn't involved with Miami, Tony Abaroa, or anybody else, West Palm Beach wasn't involved in it. All I was interested in was Fort Lauderdale."

II. LEGAL ANALYSIS AND CONCLUSIONS

A. The Issues

As set forth above, the Company's objection to the second election which gave rise to this proceeding was that Local 555 "is affiliated with Teamsters Local 390, which admits nonguards to membership," and that the certification is thereby precluded by the Act. The Board, however, has stated that the issue is whether the certification of Local 555 "contravenes section 9(b)(3) of the Act" (in any manner). That section, after authorizing the Board to decide units appropriate for collective bargaining, continues in relevant part as follows:

> Provided, That the Board shall not . . . (3) decide that any unit is appropriate for such purposes if it includes, together with other employees, any individual employed as a guard to enforce against employees and other persons rules to protect property of the employer or to protect the safety of persons on the employer's premises; but no labor organization shall be certified as the representative of employees in a bargaining unit of guards if such organization admits to membership, or is affiliated directly or indirectly with an organization which admits to membership, employees other than guards.

Although the Board has concluded that special circumstances here warrant departure from the rule prohibiting relitigation of issues which were or could have been raised in the prior representation hearing, this proceeding is still based on the Company's objection to the second election and its request for a hearing, and is conducted pursuant to the Board's Rules and Regulations governing such proceedings. It is well established that, in such hearings, the burden of showing grounds for setting aside an election is on the party seeking to do so.[24]

B. The Issue of Whether Local 555 Admits Nonguards to Membership

As noted above, the Company's objection to the certification is that Local 555 is affiliated with Local 390, which admits nonguards to membership. The Company has not claimed that the certification is invalid because Local 555 itself admits nonguards to membership. Yet this question is an issue in this proceeding because of the Baord's Order that relevant evidence be received on the Company's allegation that the certification "contravenes Section 9(b)(3) of the Act." It is obvious that that section would bar certification if Local 555 itself admits nonguards to membership.

It is equally obvious that, although two of the Local 555 officers had worked as guards (Stafford and Charles Jordan), the other officers had worked or were working as nonguards. The issue is whether they had been admitted to Local 555 "membership" as that term is used in Section 9(b)(3) of the National Labor Relations Act.

The Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959 defines a "member" of a labor organization as "any person who has fulfilled the requirements for membership in such organization,"[25] and the National Labor Relations Act memorializes "the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership."[26]

The problem in this case is that we do not know Local 555's rules for membership. Although a copy of the International constitution, presumably containing the membership rules, was delivered to the Company pursuant to its subpoena, the same was not introduced into evidence. Local 555 President Jordan repeatedly testified on cross-examination by the Company that Local 555 "had no members," and was operating temporarily under the International constitution. The Company presented no evidence to rebut Jordan's testimony. Indeed, that testimony was elicited by the Company.[27]

The fact that the newly certified labor organization has not acquired any members does not make it defunct or in any way invalidate the certification as long as it continues in existence and is willing and able to represent the employees. Hershey Chocolate Corp., 121 NLRB 901, 911 (1958). This function Local 555 is clearly willing and able to perform.

There is no evidence that the organizers of Local 555 intend to flout the proscriptions of Section 9(b)(3). On the contrary, they "agreed to go on the guidelines of only guards" as members of the organization. Although the record is unclear as to the date that they intend to resign their nonguard jobs, presumably this would be prior to formal acquisition of membership status. The Board has previously accepted such statement of intention to abide by the requirements of the statute as rebuttal of other evidence suggesting acceptance of nonguards into membership. International Security Corp., 223 NLRB 1129 (1976).[28] The same inference is warranted here.

I conclude that the Respondent has not contended, nor has it sustained its burden of establishing, that Local 555 admits nonguards to membership.

C. The Divided Loyalty Issue

1. The rationale of the status

The Company argues that certification is barred because of divided loyalty of Local 555 officers. The legislative history of the divided loyalty rationale for enactment of Section 9(b)(3) has recently been set forth by the Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit in pertinent part as follows:

> The conference chose the language, it said, because it found persuasive the exposition by the lower court in Jones & Laughlin, 154 F.2d 932 (6th Cir.), that guards who belong to a union representing plant employees would experience conflicting loyalties in the event of a strike because their obligation to the employer and the community would be incompatible with their obligation to the striking union.
> The Board and reviewing courts have consistently found that although in enacting Section 9(b)(3) Congress may have focused primarily on the particular situation in Jones & Laughlin, the broad language which it chose to use encompasses not merely divided loyalties at a company plant, but the potential for divided loyalty that arises whenever a guard is called upon to enforce the rules of his employer against any fellow union member . . . .
> It has been held uniformly in the last thirty years . . . that armored car security personnel . . . are guards within the meaning of Section 9(b)(3). . . . The Potential for divided loyalty is present whether or not the same employer is involved . . . .
>
> We are convinced that, based on the language and legislative history of Section 9(b)(3), the Board was warranted in interpreting the section as proscribing Board direction to an employer to bargain with a mixed guard union despite prior voluntary recognition of that union by the employer. There is sufficient support for the Board's conclusion that in enacting the statute, Congress knowingly decreased the stability of bargaining relationships in order to further its objective of protecting employers from the potential for divided loyalty.

[25] Sec. 3(o) of the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act provides:

> "Member" or "member in good standing," when used in reference to a labor organization, includes any person who has fulfilled the requirements for membership in such organization, and who neither has voluntarily withdrawn from membership nor has been expelled or suspended from membership after appropriate proceedings consistent with lawful provisions of the constitution and bylaws of such organization.

Teamsters Local 807 v. NLRB, 755 F.2d 5, 8–10, (2d Cir. 1985), denying review of 270 NLRB 787 (1984).

In the case of armored-car guards, as here, the Board has stated as follows:

> The danger of divided loyalty which Congress sought to eliminate may not be quite so far-reaching in the case of armored-car guards, but it is, nevertheless, present. A conflict of loyalty could arise, for example, if the guards should be called upon to deliver money or valuables to one of their customers whose employees were represented by the same union as represented the armored-car guards and the employees of the customer were on strike and picketing the premises of the customer.

Armored Motor Service Co., 106 NLRB 1139, 1140 (1953).[29]

2. The Company's application of the rationale

The Company appears to apply the foregoing rationale to this case in two different ways. The first argument reads as follows:

> S. Hochhauser and K. Jordan, as being both officers and members of Teamsters Local Union No. 390, as well as being officers of Local 555, would be caught in the classic conflict of loyalty dilemma should the interests of Teamsters Local Union No. 390 collide with the interests of Local 555. Thus, under such circumstances, since Shop Stewards served at the discretion of the President, they are bound to perform those acts and effectuate those Local Union goals as are directed by the President of Teamsters Local Union No. 390. The interests of Local 555 can be, and are at odds with the interests of Teamsters Local Union No. 390 due to the very existence of Section 9(b)(3). Since K. Jordan and S. Hochhauser were and/or are Shop Steward Officers of Teamsters Local Union No. 390, while at the same time being President and/or Secretary-Treasurer Officers of Local 555, the conflict exists.[30]

The Company points to the Abaroa incidents as examples of this conflict:

> There was Abaroa, requesting that a guard union organize the guard employees of Respondent's Miami location at a time when a petition . . . would have been timely. There was Abaroa, communicating to a Local 555 Officer, and Teamsters Local 390 Officer that Teamsters Local 390 was failing to fairly represent the employees.
> What side did K. Jordan pick in this graphic example of why the Board refuses to certify guard unions affiliated with non-guard unions? K. Jordan said it all when he testified: "I was trying to be a steward."
> In other words, K. Jordan disregarded the needs of employees who could have been represented by a guard union, and followed the policy of the Teamsters Local Union 390 President, who was negotiating the collective bargaining agreement with Respondent. This is not a surmised conflict, rather it is an example of those types of conflicts that Congress sought to eliminate by the passage of Section 9(b)(3).[31]

In other language the Company appears to link the divided loyalty rationale to the statutory prohibition against affiliation of a guard with a nonguard union:

> Accordingly, the essence of Section 9(b)(3) is the concept of divided loyalty. That is guards who belong to a union which is comprised of or controlled by non-guards would experience conflicting loyalties to their employer and their union which would be incompatible . . . . Divided loyalties are concerns not only present under the circumstances in different units of the same facility of an employer, but the potential for divided loyalties also arises whenever a guard is called upon to enforce the rules of an employer against any fellow union member of an affiliated union who is employed by a different employer.[32]

3. Discussion
